WISSEGRAD.

THE DANUBE.

BY E. CHARDON.

THE Danube is, next to the Volga, the largest river in Europe. It is over fifteen hundred miles in length, and receives as tributaries sixty navigable rivers, and one hundred and twenty smaller streams, and drains a surface of nearly two hundred and fifty thousand square miles. It is one of the few rivers in Europe which run from west to east, taking its course through Austria and Turkey. Sometimes the stream is narrow and deep, being shut in between high banks; at others it widens out almost like a sea; and again it is broken into small channels by numerous islands.

The Danube takes its rise in the very heart of the Black Forest, three streams, the Brig-Ach, the Brige and the Donan, or Danube proper, uniting to form the single stream. The Inen, a stream more important than the Danube, and which flows into that river at Passau, takes its rise in the vicinity of St. Gothard, where the Rhine, the Rhone and the Tessin also rise, the four falling respectively into the Black Sea, the North Sea, the Mediterranean and the Gulf of Venice.

The Black Forest is itself full of historic and traditionary interest. Novelists have written, and poets sung about it; but strangely enough there seems to be little literature belonging to the Danube. Or, if native writers have celebrated it in song and story, their productions have, for the most part, failed to find their way into our tongue.

I remember a song by one unknown writer, which flows to the measures of Aidé's beautiful Danube waltz as though the two were born to keep each other company:

"Do you recall that night in June,
Upon the Danube River,
We listened to a Ländler tune,
We watched the moon-beams quiver?
I oft since then have watched the moon,
But never, love, oh, never, never,
Can I forget that night in June
Upon the Danube River.

"Our boat kept measure with its oar,
The music rose in snatches,
From peasants dancing on the shore,
With bolsterous songs and catches;
I know not why that Ländler rang
Through all my soul; but never, never Can I forget that song they sang
Upon the Danube River!"

The Danube drains the southern slopes of the mountains whose northern sides supply the sources of the Neckar. The region through which the infant river flows is wild and romantic in the extreme. Its hills and highlands furnish pasturthe town the Iller flows into the Danube, and at the juncture of the two streams is found the Bavarian village of New Ulm. The Danube is navigable at this point by vessels of one hundred tons.

Some distance below Ulm, the traveller reaches Blenheim, a Bavarian town, noted as the place where was gained the decisive victory of the English and Imperialists, under the famous John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, over the French and Bavarians, in 1704.

The traveller who descends the Danube will not fail to notice Hals Castle, situated upon the very pinnacle of a steep rock, forming an impregnable defense in feudal times; while the little village, with its cottages and churches nestling confidently at its foot, betoken, if not more peaceful days, at least an era when all old things have passed away, and when every man is not armed against his neighbor.

Ingolstadt and Ratisbon are both fortified towns. The latter is walled, and entered by six gates. The seeker after the curious finds here a quaint old cathedral, built in 1375; a fine town house, in age for flocks and herds, which form the chief wealth of the peasant inhabitants. Sixty miles or more from its head is found upon its banks the thriving town of Sigmaringen, the capital of the principality of Hohenzollern.

Flowing through Wurtemberg, the river passes the picturesque town of Nieder Waldsee, its castle, with its ruined wall and more recently added towers, set upon the brow of the overhanging hill. Nothing can be lovelier than the scenery of the river at this point. More rugged and romantic is the view at Würther-inser, where the Tower of Strudel commands the deep and rapid current as it flows between two high and butting rocks, with a frowning wall beyond.

On the eastern frontier of Wurtemberg, facing Bavaria, stands Ulm, which was long an imperial free town, strongly fortified, and a military post of much importance in the German wars. Here, on the 17th of October, 1805, General Mack, with twelve thousand Austrian troops, capitulated to Napoleon without firing a shot. Ulm is a beautiful town. It sits on its green hills before the Danube; a chain of mountains outlines itself against the horizon behind the town. Opposite which was held, from 1662 to 1806, the diet of the empire; the old Episcopal palace, and a fine stone bridge over the Danube eleven hundred feet long. This town was long the capital of Bavaria, and afterward a free imperial city until 1806. Near it, in 1809, Napoleon was wounded in a battle in which he forced the Austrians to retreat.

In the Episcopal palace is a monument to John Kepler, a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, to whom we are indebted for the discovery of the laws which regulate the movements of the planetary bodies, their ellipticity, etc. Kepler was born in 1571, at Wiet, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, was educated at Tübingen, on the Neckar, was appointed professor of astronomy at Gratz, and afterward became mathematician to the Emperor Rudolph.

Ratisbon is quite a commercial town, having a steam-packet station.

Every school-boy is familiar with Campbell's poem commencing,

"On Linden, when the sun was low
All bloodless lay the untrodden snow,
And dark as winter was the flow
Of Isar rolling rapidly.

"But Iser saw another sight,
When the drums beat at dead of night,
Commanding fires of death to light
The darkness of her scenery."

Into the Danube flow the dark waters of the Iser, having skirted the famous battle-field.

The Danube abounds in fortified towns. At the junction of the Inn is Passau, one of these, and Lintz is another. The latter is fortified in a remarkable manner by a circle of thirty-two detached forts, twenty-three on the south and nine on the north bank of the Danube. The town is handsomely built, and has three suburbs more extensive than the city itself.

A few miles above Lintz is the picturesque town of Ottensheim. It is scarcely more than a village, peror Marcus Aurelius breathed his last. It was successively taken by the Goths and Huns, and subsequently by Charlemagne, who placed it under the government of the margraves of the East, part of his dominions, thence called Oesterreich. The margraves, afterward dukes, held Vienna until the middle of the thirteenth century, when it was taken by the Emperor Frederick II., and again by Rudolph I., founder of the Hapsburg dynasty, in 1297.

A couple of centuries later it came into possession of the Hungarians, and became the seat of the court of Mathias, King of Hungary and Bohemia. The Austrians afterward possessed themselves of it, and it has since been the established residence of the Austrian imperial house.

with a castle crowning a hill, at whose foot rolls the Danube, and adown whose sides and along the river bank cluster the houses. Hill and vale, field and woodland, vary the view, and make it one of the most lovely imaginable.

The town of Durrenstein, still lower down, is especially remarkable as being the prison-place of Richard Coeur-de-Lion. On a high rock near the town are the ruins of the fortress in which that prince was confined on his return from Palestine in 1192, by Leopold, Duke of Austria. In 1805 the French were defeated here by the united Russian and Austrian armies.

Vienna, the capital of Austria, is found on the southern bank of the Danube. Its ancient name was Vindobonda, when it was a station of the Roman legions in Upper Pannonia. Here the Em-

In 1683, Vienna was besieged by a Turkish army two hundred thousand strong, under the command of Kara Mustapha, when it was only saved from surrender by the timely arrival of John Sobriski, king of Poland.

The city proper of Vienna—that contained within the fortifications—is scarcely three miles in circumference; but the Vienna of to-day, including its beautiful suburbs, is fifteen miles in circumference.

The old city is surrounded by a broad fosse, and a wall from forty to fifty feet high. Modern warfare rendering these fortifications useless, they have been converted into a public promenade, known as the Bastei. This wall is entered by twelve gates, one of them, called the Burghor, being one of the finest in Europe. Outside the walls is a wide esplanade known as the Glacis, which is laid out into delightful walks and gardens. The city has numerous squares or places, and is ornamented by many superb promenades. The Prater and the Augarten, two extensive parks, are situated between the insular spaces inclosed between the main stream of the Danube and its various branches. The Prater is the favorite place of resort for all classes of the people; and during the season is crowded with carriages.

There is no city in Europe that has so large a number of resident nobility as Vienna. Nearly two hundred families of princes, counts and barons make this city their home, living in magnificent palaces, and spending princely incomes. Thus Vienna is exceptionally fine in its appearance, a literary city. Mr. Russell says of the Viennese that they "take to themselves the reputation of being the most musical people in Europe, and this is the only part of their character about which they display much jealousy or anxiety. So long as it is granted that they can produce among their citizens a greater number of decent performers on the violin or piano than any other capital, they have no earthly objection to have it said that they can likewise produce a greater number of block-heads and debauchees." Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and others have composed their best works in or near Vienna.

while it preserves about it a sort of antique grandeur, from the fact that the old and not the new parts of the city are the fashionable quarters.

The Cathedral of St. Stephen, which stands in the very heart of the city, is a noble piece of Gothic architecture, comparing favorably with the cathedrals of Strasburg and Antwerp. Its spire is four hundred and fifty-three feet high.

The Church of the Augustine, one of the handsomest in Vienna, contains the masterpiece of Canova, the monument of the Archduchess Christine. The church of St. Peter is built on the model of the basilica of St. Peter's at Rome.

There is, in Vienna, one of the finest universities in Europe, offering more than ordinary scientific advantages.

Vienna is distinguished as a musical rather than proper, and finds himself on Hungarian soil, and the name of Kossuth suggests itself. There is, however, little or no sign of discontent among the Hungarians at their present subject condition. They have their own separate legislature, and could scarcely be more independent if they had a Hungarian king, instead of an Austrian emperor. Hungary, in fact, seems, to-day, perfectly satisfied to become an integral part of the Austrian Empire.

Presburg is a commercial rather than a military town, doing a large business in corn, linen and Hungarian wines. The principal object of attraction is the ruins of the royal palace on the hill above the town. It was here that the Empress Maria Theresa threw herself on the sympathies of the Hungarian nobles.

"Fair Austria spreads her mournful charms,
The queen, the beauty, sees the world in arms;
From hill to hill the beacon's towering blaze
Spreads wide the hope of plunder and of praise;
The fierce Croatian, and the wild Hussar,
With all the sons of ravage, crowd the war."

The dauntless empress went to Presburg to be crowned, receiving upon her head the iron crown of St. Stephen, and covering her jewelled dress with his ragged and venerated robe. Then summoning the representatives of all orders of the State to meet in diet at the great hall of the castle, she appeared clad in mourning and the Hungarian costume, still bearing the crown and scimeter which were regarded by the nation with such religious respect. She made an appeal to the assembled multitude, declaring that her only resource in her time of trouble, was in their faithfulness, Danube. This city, with Buda on the opposite side of the river, forms the modern capital of Hungary, and the third city, in point of population, in the Austrian Empire.

Buda is an ancient place, built chiefly upon the lower slopes of a range of picturesque hills. The town is commanded and overlooked by a castle, a stern, feudal-looking pile. In this was deposited the crown of St. Stephen, king of Hungary, presented by Pope Sylvester, A. D. 1000, and regarded as the palladium of the Hungarian nation. This cherished memorial of Hungarian independence, removed by Kossuth during the recent struggle, with a view to its preservation by the Magyar nation, fell subsequently into the possession of Austria, and has since been deposited at Vienna. Buda is connected with Pesth by a handsome suspension bridge.

arms and tried valor. Her words set on fire all the admiration and martial spirit of the assembly. They half drew their swords, and flung them back in their brazen scabbards, with a loud, ringing sound, and shouted, "We will consecrate our lives and our arms; we will die for our king, Maria Theresa!" It was a law that no queen should reign in Hungary, and hence they called her king.

About half way between Presburg and Buda is the strong and almost impregnable fortress of Komorn, which played so important a part during the struggle for Hungarian independence in 1849. It is the boast of the inhabitants of the town that it never yet surrendered to an enemy.

Passing several towns of more or less interest, the traveller finds himself at Pesth, the capital of Hungary, beautifully situated on the bank of the Four miles from Buda is Alt-Buda, built on the site of the ancient city of Aquincum, where Attila held his court. Upon a hill beside the right bank of the Danube, eighteen miles north of Buda, are the ruins of the royal castle of Vissegrad, long the residence of the native sovereigns of Hungary. A picture of the ruins of the castle of Vissegrad heads this article.

Passing down the Danube, in whose broadening waters the Drave, the Theiss, the Save and other smaller streams lose themselves, the traveller, after many miles of journey finds himself in an unfamiliar place. He is no longer in Austria; he is upon Turkish soil. Belgrade has a strange, old-world look, and yet there are numerous evidences of the struggle of western civilization for supremacy. The spires of churches gleam out against the sky in company with the minarets of mosques. Western glazed shop windows stand side by side with Oriental open bazaars. This is the entrepôt of commerce between Turkey and Austria, and the seat of the principal authorities of Servia. In fact, its commercial interests are most important. It is on the highway of the eastern trade, which lies down the Danube and by the Black Sea. Somlin, a smaller fortified town on the Austrian border, three miles above, shares with Belgrade this commercial importance.

Lenendria, a fortified town of Servia, twenty-four miles below Belgrade, was formerly the residence of the Servian kings.

The Danube now approaches the Carpathian Mountains, through the ramparts of which it must force its way, or else remain shut in forever, as it once was, in the great natural basin of Hungary. It gathers together its forces for the giant effort, and beats down, or, rather, cuts its way through, this mountainous barrier. The place of its escape is called The Iron Gate. The scenery here is magnificent, not to say appalling. Huge rocks stand sentinel on each side of the river, presenting their barren, precipitous sides to the narrowed current. Further back rise the higher mountain peaks. It is, in fact, a scene of unparalleled grandeur. Before one reaches The Iron Gate, however, the little town of New Orsova is passed, built upon an island in the river.

The Iron Gate once passed, the Upper Danube is left behind. The country changes, and the people have already been changing. We are on the borders of Wallachia, a province which is a kind of connecting link between the eastern world and the western. There is no lovelier portion of Europe than the slope of the Carpathian Mountains looking to Wallachia. An undulating belt of country thirty miles broad, and reaching from the Pruth to the Danube, is covered with vineyards and orchards in the full luxuriance of a climate whose summer sun shines with the fire of the East on a soil watered by innumerable streams.

Immense obelisks and piles of every colored marble start up among the forests; perpetual cascades thunder from inaccessible heights; glittering pinnacles, wild caverns, and precipices steep as a wall, and sheeted with forest flowers and shrubs of singular fragrance and richness of color, remind the traveller of Switzerland, but of Switzerland under an almost Oriental sky.

Still further the traveller descends past towns and villages, some of them fortified now on the Roumanian side, and again on the Bulgarian. Now a cross points the top of a spire, now it is a crescent, showing that Greek and Mohammedan live together, if not in actual peace and goodwill, at least with mutual endurance. European dwellings with their modern conveniences rival their Oriental neighbors, which may look somewhat romantic at a distance, but are dirty and ill-conditioned at near approach.

The broad river is filled with mighty craft carrying the burden of the commerce of two worlds. The two sides of the stream look askance at each other, the northern shore longing to rescue the southern from Oriental barbarism. In fact, Austria and Russia are each longing to swallow Turkey at a gulp, and the only hope for Turkey seems to lie in the rivalry of these two powers, neither of which will permit the other to do what it so vainly longs to do itself. Turkey, on the other hand, burns to regain possession of her wrested provinces, and re-assert to the world the power and breadth of the Ottoman Empire.

The traveller has almost forgotten the costumes of Western Europe as he gazes at the panorama before him. The costumes of the Hungarian peasants now give place to the quainter ones of the Wallachians and Bulgarians. A traveller tells us that the gala suit of the Wallachian consists of a white cotton blouse or shirt put on over his trousers, a sleeveless, embroidered jacket over this, a white lamb-skin cap something like a very large fez, and sandals fastened to his ankles with leather cords. "As a rule, the men are extremely handsome, their oval faces, well-shaped features, intelligent brows and erect, manly bearing seem to indicate their accepted descent from a nation of warriors. They wear their black hair in long locks which fall gracefully over their shoulders; and, seen in the midst of their beautiful country, they form one of the most picturesque objects the eye can rest on.

"The women," says the same traveller, "do not contrast favorably with the men in appearance. They are generally small, and their features are worn and coarse, through exposure and early toil. At a very tender age the Wallachian woman is put to out-door work, and her beauty becomes marred by the effects of hard labor. Occasionally an exception to this rule is met with, particularly in the larger villages, where peasants are found wealthy and cultured enough not to send their daughters into the fields; and then they are found to possess great natural beauty, which is much enhanced by their confiding, modest demeanor. The expression of their eyes is peculiarly soft and fawn-like, and accustomed as they are to being treated as inferior beings, they seem surprised as well as pleased at the least notice being bestowed on them.

"It is painful to see the drudgery and hard work they undergo, as a rule. Not only are the cares of the household, such as it is, on their shoulders, but they have to attend to the garden and fields, reaping, sowing, storing and carrying wood and water, besides which they spin and weave the rude cloth and blankets used by the family. Their dress is always simple, and resembles that of the men, in addition to which they wear a sort of colored petticoat, open at the sides, to give them freedom in walking. Their hair is worn in tresses, ornamented with flowers or coins strung on a thread, and curiously interwoven in the hair. Young girls never wear any covering on the head, but married women use a white scarf with colored ends, gracefully folded, after the manner of a turban. They generally go barefooted, but use the sandal for long walks, and on gala days a pair of boots."

Still descending, yet taking many a right-angled turn, the traveller gradually approaches the mouths of the Danube, for it has many. At Tchernavoda, a Turkish town, the river changes its general eastern direction for a northern one. Fifty miles or so below, at Galatz, it turns again toward the east, and flowing, a sluggish stream, through low lands, presently divides into numerous branches, through which it pours its yellow floods into the Black Sea, leaving the trace of its mud-soiled journeyings upon the waters of that sea for many miles from land. At its entrance into the Black Sea the Danube is shallow; its waters are spread over an immense surface, and lie stagnating among an infinity of reeds and other aquatic plants. Only two mouths are navigable to ships of any burden, the rest being choked by bars.

The ancients gave the name of Ister to the eastern part of the river, after its junction with the Sæve. The river was an object of worship to the Scythians. The river-god is represented on a medal of Trajan; but the finest figure of him is on that emperor at Rome.

One word concerning the boats upon the Danube. Nothing can be more interesting or much more pleasant than travelling on these large and comfortable boats. The crowd on board, composed of various nationalities, in peculiar costumes, and speaking different languages, gives an opportunity for a study of European races seldom to be found. Almost every European nation is here represented—English and French tourists bound for Constantinople, German and Hungarian merchants, traders and peasants from all the principalities along the banks of the Danube, coming in or landing at the different stations with never-ceasing movement. The boats are provided with every necessity and comfort, and the commissariat is remarkably good. The steamers always anchor at night, as the navigation of the Danube is too dangerous to enable them to proceed after dark. The passengers then kill the time according to their tastes. The Turks and Serbs generally play cards or dice, and keep up a continual and loud conversation; Germans lie down, grumbling and growling at the noise that disturbs their rest; and the contented traveller smokes his cigar in a corner, snatching an occasional instalment of rest, until the sun rises over the great plain, and the boat begins to move again.

The Danube, like other rivers of similar geological history, at one time presented a succession of lacustrine ponds, placed in gradation one above another, and united by cascades. Such a water-course, in its earlier stages, is represented by the chain of great lakes in North America. When the constantly flowing water shall have sufficiently worn away and deepened their outlets, there will then be, in some future geological age, a grandly sweeping river, sometimes flowing through a broad and fertile valley, the bed of a former lake, at others cutting its way abruptly through deep cañons, as at Niagara when the falls shall have disappeared. The rocky barriers in these some-time lakes situated between them, have been gradually demolished and washed away by the water. The Danube obtained its hydrological importance from the time when its waters ceased to be lost in the former lakes which have now become the plains of Hungary, Austria and Wallachia.

Often times when the river thus cuts away a passage through a rocky barrier, it leaves standing erect, as an evidence of the former state of things, an inlet of hard stone which it has failed to wash away. On the Danube we find these proud rocks, with their perpendicular sides towering up, like enormous pillars, as high as the level of the rising ground by the river-side, and crowned on their summits, some with a feudal fortress, some with a hermitage, and some with nothing but a clump of bushes or brush-wood. The water-gap through the Carpathian Mountains, called the "Iron Gate," presents this characteristic; and the same thing may be seen in the picture of "Wörther-inser."

There is a curious law of nature to which all rivers are subject. This law, provided that the configuration of the ground allows it, causes water to deviate regularly to the right in the northern hemisphere, and to the left in the southern. With regard to those rivers which flow in a line parallel to the equator, there is no force which compels them to eat away either one or the other of their banks; but they are retarded in their course if they flow to the east, and are, on the contrary, accelerated if they run toward the west. A still more remarkable fact is exemplified by the Danube, which passes in succession in a series of defiles, and always develops its winding toward the right below each gate of rocks through which it has to pass. Thus, above Pesth and at the Iron Gate, instead of crossing diagonally the level tract bathed by its waters, the river bends suddenly to the south, so as to take the course of the great central depression round the high ground on its right. And at other parts the same principle is illustrated in a feebler manner.

THE LAKE OF COMO.

[We take from a recent number of The Methodist a charming description of this beautiful lake, from the pen of the Rev. ROSS C. HOUGHTON.]

TWO hours by rail over a fertile plain luxuriantly clothed with vineyards, and half an hour in a rumbling old diligence over a most romantic mountain-road, brought us from Milan to the quaint old town of Como, and the most beautiful of the Italian lakes. Aside from its picturesque situation, Como has little to interest the traveller. Its Cathedral, however, well repaid our visit of an hour or more. It was erected in the fourteenth century, in the Lombard-Gothic style, and contains the beautiful sarcophagus of its founder, Queen Theodolinda. With much ceremony the old priest opened for us a casket which formed the centre of a richly decorated cross over the altar, and disclosed to our wondering eyes one of the most interesting relics to be found in Europe—the famous Iron Crown which was used at the coronation of thirty-four Lombard kings. It rested upon the brow of the great Emperor Charles V., was employed at the coronation of Napoleon I. in 1805, and was last used when the Emperor Ferdinand I. was crowned in 1838.

On examining the venerable relic we found that it consists of a broad hoop of purest gold, profusely adorned with precious stones, around the inner surface of which is a thin strip of iron, which the old priest reverently kissed, declaring that it was made from a nail of the true Cross, brought by the Empress Helena herself from Palestine.

The Lake of Como is thirty miles in length, with an arm called Lake of Lecco branching off at nearly right angles with its centre, some thirteen miles in length. The greatest width is two and one-half miles, and its greatest depth one thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine feet. The view from the quay at Como is limited, but the moment our steamer rounded the first promontory the full beauty of the famous lake burst upon our sight.

It is completely shut in by lofty mountains, some of which are seven thousand feet in height, and, at the time of our visit, in May, were crowned with snow. The immediate banks of the lake are covered with luxuriant gardens and vineyards, while above these the grayish tints of the olive groves contrast strongly with the brilliant green of the chestnut and walnut of the forests still higher up. Along the entire length of the lake are scattered, at irregular intervals, the gay villas of the Italian aristocracy, the grounds of which are laid out with a most happy combination of the natural and the artificial, the charming effect of which is a constant surprise to the visitor. Occasionally a low promontory juts out from the mountain wall, narrowing the lake to the width of a mile, or even less, and upon this there is sure to be a snug little chateau with a perfect wilderness of flowers and shrubbery, a miniature wharf with numerous pleasure-boats, and a group of gay people to wave their hats and handkerchiefs at the passing strangers. The most interesting villas are Villa d'Este, the largest on the lake, which was for several years the residence of Queen Caroline, the unfortunate wife of George IV.; Villa Pasta, the residence of the celebrated singer; Villa Carlotta, with its wonderful rocky gorge and waterfall of several hundred feet; and Villa Serbelloni, which commands an exquisite view, by far the finest on the lake. We were given ample time to visit these, and in each case were fully repaid for the necessary exertion. All the finest residences are enriched with works of art. At Villa Carlotta we were shown, on the frieze of the marble hall, the celebrated reliefs, by Thorwaldsen, representing the triumph of Alexander, for which the enormous sum of three hundred and seventy-five thousand francs was paid; also a most exquisitely beautiful statue of Cupid and Psyche, by the great Canova. Nothing can be more lovely than these summer retreats, with their grand surroundings of mountain and glen. They are just the spots for rest and communion with nature in her most picturesque forms. There are several romantic old castles perched upon overhanging cliffs, each with its appropriate legend, which the captain of our boat is quite ready to relate, with all the usual embellishments. We pass numerous little villages, with quaint old churches, nestling in the most bewitchingly beautiful valleys. It is a saint's day of some sort, and the peasants are all out in their holiday attire. Processions, with rustic music, are passing along the lake-side roads, and the church bells, which are kept almost constantly ringing, send out their sweet tones across the water, inviting all to prayer and praise. One interesting feature of the scene is the cottages of the shepherds far up the mountain sides, above the vineyards and olive groves. The shepherds and herdsmen look like pigmies as they move about, while an occasional shout or blast from a horn which reaches us seems to come from the clouds as it floats down to the surface of the lake, or echoes among the neighboring peaks.

Deep gorges, charming waterfalls, dizzy heights overhanging our course, quiet little bays hidden away around projecting points, and constantly varying views of the lake itself, as it winds to the right and left among the mountains, make up the programme for the day—a day of perfect enjoyment—a day never to be forgotten. The "season" has fairly commenced, and the numerous hotels, with their attractive grounds, are already well filled. As we approached the northern extremity of the lake, the higher Alps towered up before us like a mighty wall to bar our further progress. Monte Rosa, grand and white, was most conspicuous, and the effect of the full sunlight upon its lofty crest was most magnificent. On our return to the foot of the lake, a fatiguing climb of a few hours enabled us to reach the summit of Monte Crocione, from which we enjoyed a sublime view of the Bernese Alps and Mont Blanc.

Take it all in all, the Lake of Como has not been overrated. It is more like our own Lake George than any body of water I have yet seen, although it lacks the numerous islands and the wildness of the primeval forest. With the exception of the transparent blue of its deep waters, it reminds me of the winding river Min below the city of Foo-Choo in China; and yet it can scarcely be compared with either of the above famous waters. While art has done so much for the shores of the Lake of Como, and its mountain peaks are almost unequalled in sublimity, still to me it is not so beautiful as Lake George; and, indeed, in all my wanderings, I have yet to look upon the spot that, in either loveliness or grandeur, can surpass the scenery of my native land.

A HERO IN A GOOD CAUSE.

FROM THE "PORTLAND TRANSCRIPT," BY ELIZABETH AKERS ALLEN.

"He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small,
For the great God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all."

WHEN a man labors earnestly for the benefit of persons less happily circumstanced than himself, not necessarily by giving them money outright, which is not always judicious charity, but perhaps by building tidy and comfortable houses which they can rent, instead of living in unclean, unwholesome and dilapidated tenements—perhaps by providing some cheap amusement which may be within the reach of the humblest plodder; in cases like this, even when the kind-hearted originator of the plan actually recovers his outlay, really losing nothing, possibly gaining something in a financial way by his transaction, we do not hesitate to call him a philanthropist—to say that he has done a good work for humanity, and to honor him accordingly.

And when, as rarely happens, he labors in the cause of humanity without plan or hope of recompense—when he gives his time, his strength, his money and his sympathy to suffering human being, as did Elizabeth Gurney Fry and John Howard, we have hardly words to express our admiration and reverence for greatness of soul so unusual, for tenderness and zeal so ardent and self-sacrificing. We do not hesitate to say that he is entirely disinterested—that he works for others with no thought of self-aggrandizement or reward—that his labor is without money and without price. And yet Elizabeth Fry and John Howard, like all other kind and gentle-natured persons who, as benefactors and friends, come in direct contact with unfortunate and oppressed humanity, did receive the sweetest of all earthly compensations for their labors of love; the thanks and gratitude of thousands of human hearts which their kind ministrations, their unselfish devotion, had touched and softened. If he is a benefactor to the human race who makes two spears of grass grow where one grew before, how much more a benefactor is he who wins from the arid and unfruitful soil of human hearts, parched by neglect and hardened by crime, the sweet and healing growth of fragrant gratitude and tender remembrance? And he who achieves this has, even in this life, his reward—the eager thankfulness of those for whom he has labored and suffered, and the repaying love which not only sweetens all his days, but, after his generous heart has mouldered into dust, keeps his memory fragrant among men forevermore.

But if we accord the qualities of unselfish generosity, disinterested kindness and real tenderness of heart to those who receive for their good deeds the reward of popularity, or praise, or the spontaneous gratitude of even the lowest of the human race—for all these are recompense, and desirable, and labored for by many—what name shall we find, what noun or adjective shall we bring to describe fitly a man who, not for popularity, not for praise, not for gratitude, deliberately takes up and makes his own the cause of helpless, oppressed and abused creatures, which not only cannot be grateful to him for the merciful work which he does for them, but which, alas, do not even know that he helps, and saves, and protects them?

Not for popularity, for his harvest has been contempt and ridicule; not for praise, for his reward has been misrepresentation and abuse; not for gratitude, for the suffering horse which he protects from an inhuman driver, or the tortured dog which he rescues from cruel boys, does not in the least distinguish him from its persecutors. This man, who deserves doubly, if any man on earth can deserve, the name of hero—is Henry Bergh.

This man, who has been alternately ridiculed as a mischievous fanatic, sneered at as a mild imbecile, persecuted as a determined trespasser on other men's rights, and held up to public scorn as a for-cigner who, unable to achieve notoriety in any better way, conceived the idea of making capital out of the alleged inhumanity of the American people—was born in New York, perhaps fifty years ago. Any man of ordinary penetration, seeing him and conversing with him, would be sure that Mr. Bergh has no especial need to search out any novel means of distinguishing himself from the common herd. Tall and majestic, with a face whose gravity is almost melancholy, excepting when infrequently it is illuminated and beautified by the sweetest, kindest smile in the world, he impresses the most casual observer as a man of rare presence and dignity—and the slightest acquaintance or conversation with him reveals gentle breeding and wide culture. His sterling sincerity, earnestness and perfect freedom from self-seeking, are evident in his whole manner, speech and bearing, inasmuch that persons who soberly consider him “a little fanatical” are willing enough to admit the strength, nobleness and kindness of his nature.

So far is this man from having taken up his work from a thirst for notoriety, as some of the New York papers would have us believe, that he resigned for it an honorable position that hinted at much more brilliant possibilities in the way of worldly honors than he will ever achieve as the champion of the oppressed brute creation. He was at one time secretary of legation to Russia, and afterwards consul at St. Petersburg, and he received unusual marks of honor from the Russian government. During the visit of the son of the czar to this country, a few years since, he took occasion to express his consideration and respect for the founder and president of the most humane of societies.

Mr. Bergh is no “dilettante, delicate-handed priest” of sentimentalism, preaching afar off against an evil which he will not approach or soil his fingers with. In the very beginning, he bequeathed to his society property which was earning an annual income of seven thousand dollars, thus proving at once his thorough sincerity and his generous liberality—for many a man will give his voice, his influence, even a part of his time and labor, to a worthy cause, when his heart is not sufficiently affected to involve his pocket. The amount of hard and distasteful work which he has done in the service of dumb creatures can hardly be computed. In the streets amid insolence and violence, in dirty slums among the most dangerous classes of New York, in dens devoted to dog-fighting and cock-fighting, in stock-yards, in swill-milk pens, and in loathsome slaughter-houses, he has spent hours and days, shocked and sickened by scenes of disgusting cruelty, needless torture, revolting brutality and the previously unpitied and unmitigated suffering of the poor creatures which have too long been considered as having no rights which human beings are bound to respect. Now that the attention of the public has been aroused, and the society in New York has gained power and influence, and has the strong arm of the law behind it, as a supporter and enforcer of its principles, much of this unpleasant drudgery may safely be trusted to other hands. But it is not even now an unusual sight in the busier streets of the city, to see a noticeably tall gentleman, with a grave and, under such circumstances, somewhat severe countenance, step suddenly from the curb-stone, and seizing a lame, over-loaded, diseased or half-crippled horse by the head, sternly command the angry driver to dismount, and send the suffering animal to the stable. The driver himself is promptly arrested and fined.

The continual recurrence of these and similar scenes, has made the name of Mr. Bergh, and the society of which he is the head and front, a positive and salutary terror to evildoers. In the absence of any better motive for the merciful treatment of the helpless animals under their charge, this dread which Mr. Bergh and his agents inspire in the souls of savage and unfeeling men, has an excellent effect. How pleasant it would be if all the poor dumb creatures which his influence has helped and benefitted, could know to whom they are indebted, and how earnestly and self-forgetfully he has labored in their interests! "Before undertaking this labor," he wrote not long ago, "I took a careful survey of all the consequences to me personally—and I recognized the fact that I should be much abused and ridiculed, and hence it was necessary for me to forget myself completely." But of one thing more Mr. Bergh may also be sure, that however generously he may forget himself, there are thousands of gentle and appreciative hearts which will not forget him, nor cease to honor him: and in many a household of

THE MOTHER OF THE NAPOLEONS.

BY MARION KNIGHT.

THE mother of Napoleon I. was the worthy mother of such a son. Letitia Ramolini was born at Ajaccio in Corsica, on the 24th of August, 1750, and died at Rome, February 2d, 1836, aged eighty-six. The Ramolinis were descended from the counts of Colalto, an ancient Italian family who, several generations previous, had settled in Ajaccio.

At the age of fifteen, Letitia married Carlo Bonaparte, whose family held a high rank in Corsica. Some of the Bonapartes were distinguished in literature and learning; others for legal and political ability. The armorial bearings of some of the family of Bonaparte are still found sculptured in marble on several Florentine buildings; and tender souls, his name is cherished, and the shadow of his kind and sensitive face pointed out by little children as "the dear, kind Mr. Bergh who takes care of the poor dumb creatures which cannot cry or speak when they are abused." Surely, not the least of his worthy achievements is the good effect of his character and example on the minds of the rising generation. Boys are proverbially cruel; but it is to be charitably hoped that their cruelty is generally the result of either thoughtlessness or imitation. And it would be well if every mother in the land, instead of drawing the attention of her sons to the example of a successful politician, or a self-made millionaire, would place before them as an example, the earnest benevolence, persistence in well-doing, and disinterested tenderness of heart of the patient and faithful founder and president of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

when Napoleon himself entered Bologna in 1796, the Senate sent him their "Golden Book," in which the names and arms of his family were inscribed.

Though the family on each side were of equally good stock, of the married pair the wife seemed the superior in strength of character. At least she has left the strongest mark on history. Napoleon himself says of her: "She had the head of a man on the shoulders of a woman. Left without a guide or protector, she was obliged to assume the management of affairs—but the burden did not overcome her. She administered everything with a degree of sagacity not to be expected from her age or sex. Her tenderness was joined with severity. She punished, rewarded all alike; the good, the bad, none escaped her. Losses, privations, fatigue, had no effect upon her; she endured all, braved all. Ah! what a woman! where look for her equal?"

Signora Letitia was a woman of extraordinary beauty, traces of which remained with her, in spite of the vicissitudes of her life which wore upon her spirit, up to the day of her death.

Napoleon was her second son, born in the midst of camp life, and the trials, privations and dangers incident upon a civil war. During this war the brave lady shared the fortunes of her husband, accompanying him on horseback on his expeditions, and sharing his retreat and its attendant hardships among the mountains. In this manner the mother moulded the character of the future statesman and warrior.

Signora Letitia was left a widow at the age of thirty-four, having been the mother of thirteen children, eight of whom survived their father. "Left a widow at an early age," says Madame Junot, "in a country where the head of a family is everything, the young mother found it necessary to call up all the energy of her character." The Duchess d'Albrantes says of her: "Her soul beamed in her looks, and it was a soul full of the loftiest sentiments. Her haughtiness, which was not offensive, became dignity, when elevated to her new situation. She was kind at heart, but of a cold exterior; and at the period of which I speak she was very scrupulous of exacting from everybody what she considered her due. She was a good mother. Her children treated her with every respect, and showed her assiduous attention. Lucien and Joseph were particularly attached to her."

The young widow devoted herself to the care of her family, being reduced, by political events, almost to poverty. Joseph, her eldest son, now nearly eighteen years of age, gave her his assistance. Napoleon was pursuing his military studies in France.

In 1793, there were internal political disturbances in Corsica, and Letitia taking a stand in favor of France against the rebels, found herself in immediate personal danger, from which she only escaped by a detachment of loyal troops escorting her and her family by night to the sea-shore, where they were received on board a French frigate, where she found her two sons, Joseph and Napoleon. An incident which occurred when they were flying from their enemies, illustrates in a fine manner the character of the woman. Turning in their flight, after day had broken, they discovered dense columns of flame rising from the town they had so lately quitted.

"That is your house now burning," said one to Letitia.

"Ah! never mind," she replied, "we will build it up again much better. Vive la France!"

France was now in all the turmoil of revolution, and Madame Bonaparte and her family found a dubious haven of safety in Marseilles, where they were glad to receive the rations of bread distributed by the municipality to refugee patriots. Joseph and Napoleon also contributed to their support from their meagre pay in the military service. Before the close of the year, however, Napoleon was promoted to the rank of general of brigade, and was stationed at Nice, when his mother and her family established themselves at the Chateau Salle, near Antillees, a few miles from Napoleon's headquarters.

Napoleon's marriage with Josephine occurred in 1796, about which time he was appointed to the command of the army of Italy. He at once evinced his filial affection by assigning to his mother a portion of his income, which raised her to a condition of independence and comfort. Louis having entered the army, Jerome was now the only son remaining at home, and her eldest daughter, Eliza, was married in 1797. In 1799, she removed to Paris and took up her abode with Joseph.

When the revolution of the 9th of November (18th Brumaire,) took place, the events of those momentous days greatly concerned Signora Letitia and her family. The Duchess d'Albrantes thus describes a visit to her when the extreme danger was past: "She appeared calm, though far from being easy; for her extreme paleness and the convulsive movement she evinced whenever an unexpected noise met her ear, gave her features a ghostly air. In these moments she appeared to me truly like the mother of the Gracchi. She had three sons under the stroke of fate, one of whom would probably receive the blow, even if the others escaped. This she felt most forcibly. My mother and myself remained with her a part of that tantalizing day, and only quitted her on the restoration of her confidence by Lucien's messengers, who were frequently sent to calm her disquiet. The danger to which the Bonaparte family was exposed might have been even imminent on the night of the 18th or 19th. If the Directory and the Councils had triumphed, all Bonaparte's brothers would have followed him to the scaffold; and their friends and partisans would have been exiled, to say the least." But this time of danger passed by and left them untouched.

While Napoleon was at the head of the consular government, his mother lived in the greatest retirement in Paris. She was a woman naturally prudent, and the trials through which she had passed had taught her still farther habits of economy. She had little affection for Josephine, Napoleon's wife, by far preferring the society of the wives of Joseph and Lucien. When the latter son quarrelled with Napoleon, she followed him to Rome, in 1805, much to the chagrin of Napoleon, who accused her of undue partiality to Lucien; to which she answered that an unfortunate son would always be the most dear to her. The truth of this she afterward verified by her devotion to Napoleon himself when he was in misfortune and exile.

When Napoleon became emperor, he gave her the title of Madame Mère, equivalent to that of Empress Mother, and settled an income of a million francs (two hundred thousand dollars) upon her. She took up her residence in a fine mansion, but lived plainly and unostentatiously, preferring to let the surplus of her income accumulate against the day of misfortune, which with clear vision she foresaw in the future.

At the political disturbance which, in 1814, sent her son into exile in Elba, she accompanied the Empress Maria Louisa and her court to Blois, and here her prudence and foresight stood her in good stead. By the treaty of Paris of 1814, she was allowed to retain her title and an annuity of two hundred thousand francs.

After Napoleon returned from Elba, the Madame Mère retired to Rome, where she resided until her death. When Napoleon was overthrown at Waterloo, she sent word to him that "her whole fortune was at her son's disposal."

Napoleon, at St. Helena, said of her: "And for me she would, without a murmur, have doomed herself to live on black bread. Loftiness of sentiment still reigned paramount in her breast. Pride and noble ambition were not subdued by avarice."

In October, 1818, she addressed the following appeal to the allied sovereigns assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle:

"Sirs, I am a mother, and my son's life is dearer to me than my own. In the name of Him whose essence is goodness, and of whom your imperial and royal majesties are the image, I entreat you to put a period to his misery, and to restore him to liberty. For this I implore God, and I implore you who are his viceroyants on earth. Reasons of state have their limits, and posterity, which gives immortality, adores above all things the generosity of conquerors."

Madame Bonaparte lived with her brother, Cardinal Fesch, in the Palazzo Falconieri, which was handsomely furnished, and with more attention to comfort than is common in Italy.

She died as she had lived, in the Catholic faith, and was buried at Rome.

We give at the head of this article a representation of Canova's beautiful statue of Madame Bonaparte, now in the Art Gallery of Chatsworth, the elegant residence of the Duke of Devonshire.

JUSTUS VON LIEBIG.

BY E. I. N. SAMMLER.

DEVOTION to scientific truth, with a broad and noble utility as its aim, is, as has been well remarked, the highest trait of modern character. As affording in his life and labors a brilliant example of this devotion, we know of few men more worthy of being brought into prominent notice than the one whose name stands at the head of this article. To his bold and original speculations and researches, particularly in the field of agricultural chemistry, the utilitarian science of our day is vastly indebted. The branches of science to which he more especially devoted himself—organic and agricultural chemistry—he found mere infants, as it were; when he rested, at length, from his labors, he might have boasted that, under his tutelage, they had grown up to a full, vigorous and wonderfully fruitful maturity.

Justus von Liebig was born at Darmstadt, in Germany, on the 12th of May, 1803. He received his primary education in the gymnasium of his native town, and, after serving nearly a year as an apothecary's apprentice, in 1819 entered the University of Bonn. Subsequently he went to Erlangen, where, at the age of nineteen, he obtained his doctor's degree. Immediately after graduating he was sent, by the grand duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, to Paris, where he spent two years in the study of chemistry.

In 1824—he was then just twenty-one—the young chemist read a paper before the French Institute on the chemical composition of the fulminates, compounds of a base with the unstable fulminic acid. This paper attracted the attention of Humboldt, who, struck by the rare ability which the writer had displayed in the treatment of a question so intricate, obtained for him an appointment as adjunct professor of chemistry at Giersen. Two years later, he was made titular professor, and immediately proceeded to establish a laboratory for teaching practical chemistry. This was the first establishment of its kind in Germany. It soon became celebrated, and students flocked to it from all parts of Europe, and also from our own side of the Atlantic.

In 1838, Professor Liebig visited England and read, before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, a paper on lithic acid, announcing the startling discovery by his colleague, Woehler, of a method by which urea might be made artificially. This was, to scientific men, a fact of exceeding interest. The first successful step in a new direction of research—that of chemical synthesis—it was in the nature of an assurance that the composition of those intricate compounds, hitherto thought to be capable of elaboration only under the influence of the mysterious forces of life, would hereafter be better understood. It led also to brilliant anticipations of a time when science would be able to comprehend and to explain the processes going on in living organisms.

The British association was so profoundly and so favorably impressed by this paper, that its author was requested to draw up two reports upon organic chemistry. In conformity with this request, Liebig, in 1840, published his first considerable work—"Chemistry in its Application to Agriculture and Physiology." This work found many readers in Germany, and an English translation of it was no less widely circulated. Though many of the theories advanced in it have failed to receive general sanction, and some have even been abandoned by their author, it nevertheless contained much profound and original speculation, throwing a flood of new light upon the subjects of which it treats. The impulse it gave to the study of organic chemistry was strong and marked. Modern agricultural chemistry may almost be said to have been created by it. Following it, and continuing the same investigations, came a volume of "Familiar Letters on Chemistry and its Relations to Commerce, Physiology and Agriculture." These letters, as Liebig himself tells us, led to the establishment of new professorships in two celebrated German universities, for the express purpose of facilitating the application of chemical truths to the practical arts of life.

In June, 1842, appeared his second report. It was entitled "Animal Chemistry, or Chemistry in its Application to Physiology and Pathology." Translated into English from the author's manuscript, it reached a third edition in 1846. As in the first report, some theories were advanced which subsequent investigations have not sanctioned.

Great practical good, however, has resulted from it, especially as it speedily led to a better appreciation of the nature and proper application of medicines and food.

Besides the works already mentioned, Professor Liebig wrote many others of more or less importance, mostly bearing upon the practical application of chemistry to agriculture. An indefatigable experimenter, as well as a copious writer, he main-grand duke of Hesse-Darmstadt. Professorships were offered him in England, at Heidelberg, Vienna and other places. He remained at Giessen, however, till 1852, when he accepted the chair of chemistry in the University of Munich, which he retained till the close of his life. He died at Munich, Bavaria, on the 18th of April, 1873, aged seventy years.

"Baron Liebig," says Professor Youmans, "was, tained to the close of his life that ardent and enthusiastic spirit of research, which, while it oftentimes may have carried him further than was consonant with cool judgment, nevertheless quite as frequently led up to discoveries of the greatest practical importance.

Many honors were conferred upon Liebig by learned societies, public institutions and individuals. In 1845, he was made a baron by the in the broadest sense, a philosophical chemist. Since Berzelius, no savant has appeared in the chemical field who has achieved so brilliant and conspicuous a position. He had, in an eminent degree, the traits of a successful pioneer in the world of thought. He was a man of impulse, sympathy and enthusiasm, as well as of intellect. Though trained to the strict methods of investigation, and competent to bend his energies to specific research, yet his manly interest in his fellow-beings, and the welfare and progress of society, determined the course of his studies, and led him constantly to the development of large practical results. When he began with organic chemistry, the mystery of the vital forces reigned supreme, and barred the way to true inductive investigation. So also with agricultural chemistry. Davy had originated the name early in the century, and presented some of its elementary facts; but they did not reach to practical results, and amounted to nothing in their influence upon the public. The work of Liebig was nothing less than to erect both these sciences into recognized branches of study, to direct the scientific thought of his age to these fields of inquiry, and to arouse the interest of the public in their practical applications. This great work it is his lasting honor to have accomplished."

FIFTY YEARS AGO; OR, THE CABINS OF THE WEST.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

No. 1.

I OFTEN stand there. I always liked to loiter on the sites of the old cabin homes of long, long ago. I like to place my feet on the heap of worn hearthstones, and dream among the ruins of the home where once privation came like a prowling wolf showing his teeth. And not a bristling nettle or thistle would I tread down; not one broad leaf of the riotous burdock would I displace; not a clinging lichen would I loosen from the humid stone over which it creeps like a luxuriant embroidery, for Nature, loving mother, tenderly wraps in this beautiful drapery the decay that else would be unsightly. Her touch makes sanctity and beauty.

I know the whole story, and it all came up before me yesterday as I stood on the old hearthstones on the site of the cabin home of Kitty Somers. Poor Kitty! She married Job Somers when she was seventeen years old, and they moved into the little fourteen by sixteen log-cabin down by the creek, on the Gardiner place, the third day after the wedding. How like little beavers did Job and Kitty work, and plan, and manage! They only had three chairs, splint-bottomed, and not a tint of paint about them; but that only gave Kitty a good chance to polish them with soap and white sand. They had no cupboard, or dresser, as they were called in those days; but Job, brave-hearted little husband that he was, owned a good axe, and there was the grand old woods handy to the house, and all out-doors was his workshop. Why, any man with an axe and an augur and plenty of timber, could go to work and make furniture, or a good substitute. Job made a bedstead by boring holes into the log wall of his cabin, fitting poles into them and into outer posts which stood firmly on the puncheon floor, and then weaving strips of bark across for a bed-cord. The shelves of the dresser were made of split clap-boards laid on wooden pins that were driven into holes in the wall. A substitute for chairs were rude little benches three or four feet long standing on four legs. Glass could not be obtained within forty miles, and window-sash not at all; but greased paper pasted on to the rudely-contrived sash was a very good substitute for glass.

Princess Kitty! she owned a little wheel and a reel—and in those early days a poor woman was regarded as peculiarly fortunate if she was the owner of this valuable acquisition to the humble home. Oh, their prospects were bright! For hadn't they a straw bed, and an iron pot and spider, and a heifer calf? And wasn't the flax crop full of promise? Kitty rubbed her little brown hands together, and thought how rich they were; and in the dim distance she saw Job and herself living on a farm of their own, and eating wheat bread, and owning sheep, and cows, and pigs, and geese.

And so the little pair worked on. The chills shook them, and they drank boneset tea, and looked in each other's eyes, and had faith to believe it was the best medicine in the world. They ate bread made of sick wheat, and turned away from it and partook of the honest little "corn dodgers" that never deceived them. They drank coffee made of browned wheat, and helped themselves bountifully to the stewed pumpkin that occupied its place regularly three times a day on the table. They gathered butternuts and hazelnuts, and dried wild plums, and cherries; and while Job worked in the clearing, and grubbed saplings, and cut down big trees, and burnt brush, Kitty scutched flax, and hatched and spun it, and knit to pay for the weaving of the brown linen webs.

Those were blessed days; and they were happy in the enjoyment of the summers and winters that lengthened out into years.

A baby came to them—a little, golden-haired, blue-eyed daughter—and then their joy seemed complete. But a cloud no bigger than a man's hand was in their sky; Job saw it not; but Kitty's keen eye detected it. Alas, alas, that clouds must come!

Wes Kingsley and Ben Morrison had been friends of Job Somers in his boyhood. They had been working on the canal, and when they came home they brought bad habits with them. Both were addicted to card playing and drinking, and before Job was aware of it his old-time friends had brought him under their influence. From the very first evening when they brought out their cards, Kitty shook her head and said: "Boys, I do not like such amusement; it is not safe. I wish you would not bring cards here. I do not want my husband to touch them."

"No more har-rum in keards than there is in yer windin' that flax o' yourn on the distaff," said Ben Morrison.

"Looks like as if you was afeard to trust your man to play a game," said the other, sneering at her with a wicked look out from under his bushy eyebrows.

"Kitty can trust me; can't you, little wifey?" said Job, patting her under the chin.

"Yes, Job; but then—" and she leaned her face down on the baby's head to hide her emotion.

When they were alone, Job would make good promises, and say he would do anything to please her; but afterwards he grew weary of her importunate entreaties, and many a night the poor wife cried herself to sleep while the three men were boisterous over their cards. 'Squire Gardiner, a shrewd, intelligent New Englander, was often one of the party, and at last it was no uncommon thing for the young wife to be awakened after the hour of midnight by their yells of laughter. Her bed was in the same room, for in those early days a fourteen by sixteen room was considered large enough for one family to live in—eating, sleeping and working in the one apartment.

Mr. Gardiner owned a still-house, and gave employment to poor men who were willing to be his tools. Sometimes in those days men could be found who were anxious and glad to work in a distillery for their boarding and all they could drink. Very precious in the sight of such was the little mug or glass cup tied by a leather string. No dainty satin ribbon ever worn by fair lady was smoother than this same well-worn, oft-handled leather string.

From playing cards, Job Somers went down the next step, which was drinking, and then gradually lower down, until he was considered the best distiller in his township.

And Kitty? No words of hers were of avail when her husband was once in the power of a shrewd man like 'Squire Gardiner. He seemed to delight in annoying Job's wife; a gleam was in his eye, and a smile lurked about his mouth, and when he looked at her the expression of his face, to her, seemed to say, "the tigress!"

So, while Job worked in the still-house down in the hollow, poor Kitty, thin-faced and wild-eyed, spun and wove, and made sheets and table linen and wearing apparel. Job slept at home and ate his three meals a day there, but the beautiful and sacred relation of husband and wife was broken. Kitty, white-faced and still, worked from early dawn until late at night. The sound of the clanging loom could be heard, and the buzzing of the spinning-wheel, while only a quarter of a mile away up rose among the green trees the steamy smoke from the chimney of the seething still-house, where Job, with senses blunted, plodded on mechanically in the employment of a designing man.

Where was the sweet dream of their young wedded years—the hope of owning a home of their own, and with it all the comforts and necessities of life? Gone now, and in its stead was a hopeless, sad out-look upon a desolate waste.

They had three children—two girls and a boy. One day the little girls took the baby out on the green bank above the spring to play, while their mother was warping a web of linen. The warping-bars and the spools of thread so completely filled the cabin that there was no room left for the children in the house. Kitty talked to herself as she worked. Round and round creaked the warping-bars; now Kitty stooped and looped the gathered threads in her hand upon the pins that secured the web; then round and round went the bars, her quick eye following every motion and every turning spool; then she stood on tiptoe, and picking the threads, now up, now down, from off her deft thumb and fingers, she looped them on the pins of the bars above her head, and, resting her hand on her side wearily, she looked in a dreamy way from the open door.

"I could curse you, 'Squire Gardiner!" she hissed, after a moment's pause, her face lighting up, and her brown eyes glaring and glittering. "You knew better; you wanted to madden me and to ruin my husband and to make a tool of him!" and she cried out and stamped her little bare foot as the object of her wrath was seen, a few rods away in an opening of the wild wood, riding leisurely along on a beautiful horse with waving mane tossing in the summer air.

Just then the two little girls came bounding into the house.

"Where is Harry?" said the mother. "You should not leave him a minute."

"Why, we were playing in the brook, and he was on the grass, and then when we went back he was gone—and—and we thought you had—"

Down dropped the carefully-held flaxen threads, and the mother cried out: "Were you near the spring?"

Not waiting only until the faltering "yes" fell from the child's lips, Kitty flew to the wide-branching beech-tree, from whose gnarled roots purled a beautiful spring. Down the green bank she sprang at a leap, and never, never, from that awful moment until the day of her death, did the scene fade from her sight! The pallid face of her beloved babe, stark and cold, stared with wide-open eyes at her from the pebbly bottom of that treacherous spring. Dead! dead! With a piercing shriek, like unto nothing that the surrounding hills had ever heard or echoed she bent over and lifted the dripping form of her darling from the crystal grave that had snatched him from her in a moment of time. Then clutching the precious form to her warm bosom, she ran down the wild-wood path toward the still-house in the hollow. Her feet flew down the hill, across the ravine, through the nodding brakes, and over the interlacing grape-vines that lay in the well-worn path, then she leaped adown the viny bank and over the stony brook that ran with a pleasant murmur of rippling sounds from under the loud-breathing distillery.

Just as she planted her feet, with a bound, upon the heavy log sill at the door, Job was putting down the little drinking cup and drawing his linen shirt sleeve across his moistened lips in a satisfied manner.

Poor Kitty! with her precious burden hugged closely in her arms, she sank upon the damp, earthen floor—sank down softly, and—most blessed provision of nature—her over-taxed nervous system gave way and she fainted.

The beautiful steed of 'Squire Gardiner was that moment hitched to a stake at the other door of the low, steaming still-house, and tipping his hat back, he entered and was coming around to where Job was when this tragic scene transpired. He saw Kitty sink down with something gathered closely to her bosom—he saw Job throw his arms above his head, and then groan and press his horny hands over his face, and fall upon his knees.

The dear little baby! its scant linen frock clung closely to its plump form, its waxen hands were outspread, its yellow-white hair washed back from its pretty forehead, and, oh, its beautiful eyes stared wide open with no laughter, or joy, or sparkle in them! It was a sight never to be erased from the memory of those two men.

Job wrung his hands in his distress, and called upon the name of God, and his wails were exceedingly bitter and full of sorrow. They loosed the child from the relaxing arms of the insensible mother, and Mr. Gardiner applied means of restoration, but it was in vain. It was cold in death and gone far out from the reach of all restoratives. When Kitty came to consciousness, she snatched her babe from the hands of the man who had been the means of winning her husband away from the good habits of his young manhood.

"I despise you, sir," she said, with an agony of grief too deep and too bitter for tears or for reason. "Touch not my darling with your polluted hands," and she tore the babe from his arms and gathered it to her breast and crooned soft words of endearment over it. "You poisoned my husband and by your wiles you took him from me, but my babe you shall never touch again! Only for you, and we might have had a home of our own instead of being tools and toys for you. My blessed angel boy! he is beyond the reach of your snares, he is safe—my darling, my darling! mamma's baby once, but an angel now," and she laughed wildly and pressed the tip of her toil-stained forefinger softly in the rare dimples in cheeks and chin, then she rained her eager kisses upon the cold, white face of the babe upon her bosom.

The blacksmith at the corners came along, and wrapping his jacket tenderly around the dead body, carried it softly in his arms back to the house. Job supported his wife and Mr. Gardiner went to tell the neighbors of the sad event. Weeping women came, and they carefully set aside the half-warped web and spools and bars, and by the sweetest and kindest sympathy they strove to soothe the afflicted household.

The white dimity petticoat that Kitty wore on her wedding-day was cut up and made into a shroud for the baby. And the string of beads that Kitty's grandmother had given her, years and years before, she took off and tied round its pretty white neck. It seemed that everything of worldly value she had, she longed to bestow upon the dead baby, so soon to be hidden from her sight in the garden grave that awaited it.

It is not uncommon in seasons of intense grief to see bereft ones turn angrily and with stony face, and reproach God for the sorrow that has come upon them. How often they retort by saying, "He is cruel; He is not kind! I did not deserve this sore chastening. I who have endeavored to keep His law, who have acknowledged Him in everything, I have not merited this bitter woe; it is unjust;" and to such the gracious influences of prayer come not, the heavens are as brass, and the earth an arid desert, and the Father who loveth with a divine love, surpassing all other loves, is as one heartless, unloving, cold and cruel. All reproaches, and all bitter thoughts of Kitty turned toward Mr. Gardiner; she could not bear him in her sight. Whenever she thought of her baby, dead, snatched away suddenly and in the bloom of a sweet babyhood, the second thought was one of hatred directed to this man.

He had been the means of luring her husband away from steady habits and good principles, it is true; there are men whose sensibilities are so dull that they see no further good in another only so far as they can make them subservient to their own ends and purposes, and 'Squire Gardiner was one of those. His boyhood's training had been unfortunate, he had been left an orphan at an early age, and had been brought up by a niggardly, grasping, old uncle who cared only for acres and dollars out on interest.

So, the years went on, and the old "grind of toil" was the same. Job went back to his low life in the still-house, after his grief and good promises had faded away, as the morning dew is exhaled. His face grew red and bloated, and his hands unsteady, and his blue eyes, once frank and clear, grew dim, and bleak, and expressionless. How could it be otherwise? What good thoughts could come to him, like visiting angels, when his employment, day after day, was distilling, keeping up the right temperature, trading whisky for grain, compounding messes in the huge tubs, taking care of sacks of corn, measuring and keeping account of gallons, quarts, pints and gills, making sharp bargains with poor men and boys whose desire for the draught was a burning thirst like unto a consuming fire, and in keeping the books, the poor, paltry pages soiled, and stained, and scrawled over by the dry stub of a pen that lay beside the ink-horn on the head of a musty barrel a-near the window-hole. How could the face of Job Somers grow noble, and strong, and beautiful, with only this, the chisel of the destroyer at work upon it day after day and year after year? How could it?

One day, Kitty and her little girls were out gathering berries, when suddenly they came upon 'Squire Gardiner, Job Somers, Morrison and Kingsley, sitting in a shaded ravine, engaged in earnest consultation. The 'squire's hat lay beside him with some papers in it, while a heavy cotton handkerchief was carefully rolled up with something inside.

They all looked startled, but the 'squire pushed his hair back off his fine forehead and spoke as though continuing the conversation; "no, I think it should be seeded down in clover, and then another year it would do if you chose to—" and this was all that Kitty heard.

That night Job left home immediately after supper, and did not return until after the hour of midnight. The next night he said he must work in the still-house, and for her not to sit up and wait for him. He seemed absent-minded and a change had come over him.

At the expiration of six months Job was another man. He drank as usual, in moderation, but he seemed kinder and he began to care more for his appearance, and it was no uncommon thing now for Job to bring home presents of new dresses, a quarter of tea, a pound of coffee, a paper of pins and things that before they could not afford. When Kitty said: "How can we afford these comforts and luxuries, are your wages so much better?" Job invariably replied, that good times were coming, that poor people ought to have a chance to live. But Kitty was not satisfied. More than once had she seen strange men about, keen-eyed, sharp-looking men, who did not appear like those who toiled in the clearings, or cut roads, or worked in distilleries. Job was oftener at the house of 'Squire Gardiner than usual; he was away from home more than he ever had been before; he was thoughtful, morose, sighed, and drew his hands across his face in an absent way. Somehow Kitty connected all this change and 'Squire Gardiner together—he was her aversion, her fear, her dread.

There was a cave in among the hills on a tract of wild land joining the 'squire's farm. At the time of which we write, it had never been discovered by those residing in the neighborhood, and was known only to four men, and these were the four that Kitty saw sitting in the deep ravine. The cave was in a solitary, wild and romantic spot. Tall trees covered the ground, while underneath the tangled underbrush grew thick and dense. Wild rose bushes, and sweet briars, and tangled vines, seemed to render the nook inaccessible to the foot of man. Grape-vines clambered up the giant oaks, and ran in wild profusion among the topmost branches. A lover of nature in her wildest moods would have been enchanted with the beauty and luxuriance heaped together in such rich exuberance. Who would have dreamed that the scheming, plotting brain of man would so prostitute the charms and secrecy of this secluded spot? Did I say the foot of man had never penetrated these sylvan recesses? By stooping down, and by creeping on one's knees, and by crawling like a snake, an entrance close to the ground had been made into that cave so charmingly hidden by the emerald glories of the summer.

The cave had been cleaned out, and only the rocky sides and floor and the jagged roof overhead were visible. Not a ray of light penetrated. A bear-skin was spread down for the three occupants to sit upon. A smooth plane of rock, green with mosses and lichen, was a resting-place for the elbow of the whispering speaker, and he was 'Squire Gardiner. Job and Morrison, with bated breaths, sat doubled up listening.

"We will have to be devilish careful, boys," said he; "it will be all day with us if the thing's known. Now when I was in Zanesville the other day disposing of some of it, they watched me pretty sharply, and I felt my knees shake under me, but I put on a brave face, and said I'd like to get rid of a little of my loose cash, that it was troublesome and heavy carrying so much of it about me. I pretended that I'd been over the mountains and got it of father. Now Beavers will be here before long, and then we'll try it again. That last run of dollars and half dollars don't quite suit me; they are too yellow; the color is not quite right yet; but Beavers will know how to arrange it better," and the 'squire leaned back in his small quarters and stroked his beard, and cleared his throat in as quiet a way as possible.

"Well," said Morrison, "I tried one of the dollars 'long side of a rale Simon Pure that little Polly Warrett wears round her neck on a ribbon, and I declare for it if I didn't think it wa'n't quite the right shade o' color—too yellar-like, I thought,"

"Well, for my part," said Job, "I couldn't see a mite o' difference. But I do wish Kitty, my wife, wasn't so oneasy. I'm afraid she will mistrust; an' her conscience is so tender-like, 'specially sence the baby died, that it is no easy matter to pacify her if she sets her mind on a thing."

"Devil take the women! say I," said the 'squire, threading his fingers through his beard in a quick, decided way. "Now my wife has no mind of her own; I can wind her round my hands like you would a hank of fine thread—whatever I think she thinks; whatever I say she says; and whatever I propose she agrees to it. If I were in league with Satan, she'd think it all right, and hurrah for me. That's the kind of a woman! I don't like your snivelling, plous, set-up women, who have wills of their own." Here he stopped short, thinking it proper to conciliate Job, and said: "Guess your wife, Job, is made of finer stuff than mine, though. Mine don't care for posies or pets, or any of these little pretty things, like Madame Kitty does; and somehow I kind of wished she did the other day when I saw your wife training her morning-glory-vines about the door and window, and coaxing the ivy to run up on the end of the house. Such things are kind of good and gentle, and make folks feel better, and the like," and the wily man sighed and pressed his hand on his forehead.

"Time we'd go, aint it?" said Job.

"Yes, s'pose it is," was the 'squire's reply; and then he looked in under some stones to see that the carefully-hidden tools and dies were safely out of sight. "Well, when Beavers comes we'll try it over again then," said he; "and we will meet in the old cabin in the woods, where we'll have a fair chance. I'll let you know more about it; and, boys, when you need any money let me know; but I swear you must be careful; it's a tricky business, and requires a fellow to keep both eyes open."

And so, one at a time, the three men crawled softly out of the hidden cave. The 'squire was the last one to leave it. A thick mat of wild roses grew at the low entrance; they had been laid over to one side; these he replaced as carefully as a tender mother would lightly lay the covering over the cradle of her babe. And in the gathering darkness the men separated and took different directions to their homes.

These were the first counterfeiters in this neighborhood in the far West fifty years ago. To be sure they were not the first in the newly-settled country, because counterfeiting was a regularly-organized business, even before that early date; this was a branch, and these were among the first workers in this iniquitous traffic. It was carried on by shrewd, designing men from the East—men who ranked intellectually far above the majority of the hardy pioneer settlers. Perhaps it is well that these old woodland haunts are dumb, yet living witnesses of such scenes as would thrill our hearts to-day, and startle us with terror to know that we tread upon ground sacred if not historic.

Beavers came as the squire had anticipated. The fine steed stood at the hitching-post behind the still-house in the hollow, as oft before, and Job was conversing in a low tone of voice with the 'squire, who appeared restless and uneasy, and started at every sound he heard.

"No, it's not an accursed business, either, Somers," said he, laying his hand on Job's shoulder; "just as good men as the sun shines on are engaged in it. Why should you or I toil like slaves when wealth and ease are within our reach? We have just as good a right to live well and easy as Judge Nillson or Captain Hickman, or even Parson Barkdoll—heh?" and he laughed, and let his voice come down to a whisper as he dwelt upon the last name with unctuous emphasis. "Tell you now, Job, we're bound to succeed, and may the Lord of battles help us. Beavers says he has the right stuff now; and he says the last batch was too deuced yellow; but we'll manage them now, halleluia!"

The old cabin in which the five counterfeiters met at midnight stood close to the banks of a clear, swift creek that rushed round curves and over rocks, and the waters broke into eddies and swirls, and the musical sounds were soothing and melodious. I always pause in passing that picturesque place, and I smile in spite of myself as I listen to the dash and ripple, and purl and swash of the beautiful waters.

Job was a little tardy that night, and the other four men were all there before he came. Kingsley and Morrison sat on a log, both poor, dull, kind-hearted men, so unselfish and so true that they made useful tools in the hands of the two leaders in this nefarious game. Beavers and the 'squire stood apart a little from the others.

"Is there any danger whatever to be apprehended, think you, in trying this experiment to-night?" said Beavers. Now I know so little comparatively of chemistry and the compounding of these different things, that I can't say that I am over-anxious to have a hand in it."

"I am not afraid, for my part," was the reply.

"I am sure I can't see that there could be any danger whatever. Putting this other stuff in cannot be dangerous, I am sure."

"We ought to understand more of chemistry and the nature of chemicals," said Beavers, slowly. "We work blindly, and our hands are fettered; but it is too late now to retract, for here comes our other man." And with stealthy step Job came creeping along among the willows and alders as softly as he could.

In less than one hour there was a fire, a dim light, a waiting crucible, and all the necessary materials on hand ready for action. Just before the compounds were put together, Beavers stepped to the door and passed out. The 'squire noticed the movement, and smiled grimly. Then he laid something out on a board that served for a table, said: "Now, boys, in about a half a minute you add this, shaking it gently all the time—but, jingo! seems to me the air is close in this place," and pushing back his hair he walked to the door and leisurely stepped outside. He did not stop to look up at the stars, or pause to listen to the musical murmur of the winding creek a-near the deserted cabin, but with a step as soft as a fox's he stole round to the side of the house, and, bending down, he peeped through between the old logs where the chinking was out. His eyes were as sharp as steel, and as glittering, and he muttered, "The coward!" thinking of Beavers's fears and his regard for his own safety.

The three men were bending over the crucible. Job was obeying orders; and barely had he poured in the untested compound, when an explosion took place—a puff, a crash, a noise that seemed to fill all space, and then all was dark and still. A groan came from the cabin; another groan from another corner; the sound of a man's feet fleeing from the place, a prolonged "Oh-h-h!" as though wrung from one full of pain and distress, and the 'squire with blanched face and trembling limbs came hurriedly to the assistance of his unfortunate tools. Job's eyes were badly burned, and the other men lay gasping for breath. They had all inhaled the poisonous vapor, and were suffering intensely.

"I had just stepped out, boys; I did not think of this. The Lord knows I'll sorrow over this till the day of my death! Who would have dreamed! It's a horrid bad business, my lads! Why what could have made it!" and such half-incoherent, broken utterances, fell from the lips of the 'squire as he walked from one to another of the scared, suffering men. "Life or death, boys, this thing must be kept quiet; that's the trouble now; if it gets out, the State's Prison is waiting for us all; and I'd rather die ten thousand deaths than go there," said the 'squire, in a low voice.

"Oh, yes! oh, yes!" groaned the three poor fellows in piteous unison. One of the men could walk; his breathing was impeded, his breast pained him; that was all, he said. The other had to be carried home; and Job, with his burnt eyes and singed, red face, swollen and painful, was an intense sufferer for many long weeks. His wife divined the secret, and only for Job's sake and the fair names of her little daughters she would have had the 'squire arrested immediately on suspicion.

When the neighbors inquired into Job's case, and saw his embarrassment and heard his equivocal answers, they shook their heads and pursed their lips, and gave an extra hitch to their yarn-knit "gallowases," and said: "'Pears like suthin' ort for be done."

'Squire Gardiner saw the sidewise nods of sundry heads, and he began to feel fear of the State's Prison, and one morning it was known far and near that "Old 'Squire Gardiner, he has gone away out to the Maumee country." No one knew just where, but they all knew that his sly move had saved his hair from being shingled by the authorities.

In less than two years he died in that agueish, miasmatic climate, and his last poor home-sick request was that his emaciated body be taken home for burial. It was brought here in a little, rickety, creaking wagon; and as death makes people kind of heart, forgiving, charitable and loving, so were all of those who came, far and near, to the strange funeral, in the dead of the dreary winter time.

All the old pioneers were laid in the south end of the village grave-yard in those days, and there they dug his grave, and after the frozen clumps were thrown in and rudely heaped up, men turned away with pity in their faces, and said: "Well, I've nothin' agin the 'squire," and they gee-hawed their oxen round among the stumps and logs, and men, women and children piled into the homeward bound sleds, and this was the last on earth of poor, misguided, dwarfed, blighted, lonely, dead 'Squire Gardiner. And all this happened fifty years ago, away back in the far-distant past, and I write this, and the hand that guides the pen and traces the sentences could probably hold all in its palm that to-day remains on earth of this man of evil deeds whose poor life was a bar, and a ban, and a blight upon the lives of others. God pity us all!

Morrison died a year after; the poisonous inhalation was death, a lingering, slow, painless pining away; a shortness of breath—general debility, the doctor called it, a genteel name to speak, and one that was, and is, broad enough to cover a multitude of sins. Poor fellow! At the foot of his grave, on the day of his burial, stood one in whose heart was festering the same secret that his dead associate had carried down into that wild-wood grave before him, Wes Kingsley. An old home-made slouch hat, contrived out of the skin of a raccoon with the ringed tail left on, was pulled down over his pallid forehead, his hands were thrust down deep into the pockets of his breeches, and he stood in a feeble, slinking way, as though his heart was broken and he cared for nothing that this earth held. In less than six months he followed his ill-starred comrade into that unknown land. He was so emaciated when he died that one man carried his body until the straggling procession had passed, single file, down the path that led from his cabin, through the thicket, into the laid road.

Job Somers lasted longer than either of the others. His eyesight was irreparably injured, but Kitty's skilful nursing and tender care were the means of adding more years to his blighted life. Under the influence of religion, Kitty Somers's disposition had grown tender, and serene, and gracious, her quick impulses had mellowed down into a sweet kindness of spirit, and she had grown into a very lovable woman. Before Job died he became an enthusiastic Methodist, and when he went down into the river of death it was not in fear and trembling, but with his soul filled with jubilant rejoicing.

Kitty lived to see the western wilderness blossom like the rose. One day, her grandsons, while out surveying some lands they had purchased, came upon the old cave that had once been the hiding-place of the counterfeiters. Some dies and tools were found in a tolerable state of preservation, but there was no one left to identify them, or tell whence they came or whose they were. And for Grandmother Kitty's sake no words of suspicion were framed and spoken. Old men and women looked into each other's eyes but said nothing.

Five years ago, I was passing the village grave-yard, where some neighbors were digging the grave of Grandmother Somers. One man was leaning on his shovel idly, and I paused and spoke to him. They were digging it in the south end, where all the graves were made fifty and sixty years ago. The ground was beautiful—save a few hillocks and dimpling hollows, it was as level as a floor, and the long grass looked as though its soft green lengths had been combed out or swept a-down by gently flowing waters.

"How sacred this ground looks!" I said, with reverent admiration.

"An' it's chock full o' graves, too, sis," said the man; "leastaways, the old sexton tells me so," said he, and he shifted his position on the shovel-handle that he might rest the more comfortably.

"Yes, it is like unto a silent city; a city full of sleepers," I said, as my eye ran over the green breadth spread out before me.

Just then the man down in the grave called out in a tone of dismay: "Well! well! well! I declare for it if I haven't struck into another grave!"

I passed hurriedly through the gate and stood there with the men—not one of us saying a word. What sacrilege this was! Who was to blame? While we stood wondering, the old mossy gate creaked on its rusty hinges and the sexton came hobbling in upon his cane and crutch.

He was horrified. "It's my fault, boys; I ought to 'a' knowed that we was ruther a fringin' on old 'Squire Gardiner's grave. But those old, long-ago graves are gone to nothin' a' most, and I've not much to guide me but my mem'ry and it's gittin' treacher'us-like. I do say for it! if yon isn't the last remnants of the 'squire's head, or what was onct his head; and the airth's kind o' crumblin' in, and we'll have to make the best on't we can now."

I sat down on the yellow clay and leaned over and peered down into the depths. Right in the foot of Kitty Somers's grave was the head of 'Squire Gardener's. The skull was a crumbling thing, visible, and while we looked at it, with a little sound like "t-s-h!" it fell into pieces.

"Let me touch it, please," I whispered to the man down in the vault, and silently he laid some of the brown crumbling crust in my open palm. I shuddered, and a chill crept over me, and I caught my breath suddenly as I placed them back in his broad hand.

"Lay them in again, but farder back, so's not to interfere with this grave o' her'n," said the old sexton.

The earth was soft and he shoved them back.

I sat there as if dreaming. I knew the story of Kitty Somers, and I knew of 'Squire Gardiner, and the influence he had had over poor Job in the beginning of his young wedded life, and I knew of the sad lives of those upon whom the baneful power of this one man had fallen fatally. And this man, shrewd, energetic, bold and brave, born, perhaps, to do good and great things, but wronged in his tender years, robbed of his best and noblest impulses, here he lay—the last of his beautiful forehead despoiled by the mattock's blow, and gathered into strangers' hands, and curiously looked upon by strangers' eyes, and then thrust aside to make room for the feet of a woman whose life he had made cheerless and desolate, whose home he had darkened, whose hopes he had blighted! Was that retribution? or was it mere chance?

I was roused from my dreamy reverie by the old man leaning on the shovel, who said: "Wall now, sis, 'f you'll git out o' the way we'll finish this ere job."

I sprang from the heap of yellow clay on the edge of the grave, and begging pardon, turned to go away when I heard one of them say: "It's deep enough; jist level it now, and that'll do; 'pears like it inclines to cave in, an' we'd better secure the earth 'fore it does."

Then I walked home as in a dream, and more than once I whispered to myself: "And this is the end of those two! Strange! the head of 'Squire Gardiner moved aside to make room for the feet of Kitty Somers!"

The Story-Teller.

DEBORAH NORMAN:*

HER WORK AND HER REWARD.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER I.

"DOESN'T amount to a row of pina." And Sandy Spieler snapped his fingers contemptuously.

"Praying, you mean?" said a man who formed one of a group in Spieler's bar-room.

"Yes; doesn't amount to a row of pina. There's no sense in it. Faugh! It isn't the praying that I'm concerned about."

"What then?" queried the other, a man named Joshua Gilbert. He was between forty and fifty years of age, and had a handsome, refined face; but you saw upon it too many of the disfiguring signs that indulgence in drink is sure to leave. And these signs were not alone visible on his face; you saw them everywhere about his shabby-gentle person; in the threadbare though well-brushed coat, noticeably out of fashion; in the shiny, almost napless hat; in the patches and darns with which some careful and loving hand had sought to hide rent and fray in garments which, but for the vice that had broken down his manhood and set him over to unproductive idleness, would long ago have been exchanged for new ones.

"The effect on public sentiment," replied Spieler. "This absurd thing is turning the heads of the people and setting the fanatics on fire. If they'd stick to praying, they might go on amusing themselves as long as they pleased, for all I cared. It isn't God's interference that I'm concerned about; but man's. The Lord doesn't bother Himself about our affairs in anything like the degree your pious frauds endeavor to make the people believe. If He wanted to stop liquor-selling, He'd do it short and sharp, without waiting for some whining hypocrite to get down on his knees and say 'Please, good Lord, shut up the rum-mills.' Bah! It's disgusting!"

"How do you suppose the Lord would go about the work, if He were really to undertake it?"

asked Gilbert. "What would be His short and sharp method?"

"If He can do anything He pleases, He wouldn't be long in finding a way," returned Spieler. "He could shake all our houses down with a special earthquake and not disturb a brick in our neighbors' dwellings. He could break all our kegs and bottles as fast as we filled them. He could paralyze every hand that attempted to pour out a glass of liquor. Oh, as for that, there are a hundred ways of doing the thing if God cared to do it. But He doesn't. The very fact that I'm as free to carry on my business as the baker, the tailor or the minister, is positive proof that God has something of more importance on His hands than meddling with our insignificant affairs. Your canting, psalm-singing Christians belittle their God when they represent Him as taking sides in every miserable crusade their folly or fanaticism prompts them to inaugurate. A pestilent set they are all!"

"Hit the nail on the head there, Sandy!" broke in the clear, strong voice of a man well known in Kedron as Len Spangler. He was tall and muscular, weighing over two hundred. Had a large head, well developed in all the vital and sensual organs, but deficient in the higher and nobler indications of a spiritual and intellectual manhood. His dark skin, black eyes and black beard which covered more than half of his face, indicated a bilious temperament, and gave him a somewhat striking presence. He was one of the men whom a stranger turns to look at in passing, and never forgets. His reputation in Kedron was that of a gambler and horse jockey. He had money, which he sometimes spent freely and with considerable ostentation; and was the owner of several pieces of real estate. Before a railroad connected Kedron with the rest of the world he was chief proprietor in the stage line by which the mails and passengers were conveyed between that town and the State capital, a distance of twenty-seven miles. The railroad, against which he fought hard, broke up his stage line; but, long before the day came for withdrawing his coaches, he had managed, by means of a contract for supplying the road with cross-ties, to make a profit equal to the net earnings of his line for the past five years. So, he was satisfied.

* Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1875, by T. S. ARTHUR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Young men seen often in company with Spangler were not held in high esteem by the better class of citizens in Kedron; and it is but fair to say, that in the atmosphere of his society things pure and good were in great danger of perishing.

"Pestilent!" he added, with an expression of scorn and disgust. "They're —!" We cannot write down the profane words so frequently used in Spangler's vocabulary, and so familiar to those around him as to produce no shock. "A sneaking, whining, cheating set! There's Deacon Strong, with his solemn face and pious whine, for one of 'em. Don't I know all about how he grinds the poor who work for him? Only last week I gave a half-starving woman three dollars to make up her rent—just the sum our saintly Mr. Strong had docked from the wages of her daughter who works in his mill, because, in waiting on her sick mother, she had been half an hour late five or six times in a couple of weeks. Is that Christianity? Maybe it is, and maybe it isn't; I don't pretend to say. But as for Deacon Strong, he's too mean to live; and if I thought there was any virtue in prayer, I'd go into the business just to pray him out of the world."

At this a loud laugh rang through the bar-room, and Spangler, gratified by the response, invited all the company to drink. His invitation was accepted without the slightest sign of hesitation on the part of a single individual. Among those readiest to come forward was Gilbert, whose pecuniary condition was of such a nature as to make free drinks always acceptable. Indeed, it is but truth to say that of the five, ten or fifteen glasses of whisky or beer—the number was variable—with which he steadied his shaky nerves daily, not half were paid for out of his own pocket. He was an educated man, a good talker, and, when not too much in liquor, an agreeable companion. Everybody in Kedron knew him, and almost everybody liked him. With most of the young men who frequented the saloons and bar-rooms among which he made his daily rounds, Gilbert was a favorite, because, having wit and intelligence, he was also good-natured, and as ready to take a joke as to give one. It was a rare thing for a company of men under the influence of liquor to drift into a quarrel when he was about.

Standing near the bar, with his half-emptied glass in his hand, Gilbert had commenced speaking when he noticed a sudden change in the expression of Spangler's face, and heard, at the same moment, the saloon door shut almost noiselessly. Five or six men were in the bar-room, standing in a close group near the counter, each holding a glass of liquor. All had observed the curious change in Spangler's countenance, and turned to see what it meant.

Just inside of the door stood a small, delicately-formed young woman, in the simple attire of a Quaker. Her pure face was calm, but serious, and her manner free from all excitement.

"It's Deborah Norman, as I live!" exclaimed Gilbert, in a low voice.

For a few moments the fair visitor looked from face to face, and then came slowly forward until she reached the centre of the room, where she paused. Every man was still as if spell-bound, and every eye held by a kind of fascination.

"Friends." A faint smile, like the bloom on fruit, touched the lips of the speaker. "Friends," said Deborah, in tones so sweet and tender that it seemed as if an angel were speaking, "we are all God's children, and He loves us with an equal love. We have all gone very far away from Him, but He is calling us to come back, and stands now waiting with outstretched hands ready to receive us and forgive us, if we will only return to Him. We go back through prayer and good deeds—it is all very easy and simple—go back from a waste and barren wilderness to our Father's house. Will thee not go back, friends?"

There was an earnest appeal in her voice. All was silent as death in the pause that followed.

"Let us ask the good Father to lead us back," said Deborah, slowly kneeling as she spoke.

Heads were bowed, hats removed and faces covered. No company assembled for worship could have been more hushed or solemn.

"Our Father and our Friend." So prayed Deborah Norman, the brave young Quakeress, who, moved by the Spirit of God, as she verily believed—and will any gainsay her faith?—had come into the very stronghold of evil and corrupting influences, trusting that through herself as a human agent, God might be able to get nearer to the men who were doing such dreadful wrong to themselves and their neighbors, and move their hearts to repentance.

"Our Father and our Friend," she prayed, in a voice that stirred strangely the hearts of all who heard her, "we are Thy children and wanderers from the fold of Thy love. We have all sinned and gone astray, and there is no good in us. If Thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquity, who shall stand? If Thou hadst left each of us to the devices of our own hearts, we would long ago have made our bed in hell. But Thy love and Thy compassion have failed not, and will never fail. Thou art not angry with us as men are angry; but with a divine pity and patience above all human comprehension, art perpetually seeking to draw us back to the Father's house, from which we wandered so long ago, and to re-instate us in the glorious inheritance that was lost to us through sin.

"O Lord and Saviour, Thy unhappy children, in turning from Thee, have turned from each other. And many—alas, so many!—have sought good to themselves through means that hurt the neighbor. Among these, O Father, is one now in Thy presence, and to whom, moved by an influence we dared not resist, we have come to bear in Thy name our testimony against the evil of his doings. His soul is as precious in Thy sight as any other human soul, and Thy love for him as deep and strong as for saint or angel. In saving others from the ruin his hand scatters abroad—ah, Lord, he does not really know in his heart what he is doing!—Thou art trying with equal love to save him. Give him a clearer sight, and a heart of pity. Take him by the hand, and lead him into another and a better way. And let Thy Spirit touch the hearts of all now in Thy presence. They are Thy children, and every good gift they enjoy comes from Thy loving hand. The early and the latter rain are Thine; the fruitful fields; the blessing of plenty; and in Thy bounty they are fed and clothed. But these are only Thy poorer gifts. Thy richer blessings wait."

Rising from her knees, her face shining with a spiritual brightness that half-awed those who gazed upon it, Deborah came forward and held out her hand to Spieler. For a moment the saloon-keeper stood irresolute; not from any feeling of opposition but from sheer bewilderment.

The small, white hand with its delicate fingers, closed in a pressure warm and friendly upon that of Spieler, who declared afterward that he felt a thrill run down his arm and over his body as distinct as that given by an electric battery.

"My friend," she said, fixing her large, serious eyes on his face, "think about this matter. It is one of deepest concern. What thee is doing hurts us all. It is not good work, my friend and brother. It is evil work, because it injures thy neighbor. It does not build up nor help anything; but, oh, the sorrow and suffering, the tears and anguish, the crushed hopes and despairing hearts that follow this work, friend Spieler, are beyond the power of any one to describe! Women see and know more about these things than men, because on them the bitterest suffering falls. Thee sees only the gratified face of the man who drinks thy liquor, but not the sorrow of his wife or his mother when he comes home under its influence. Oh, sir, in the name of more than a thousand troubled, sorrowing, heart-breaking women, I beg of thee to shut this door through which so many whom we love and honor enter the way to destruction; and may God bless thee!"

With a gentle grace, Deborah Norman turned away and walked slowly from the bar-room, not once looking back to the group of men, all of whom had treated her with marked respect. Moments passed before any stirred or spoke. The first to move from his position was Gilbert. Dropping into a chair near which he had been standing, he crouched down like one struck with a sudden weakness, his head bent forward, his mouth compressed, and his face troubled. This broke the spell. With an ejaculation too coarse and profane for our pages, yet not meant for disrespect, either toward Deborah or religion, Spangler took two or three long strides down the bar-room, and then came back to where Spieler stood leaning forward on the counter, not having yet changed the attitude assumed when his fair visitor knelt to pray, and drawing himself up to his full height, said, with a half-mocking seriousness, yet in a voice that betrayed the change which had come over his feelings: "Was that all real, Sandy? Was it an angel or a ghost? Did any one look to see if she had wings?"

The smile that Spangler had expected to see break into the faces around upon which he looked, did not come in answer to his light remark.

"Something more than a row of pins, ha, Sandy?" he added, turning back to the saloon-keeper.

"I should think it was!" ejaculated Spieler, taking a deep breath as he spoke.

"A whole paper full!" chuckled Spangler. But his poor effort to make light of the incident was not successful. The manner of Deborah's coming and going gave no room for levity. She had dropped in among them like one from a higher sphere, and the message she brought had been spoken with such impressive tenderness, and such penetrative force, that there was no help for them but to hear and feel. Guard or defence was out of the question. Underlying all the visible action—all they could see and hear, and oppose by counter-action, if they wished to do so—was a force so subtle and powerful that it bore them helplessly away upon its invisible current and left them oppressed by a sense of weakness and defeat.

Of the law of spiritual forces, these men, who had lived only on the lower sensual and corporeal planes of the human mind, knew nothing. What they could see, taste, touch or perceive by the bodily senses they believed in. To them only the tangible was real. They made light of divine things because, in the first place, the precepts of religion condemned the natural and corporeal excesses in which they found pleasure; and in the second place, because the spiritual degree of their minds was in such darkness that it was impossible for them to see spiritual things. They were blind as to the inner sight. If there was an exception, it was in the case of Joshua Gilbert, who had once been a church member, and sincerely in the effort to lead a religious life.

"Do you know that woman?" asked Spieler, addressing Gilbert, who had uttered the name of their late visitor on seeing her enter the saloon.

"It's Deborah Norman," replied Gilbert, raising his head and looking around.

"And who's Deborah Norman?" queried Spieler.

"A young Quakeress who dropped down into Kedron less than a year ago from somewhere," answered Gilbert. "Out of Heaven, maybe," he added, "for there's more of the angel than the woman in her if all's true that I've heard."

"I'd like to have a peep at her shoulders," said Spangler, who, strangely moved as even he had been, could not repress his usual habit of making light of even the most serious things, and getting up a laugh, if possible.

"What for?" asked one of the company.

"To see where the wings were fastened on, ha! ha! ha!"

"Some eyes might discover the place; but yours, never!" returned Gilbert, quite seriously.

"Is that a conundrum?" asked Spangler, trying to appear amused.

"Yes, if you please to have it so."

"Then I'll give it up; for I never guessed a conundrum in my life."

"Not one of that kind I can well believe," remarked Gilbert, with no change in the seriousness of his manner.

"What's the trouble with Len Spangler's eyes?" inquired Spieler.

"Nothing. If he had a look at Deborah Norman's shoulders, he would see them quite as distinctly as you or I. But he'd never find the wings!"

"Nor anybody else, so far as that goes. What's all this silly nonsense about?"

The speaker was a young man named Victor Howe, who, like the rest, had been strongly moved by the appearance of Deborah; but whose admiration for the beautiful girl had been stronger than any feeling stirred by the deeper spiritual influences that for the moment penetrated the consciousness of all while she prayed.

"Nor you, any more than Spangler, I fear," quietly returned Mr. Gilbert.

"My conundrum, ha?" and Howe laughed feebly.

"There are more things in Heaven and earth than were ever dreamed of in your philosophy, Victor Howe, or mine, either," said Gilbert. "There are invisible as well as visible forces, and all of us are feeling at this moment the power of something we can neither weigh, measure nor comprehend. I think that Deborah Norman came right down from Heaven, and is one of God's angels sent by the loving Father she talked to us about this evening, to help and comfort all who come into her presence, and to lead back from the dreary desert, in which we have gone so far astray, as many as will take hold of her outreached hand, and go with her to that Father's house.

Gilbert's manner was deeply serious, and as he closed the last sentence his voice broke and trembled. No one spoke for several moments.

"Suppose we have a prayer-meeting," said Spangler, with mock solemnity. He expected some one to join him in breaking up the strong impressions which Deborah's visit had made; but no response came. His levity was felt as a jar and not a relief. It offended instead of amusing.

"What do you know about this lovely Quakeress, Mr. Gilbert?" asked the young man named Howe. "I think I understand all about the wings, come to think it over."

"Wings," said Mr. Gilbert, the old strength and beauty of his fine countenance, now so sadly marred, flushing in and animating every feature, "are the heavenly truths on which souls like hers may rise to communion with God, and on which, bearing down blessings for His far-off and disobedient children, she may return and bring them messages of peace, as she has done for us to-day. An angel of God has been among us, friends; and the sound of her departing wings is yet in our ears. Let us not make light of the heavenly visit. She came to us in love and pity, and has left with us a divine benediction."

"Going to turn preacher!" said Spangler in a low tone to Sandy Spieler. "It beats the dickens! Old Parson Deering isn't a circumstance."

Spicer only gave a little shrug. He had not yet even made an effort to shake off the influence of Deborah Norman's visit, which was something so new and singular that he still felt the pressure of surprise.

"There's more in praying than you thought," remarked Gilbert, addressing the saloon-keeper.

"In that kind of praying there is," he answered.

"Why, it seemed as if she saw God standing right before her in this bar-room. She didn't cry out as some of the preachers do—you can hear them half over the town sometimes—nor send her voice afar off up into Heaven; but talked to God just as though He were present here among us. You don't know how strangely I felt. And what is more, I can't, somehow, get over it. The place seems to be different from what it was before she knelt in it and turned my bar-room into a house of prayer. You may laugh and make sport as much as you please, Mr. Spangler, but it doesn't alter the case. If you, or any here, are able to shut out the vision of that young girl, kneeling and praying as we all saw her, you can do more than I can. I shall always see her just there!"

In reply to this, Spangler, who was a coarse, vile man, profaning almost everything he touched, and first to throw off every impression of the better influence Deborah Norman had brought down among them, poured out a torrent of oaths, jests and obscenity, and then looked from face to face, waiting for the laughing response he had been used to get after sallies of this kind; but no response came. Every countenance was sober.

"Good-bye, friends!" he cried, mockingly. "If this is a church, I'm off! Where are you going to put the anxious-seat? I'll drop in to-morrow morning to see the mourners and count the converts. Da, da, Parson Gilbert!" And the hardened scoffer went out.

CHAPTER II.

ON retiring from Spieler's saloon, the young Quakeress, on whose usually calm face now rested a flush of excitement, walked away with slow and even steps, turning soon out of the more thronged streets and keeping on until she reached a small and unobtrusive house on the outskirts of the town. Entering, she went up to a room on the second floor, and going in, quietly laid off her bonnet and gray cloak. No excitement was visible in her movements, though the warm flush was still upon her cheeks, and her eyes had an unusual brightness. She wore a plain drab merino dress, and had a narrow linen collar about her neck. Her brown hair was combed back smoothly from her white temples and knotted behind.

Gradually the color faded off from her cheeks, leaving a paleness that contrasted strongly with her dark-chestnut hair and large, spiritual eyes. Her delicate lips betrayed, through their restful quiet, the tokens of trial and pain out of which she had come victorious. After sitting with a wrapt, far-off look in her face, and hands folded and laid in her lap, for over a minute, Deborah Norman knelt by her bed, and laying the palms of her hands together, looked upward, and prayed, silently at first, but soon with an earnestness that went on increasing until her countenance was flushed again, and rippling all over with feeling. After praying, she sat down with the Bible on her knees, and bending over it, one cheek resting on the palm of her right hand, read for nearly a quarter of an hour, only moving when she turned the leaves.

On restoring the Bible to the shelf from which she had taken it, Deborah sat down again, the far-off, absorbed look still visible. A rap at her door sent a smile to her face.

"Come in," she said, in a voice of sweet invitation.

The door opened, and a woman, past middle life, entered.

"Mrs. Conrad," said Deborah, the smile still playing around her mouth.

"I thought I heard you come in a bit ago, but wasn't sure. You do move about so like one treading on air. Some people that I know stamp their feet as if they meant to shake the house down. I never saw the beat. But you—"

"Has any one been asking for me?" inquired Deborah, interrupting Mrs. Conrad.

"Yes. There's a woman with a new-born baby, down in Coulter's Row, that's very sick, and her little girl was here and said, 'Please wouldn't you come and see her.'"

"What's the woman's name?" asked Deborah.

"Mrs. Pyne; and she lives at No. 8, in the top room, front. Her husband's an awful drunkard, they say."

A shadow came down over Deborah's face. She did not hesitate, but reached for her bonnet and cloak, which were still lying on the bed.

"There's little good to be done when there's a drunken husband around," said Mrs. Conrad. "It's just about as much use as pouring water into a cullender to try to help such people."

"The drunken husband makes the need for help only so much the greater," returned Deborah. And she sighed faintly.

"Oh, dear! But it is so hopeless!" returned Mrs. Conrad.

"For as much as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto Me," said Deborah, softly. "It is Christ's work, and He will give it a blessing. Even a cup of cold water, if the lips can take no more, may bring a sorely-needed refreshment. It is for us to reach forth a hand, Mrs. Conrad, whenever a cry for help comes to our ears, and leave with God the gift of power to grasp it. No case is too hopeless for Him. He saves, thee knows, to the uttermost."

"Maybe He does; but I never could see that He did much in the way of saving people where liquor was about," replied the woman. "It all goes from bad to worse, and keeps on going, day in and day out to the end."

Deborah sighed again.

"I wonder He doesn't strike some of these rum-sellers dead!" Mrs. Conrad added, with an angry throb in her voice.

"It isn't His way," returned Deborah.

"It would be a better way, I think sometimes, than to let them go on as He does, ruining people, and sending such awful misery among poor women and children. I only wish I had my way of them for about a week. There'd be lively times in this town."

"Thee wouldn't strike them all dead, I hope," said Deborah, in her quiet manner.

"Maybe I'd try smashing up their kegs and bottles, or shaking down their saloons first," replied Mrs. Conrad. "But if that didn't do the business, you may be sure I'd try something else.

Rum-selling would have to cease. Bless your heart, honey! I'd never stop to parley for a minute, but go straight through to the end, breaking things right and left, if need be."

"And do more harm than good," said Deborah. "God is wiser and better than we are, Mrs. Conrad. His ways are not our ways, nor His thoughts our thoughts. The weapons with which He fights are not carnal but spiritual."

"Tisn't any use going after a bear with a cambric needle. You want an axe or a good rifle. Carnal men must be fought with carnal weapons. It may be God's way to use only spiritual swords and guns, if there be such things, but when we go into a fight, let us use what we have, say I. Spiritual weapons may be all well enough in a battle with spiritual enemies; but when we come down into the world and fight with the beasts of prey that are among us, we must take natural weapons, and use them with a will. Must cut and slash, and utterly drive them out."

"Easy to say, but hard to do," remarked Deborah. "The fight with evil beasts has been going on for ages—the fight with carnal weapons, I mean—and they are not driven out. On every hand they hurt and destroy the people. Prison and gallows are powerless agencies: force is vain; and why? Because the hearts of the people are not right before God. They trust in themselves and in their own devices; in the arm of flesh and not in the arm Omnipotent. They seek to check the flow of evil through the land by setting up an obstruction here, or digging a channel there, instead of cutting off the stream at its fountain head. How vain is the help of man—how weak the arm of flesh! Our carnal weapons are broken in the conflict, or drop from our palsied hands."

"You talk me all down, Deborah Norman," said Mrs. Conrad. "And maybe you know better than I do. But, if we don't try to help ourselves and fight our own battles, with what face can we go to God and ask Him to help and fight for us? That's my way of putting it, you see."

"I'm not against working and fighting," answered Deborah, "but only against a warfare with Satan, armed with carnal weapons. His seat of power is in the hearts of men; and so long as he holds his sway there, his evil influence will make itself felt in all their lives. He will curse the people in their own acts and deeds. It is in this stronghold of the human heart that we must attack our enemy; and not until he is dislodged will there be peace in the land."

"Coulter's Row" stood in one of the most wretched quarters of the town; a vice and poverty-stricken region, in which every third house was a dram-shop. How the miserable people who lived there could possibly earn enough to support all of these shops and yet keep from nakedness and starvation, is a question in social economy hard to answer. But for stealing, begging, or worse, it could not have been done. From the poor industries of the place; its few looms, shoemakers' benches, tailors' boards, sewing machines, etc., not one dollar's worth of service went back to society for every five that was drawn from the people of Kedron. It was an ulcerous drain upon society. "Coulter's Row" consisted of ten two-story wooden houses, which had once been pleasant little homes, with gardens in front; but that was many years in the past. Now they were dingy, weather-beaten, and disfigured all over by green and yellow patches of lichen or tufts of moss. Not a single flower, or shrub, or vine, relieved the dirt and dilapidation of the yards in front, all of them gateless, and many with not a paling left in the pretty fences that once enclosed the gardens. Nothing, it seemed, could live there and be pure.

No. 8 was neither better nor worse than its forlorn, comfortless neighbors. A few minutes' walk brought Deborah to the place. A girl not over ten years of age, who had evidently been waiting for her, stood at the door, and as soon as she saw her turn into the street ran forward to meet her. The child's garments were poor and thin, but not so dirty as those of most of the children in the row. Her face, too, was exceptionally clean, and free from the hardness and sensual coarseness so sad to see in nearly all the children's faces in that wretched quarter. She caught hold of one of Deborah's hands, saying: "Oh, come quick, won't you!"

"Is thy mother very sick?" asked Deborah, hurrying forward with the child.

"Yes, ma'am, she's dreadful sick; and the baby cries so."

The feeble wail of an infant fell on Deborah's ears as she passed into No. 8, and set her foot on the creaking stairs. The room to which the child conducted her was in the attic, the roof on one side coming down to within two feet of the floor. It had but a single window, and contained no articles that could be called furniture, except a small pine table, two chairs and a bench. On a dirty mattress in one corner lay a wasted, hollow-eyed woman, vainly trying to hush the cries of a baby only a few hours old. There was a stove in the room, but no fire. The air was damp and chilly. A ragged quilt and a piece of carpet were all the clothing that covered the bed.

Deborah's practiced eyes took in the situation at a glance. Warmth was the first thing needed. She sat down on one of the old chairs, and leaning over the woman, laid her hand softly on her forehead.

"How old is thy baby?" she asked, in her gentle, tender way.

"It was born just before day this morning," replied the woman, faintly.

"The air is chilly. Has thee any wood or coal?"

The woman only shook her head.

"We must have a fire the first thing," said Deborah, and she gave the girl money and sent her out to get the needed fuel. It did not take long to dispel the cold and raise the air to a genial temperature.

Meantime, the visitor had taken the baby from its mother's arms and was trying to hush its feeble cries. She found it without any garment, save a piece of old muslin in which it had been wrapped at birth.

A woman who lived in one of the rooms below had seen Deborah go up, and, moved as much by the hope of getting interest for herself as by any feeling of pity for her sick neighbor, came in and asked if she could do anything for Mrs. Pyne.

"Thank thee, yes," returned Deborah, drawing her quickly into service; and it was not long before the two women had changed the dreary aspect of things into one of comparative comfort. Two or three more neighbors were brought in, and from one and another some article of clothing was obtained for the baby, and some needed thing for the poor mother, until both were eased from suffering.

After all had been done for present help that lay in her power, Deborah spake thus to the two or three women who were still present:

"Dear friends," she said, "we are all the children of a good and loving Father, and it is because we have gone far away from Him that we are so poor and wretched. He is calling us to come back that He may comfort and bless us. In helping this our sick sister, we have taken one step in the way that leads to our Father's house. Dear friends, let us take a step every day. We shall find it easier than we think. And now let us kneel in the presence of our Heavenly Father, and ask Him to help us to find the way back to our lost home."

She knelt, all the women kneeling with her.

"Dear Saviour," she prayed, speaking in a low, but clear voice, "who didst come into the world to seek and to save that which was lost, and who didst die that we might live, pity us Thy unhappy children, and lead us to Thy fold. We have wandered far away from Thee, and are lost in the wilderness of sin. We are cold, and hungry, and sick. Wild beast have set upon and torn us; serpents have bitten us; we are in suffering and sorrow more than our poor words can tell. Oh, lead us back. Help us; succor us; give us the comforting presence of Thy Holy Spirit. Make us kind and pitiful one to another. Put it into the hearts of those who are neighbors to this our sick sister to be very kind to her, and to minister to her wants as Thou wilt minister to theirs in their time of need."

At this moment the door of the room was thrown open, and a man came shuffling in.

"O John! John!" cried the sick woman.

Deborah had paused at the sudden interruption, but went on. She knew by the tones of Mrs. Pyne's voice that the intruder was her husband.

"And, O Lord, we beseech Thee to touch and soften the heart of this man. Lead him back also. His soul is as precious to Thee as the souls of any of Thy children. For him, as for us, Thou didst suffer and die. He has lost his way in the world. Oh, help him to return to safe and pleasant paths. Give him grace to overcome the enemy that has triumphed over him. Let the love for his poor suffering wife, that was once so strong and tender, return to his heart. Let the love he once bore his children grow quick again. Give him back his manhood, O Lord! And help us all to overcome the sin that doth so easily beset us. In and of ourselves we can do nothing; but in Thy strength we can do all things. We have made this chamber a place of prayer; we feel Thy presence with us; and we hear Thee saying to us now, as of old, 'Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' Every day may voices go up to thee out of this place, and may it be as the gate of Heaven to many souls.

"And, now, let Thy blessing and Thy peace, dear Lord and Saviour, rest upon and abide with us. Amen."

The eyes of the women were wet as they rose from their knees. The husband of Mrs. Pyne stood just inside of the door. He was a tall man, finely formed, and had once been handsome, but now presented a most repulsive aspect. His face was bloated and purple; his eyes inflamed; his lips swollen and crusted with sores. There was a bruised mark on one of his cheeks where, a day or two before, he had struck himself in falling. As for his dirty, tattered garments, they were as miserable and unsightly as his person.

He had not moved since he came in. Deborah, on rising from her knees, turned to Pyne and extended her hand. She saw by the disturbance in his countenance that his feelings were touched.

"We have all gone very far astray, my friend," she said, "but the way of return is still open. Thee and I, and all of us can go back if we will. The Saviour is waiting for us. All day long He stands with outstretched hands, calling upon us to come back to our Father's house, the doors of which stand wide for our reception. The fatted calf is killed; the feast is ready; there will be joy at our return."

A convulsed movement was seen in the man's face, followed by a shiver. Then tears started from his eyes, and a groan fell from his lips.

"God will help thee to be a man again," said Deborah, in a tone of cheer, taking both of Mr. Pyne's hands. "Thee is going to try once more. I see it in thy face. No matter how often thee has tried and failed; try now in the strength of God, and victory is sure."

"I will try, God helping me!" returned the man, while tears rolled down his cheeks. He looked toward his poor wife as he spoke.

"O John! John!" cried the sick woman, rising in bed and holding out her hands. Her face was lighted up and quivering.

Pyne crossed the little room, and standing before her, said, with an earnestness that all felt to be real: "I'll try once more, Lucy. It's awful the way I've been going on."

"There is no help but in God," said Deborah, her voice breaking in sweet and assuring as the voice of an angel. "Don't forget this for one moment. Our strength is weakness; but the strength of God is like that of the everlasting hills. Trusting in Him, we cannot be moved."

"Friends," she added, looking round upon the group of three or four women who were in the room, "I leave our sick sister with thee, and ask of thee, for Christ's sake, to do for her as ye would have others do for thee. A little self-denial and a little care and watchfulness will change all this dearliness into comfort, and God, who has been near to us, will bless thee a hundred fold. Until to-morrow I trust her with thee all, and I know thee will see that she lacks for nothing thee can give."

Then extending her hand to Mr. Pyne, she said: "Stand fast, in God's strength, my friend. All now depends on thyself. Touch not, taste not, handle not. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

CHAPTER III.

"IT'S easy enough to talk and pray. Words are cheap. Why didn't she do something?" said one of the women, after Deborah Norman had gone.

"She has done something," was answered.

"I'd like to know what, saving the bucket of coal and the fire?"

"She's softened my heart, if nothing else," said the other, putting her apron to her eyes. "It was a shame on us to neglect Mrs. Pyne as we did, when it would have been so easy to join hands and help her."

"That's so," said another of the women. "This young lady is only a stranger; but we were here and knew how it was. I don't see that we've any right to cast stones at other people."

While they were yet talking, a boy came in and said that Mr. Logan, who kept a store in the neighborhood, wanted to see Mr. Pyne. He had a job for him.

"Oh, that's good!" exclaimed the women, in cheery voices.

"Miss Norman called and asked if we couldn't give Mr. Pyne a job," said the boy, "and we just wanted some one to fix up the cellar and pile things away. So I've come for him."

On reaching home, Deborah Norman entered in her usually quiet way, and was going up-stairs, when Mrs. Conrad, who had heard the door open and shut, called to her from the sitting-room.

"There's been a gentleman here to see you."

"Who was it?" inquired Deborah.

"He didn't leave his name; but said he would call sometime this afternoon."

"Did he say what he wanted?"

"No."

Deborah stood for a few moments, and then continued on to her room. Shutting the door, she sat down without taking off her bonnet and shawl, and dropping her eyes to the floor, soon became lost in thought. There was apparent now a marked change in the expression of her face. Its soft quiet faded out, the lips were pressed closer together, and something more than the suggestion of troubled lines were impressed on her white forehead. At length the hands which had been lying passively in her lap, drew together and clasped themselves tightly. There came a nervous impulse in the movement that stirred her whole body. But she was still again in a moment. A small pocket testament was lying upon a table near which she sat. Reaching her hand for this, she opened it and let her eyes fall upon one of the pages. The words that presented themselves were these:

"Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

She read them over, and then shut her eyes, leaning back in her chair. The old, sweet peace did not come into her face. After a little while she lifted the book and read again:

"If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you. Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples. As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in His love. These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full. This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you. Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you. Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain; that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, He may give it you. These things I command you, that ye love one another."

She let the book fall slowly into her lap, leaning back in her chair and again closing her eyes. Still, the old peaceful expression did not return. Rising after some minutes had passed, she locked the door of her room, and then knelt to pray, bowing her head until her face was hidden. Silently, for some time, her heart went out to God; but growing more earnest in her supplications, she clothed her thoughts in audible language.

"Thou knowest how weak I am, O Lord," she said, in tones of almost passionate entreaty, "and how hard it is for me to walk in the way of duty and self-denial. Pity and help me! My spirit is willing, but, oh! the flesh fails so often. I have put my hand to the plough, and set its share in the ground of my sinful nature. It is cutting deep furrows; it is breaking and rending. All the green things and pleasant flowers I once loved are falling and disappearing from my sight. The beauty, the sweetness, the satisfaction of my old life, are gone. Instead of the verdure and blossoms that once made everything a delight, my field is bare, and the earth broken. Lord, be near to me now, for I am very weak. I am tempted to look back, to drop my hands and leave my plough in the field. But I know that if I cut the furrows deep, and break up the hard and stony ground of my nature, so that it become good and fruitful soil, that Thou wilt sow it with the seeds of truth, and give me a harvest of righteousness. That I shall become as a garden of God. I lean upon Thee, O Lord. I trust in Thee. Of myself I am nothing, and can do nothing good. But in Thy strength I can do all things."

The conflict was over. Whatever its ground—in some weakness of the flesh or tenderly cherished memory—Deborah had gained a victory, and in like conflicts she had so often gained before. Peace rested on lips and brow, and looked from her eyes serenely. Opening the Testament which she had laid upon the table, she read for a long time, pausing now and then to ponder the sentences, and then reading on again, until she was interrupted by a knock on her door and a call to dinner.

Mrs. Conrad scanned her face very closely as she took her seat at the table.

"How did you find the woman in Coulter's Row?" she asked.

"In a bad way," replied Deborah. But she was more comfortable when I left her."

"Got a new-born baby?"

"Yes."

"Is it going to live?"

"I think so."

"Pity it wouldn't die," said Mrs. Conrad.

"God knows best. He'll do what is right," answered Deborah.

"Won't come to any good. Such children never do. If it grows up, it will be a drunkard, like its father, or maybe something worse—a jail or a gallows bird. There's no good in 'em, and no chance for 'em. It may be wicked in me, Miss Norman, but I always feel glad when I hear that such babies are dead. 'Out of their misery,' I say. 'Gone to Haven, safe and happy.' I don't believe there'd be many of them living if it depended on me. I'd give them my blessing and let them go. You needn't look at me so sober, Miss Norman. I don't mean that I'd murder them. But, if I saw them going, I wouldn't put myself out much to hold them back."

Deborah did not reply.

"That Coulter's Row is a horrid place. I wonder you are not afraid to go there," said Mrs. Conrad.

"I'm never afraid to go where duty calls me," answered Deborah.

"But they're such an awful drunken set, men and women alike. I don't think it's safe for a young woman like you to go all alone in such neighborhoods. I don't, indeed! It isn't respectable, either."

"Wherever God sends me, I must go," said Deborah, smiling back upon Mrs. Conrad's serious face. "He kept Daniel safe in the lion's den, and suffered not even the smell of fire to be on the garments of the Hebrew children."

"Yes; but they didn't go into the den nor the fiery furnace of their own accord, Miss Norman. Please to remember that. They were cast in by God's enemies, because they were faithful to Him, and He was bound to protect them as He did. But it's another thing for us to go jumping into lion's dens and fiery furnaces, and expect God to change the laws of nature. He doesn't work in that manner—at least not now-a-days."

Deborah smiled again, saying that she wasn't afraid of being eaten up by lions or burnt in the fire. If she saw any good to be done, she would try to do it. Bad men and women were human still, and had souls to be saved. Christ had died for them and made their salvation possible; and she would fall in due honor and service to the Lord if she did not do all in her power to bring home His lost and wandering sheep.

"It's right and Christian for us to do all the good we can," said Mrs. Conrad, in reply. "And what's more, it's our bounden duty. But we must use judgment and prudence; and have some care for ourselves. Now, you go into places and among people where it isn't respectable to be seen, nor safe, neither. You'll get talked about and insulted. I don't see how you can do it! The next thing I expect to hear about you is, that you've gone to praying in taverns like some of the crazy women we read about."

Deborah turned her head aside so that Mrs. Conrad might not see the change in her countenance. A moment afterward she looked at her across the table, and said: "If I believed that by praying in a tavern I could lead the tavern-keeper to give up his business, or one of his customers to quit drinking, would it not be my duty to go there and pray?"

"I don't believe it would have any more effect than pouring water on the sand," rejoined Mrs. Conrad, in considerable excitement.

"No; but suppose I thought differently; was sure my praying there would do good? Would it not then be my duty?"

"No. It isn't any woman's duty to go into vile bar-rooms. 'Tisn't the place for them; and I don't believe any good will ever come of it."

"Good has come of it already," replied Miss Norman. "A great many taverns have been closed; and in some towns not a single one remains open."

"I don't believe the praying did it," said Mrs. Conrad, with a snap in her voice.

"What then?"

"The saloon-keepers got disgusted with the way the women went on, and shut up to get rid of them while the fever lasted. When the fever dies out, as it's certain to do, the taverns will open again. It's just like scaring flies from a piece of meat; as soon as your hand is gone they come swarming back as thick as ever."

"After these has scared the flies off once, does thee let them come back and stay?" asked Deborah, smiling. "Or does thee not keep on scaring them off?"

"Then the praying is to go on forever?" said Mrs. Conrad.

"I don't know how that may be," replied Deborah; "I only asked you a question about the flies."

"Oh, but you're queer, Miss Norman!" exclaimed Mrs. Conrad, "and there's no catching you. But, goodness gracious! don't you go to getting into it if the thing should ever come here—the praying, I mean. It's making light and common of sacred things."

"To pray?" queried Deborah.

"To pray in the streets and public saloons, like Pharisees, to be heard and seen of men, and have it reported in the newspapers," replied Mrs. Conrad.

"But suppose it is done to be heard of God? Sacred things are made light of and common enough in churches sometimes. Ministers in the pulpit don't always pray to God; but, often, pray to be heard of men. Thee knows that as well as I do. Where two or three are met together in My name there am I in the midst of them, are blessed and encouraging words. Not only at Jerusalem and in the mountains of Samaria; not only in the secret chamber and the temple set apart for worship, is our prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God present; but in all places where, in humility and sincerity, heart and voice go up to Him. A woman may kneel in a saloon and pray to God as truly and reverently as a minister in his pulpit; nay, more sincerely and reverently than many whose prayers are but vain repetitions, because neither mind nor heart are in them."

"May do and will do are two things, Miss Norman; and in my experience generally stand very far apart. A woman may do all this; but will she? Not one time in a hundred, let me tell you. Doesn't stand to reason. If it's as much as a body can do to compose her mind in church and keep the world out, how, I should like to know, is she going to do it in a bar-room full of scoffing men; or on the pavement with a crowd around her. It can't be done."

"Men don't generally scoff when prayers are being offered to God," said Deborah. "And so far as I've read about those bands of praying women, the instances are but few in which insult or interruption has been offered. Almost always they have been treated with respect. Of course, all women are not alike guarded in what they do; and all are not alike under the influence of the Holy Spirit. Mere enthusiasm draws many in; and others are drawn in by the magnetism of stronger spirits. In just the degree that this is so is the influence of prayer weakened."

"But, I'd like to know, Miss Norman, what need there is of going into a saloon to pray? God hears as well in one place as in another."

"True; and He is far more desirous of stopping the evil that is in the world than we can possibly be. He doesn't wait for our poor prayers."

"Then why doesn't He do it? That's what I can't understand."

"There are a great many things that we can't understand; and a great many others that would be clearer if we did not reason so narrowly. We are too apt to think of God as a being of infinite power and arbitrary will; and are perpetually wondering why He doesn't do this or that? Why He doesn't establish the good and destroy the evil? But think for a moment, Mrs. Conrad, and thee will see that the seat of all evil is in the heart. What we love, we do. Love is our very life; and our life is evil or good according to the quality of that love or life. God has made us free to act; and if He were to take away our freedom—were to force us to do good or evil—we would at once cease to be human. In other words, the moment God forced us to do good or evil, He would destroy us. And so, thee sees, He can only save the world by leading it back to Himself; and this is slow work; so slow that our human patience grows faint with hope deferred; but His infinite, divine patience is never weary and never discouraged. He sees the end from the beginning, and His providence wisely ordains the means by which to save a lost and perishing world, without the destruction of a single human soul."

"You don't mean that all are to be finally saved!" exclaimed Mrs. Conrad, with such a look of surprise and rejection on her face that Deborah could not help smiling.

"Yes, if it is possible for God to save them."

"Oh, I don't believe that!" returned Mrs. Conrad, becoming excited. "That universal doctrine is dreadful, and flies right in the face of Scripture. 'The wicked shall be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God.' That's Scripture, Miss Norman, and I go by Scripture."

"And this is Scripture also," returned Deborah: "Whither shall I go from Thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from Thy presence? If I ascend up into Heaven, Thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold Thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me; even the night shall be light about me. Yea, the darkness hideth not from Thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike unto thee."

"Doesn't that say there's a hell?" asked Mrs. Conrad, triumphantly.

"Oh, yes; but it says, too, that God is there; and where He is love and compassion dwell. His saving power is as much in hell as in Heaven; for the marred, perverted and suffering souls that have cast themselves down, are none the less His children, and objects of His tender compassion. He cannot give them the blessedness of Heaven; but He can save them from the deeper ruin and suffering into which, but for His loving restraints, they would plunge."

"Oh, dear me!" ejaculated Mrs. Conrad, "that's taking away all the wrath, and punishment, and fiery indignation the Bible tells us God heaps upon the wicked. According to the way you make it out, He's just as much concerned for the wicked in hell as He is for the good in Heaven."

"More concerned about them, I should say; just as thee would be more concerned and pitiful in thy feeling toward a bad son who was suffering for crime in a dreary prison, than toward a good son who was prosperous and happy. He would be no less Thy son because disobedient and evil-minded. Thy love would still go out to him, and thee would yearn over him with a tearful love that could not die. And are we more loving and compassionate than God?"

"Tisn't any use to talk, Miss Norman. You can't make me believe that God is as much concerned for the wicked as He is for the righteous. It doesn't stand to reason. He rewards the good and punishes the evil. The Bible says so in hundreds of places. 'These shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal.'"

"Neither punishment nor reward come directly from God," said Deborah, "but are the inevitable consequences of a breach of His laws in one case, and obedience in the other. The good are happy; the evil unhappy. The nearer we approach to God through keeping His laws, the more peaceful we are, and the deeper our enjoyments; and the farther off we get from God through a rejection of His laws, the more wretched do we become. The good are in Heaven, and the evil in hell, no matter whether they be in this earthly body or not. The love of God and the neighbor makes Heaven in the soul; the love of self and the world, hell."

"Humph! There are lots of people in hell according to that notion," said Mrs. Conrad, with a shrug and a grimace.

"To be in Heaven is to be happy—who are happy?"

A shadow crept over the gentle face of Deborah.

"Do you mean to say that we are in hell now?" came with a sharp, half-indignant interrogation.

"If we lived near to God, the peace of Heaven would be in our souls," said Deborah. "But who has this peace? It is because we live so near to ourselves and so far away from God that we are troubled. And to be far away from God—separated from Him by self-love—is to be in hell. So it is the love, thee sees, that makes our Heaven or hell. God does not turn from us; we turn from God, and go away from Him, and so make our bed in hell. Yes, Mrs. Conrad, we are all in hell, because we are all in self-love. We sink deeper in the degree that we indulge our self-love; and rise toward Heaven in the degree that we deny or repress it. If we refuse to do what is evil, calling upon God for strength to resist when temptations assail us, He will not only give us the power to overcome, but remove our selfish and evil affections, and fill our hearts with love to Himself and love to all human kind. And when our hearts are so filled, we shall be in Heaven and among the angels, though as to our natural lives we are still in this lower world. The only change death can then make, will be to bring us consciously into Heaven."

"Maybe it's all true," returned Mrs. Conrad, "though I don't just get the hang of it. But I can't see what this has to do with praying in taverns; nor why God couldn't put an end to wickedness if He chose."

Deborah's effort to make Mrs. Conrad understand something about the nature of human freedom had failed.

"Thy heart has, many times, been touched and softened by a prayer offered in thy hearing?" said Deborah.

"Yes."

"New thoughts have come into thy mind, and thee has been stirred by new feelings."

"Yes."

"Heaven has seemed nearer to thee. There has felt a new and stronger desire to lead a good life; and thy heart, that was cold a little while before, has burned within thee. Would this have been so if that prayer had been offered in some secret chamber to which thy ear could not penetrate?"

Mrs. Conrad dropped her head in a thoughtful way. A few pencils of light had come into her mind.

"Now, if thee and I were to kneel here in this room, and ask God to touch the heart of any saloon-keeper in Kedrow, whom we chose to name, and move him to repentance and an abandonment of his dreadful business, does thee think it would have the desired effect?"

"I don't believe it would do a mite of good," returned Mrs. Conrad.

"Now, suppose thee and I were to go into his saloon some day—"

"Oh, dear! Don't suppose anything of the kind with me in it!" exclaimed Mrs. Conrad, lifting her hands.

"Very well, then, suppose I were to go into his saloon some day, and after having a little kind talk with him, were to kneel down and ask God to bring him into a better mind, and soften his heart toward his fellow-men who were suffering so much in consequence of what he was doing. Would not my prayer in this room where he could not hear me, and my prayer in his saloon where he could hear me, have a very different effect upon him?"

"But would not that be praying to him instead of to God?" asked Mrs. Conrad.

"It would be praying to God under conditions that would enable Him to answer the prayer; and all other prayers, however sincerely offered, are of no avail. It would put new thoughts into the man's mind, and enable God, and the angels who minister with men, to bring him back into old and better states of mind; to quicken his conscience, and lead him to repentance. Herein lies the power of praying with men instead of only for them. Most of the men who are engaged in this business stand so far away from God that His better influences cannot reach them. He is not in all their thoughts. They despise and reject Him. They do not attend church; they never hear prayer; they do not read the Bible. Yet, each has a soul to be saved; for each our blessed Lord suffered and died. If we are true servants of our divine Master, shall we not seek to save them also, as well as the perishing ones they are leading astray? Surely, yes! And how can we save them unless we go to them, even as our Lord came to us?"

"Oh, dear! You do twist me up so, Miss Norman!" exclaimed Mrs. Conrad, pushing her chair back from the table. "But you can't make me believe it's right for women to thrust themselves into whisky shops, and go to praying there."

"Not if human souls can be saved thereby?" said Deborah.

"There are plenty of souls to be saved outside of rum-holes," replied Mrs. Conrad. "And as for trying to save rum-sellers, it's my opinion that they're not worth saving. In fact, they deserve scorching; and if I had the say so, they'd all get their deserts. You needn't put on such a face about it. They're the enemies of God and man, as you know; the devil's children and doing the devil's work. I don't believe it's possible to save them. Such men have seared consciences. They have long ago quenched the Spirit: and it has ceased to strive with them."

"I talked with one of these men only yesterday about the evil work he was doing," said Deborah, not appearing to notice the look of surprise that broke into Mrs. Conrad's face. "He did not get angry nor make light of what I said, but listened with respect and attention. And before I left him, I saw tears in his eyes."

"Where did this happen?" demanded Mrs. Conrad. Her nostrils were dilating, and her head thrown back with the air of one ready for a battle.

"I saw him again to-day," continued Deborah, not replying to Mrs. Conrad. "My talk had set him to thinking. We reasoned the matter together; and I was able to show him the darker side of the business in which he was engaged, and to make him feel his personal responsibility as he had never felt it before. Then I prayed with him, and asked God to make his heart as soft and tender as was the heart of his mother when he lay a babe upon her bosom. And as I said this, I heard him sob; and then I knew that he had not quenched the Spirit nor seared his conscience."

"Miss Norman! Have you done that? Have you been praying in a whisky saloon?" cried Mrs. Conrad, in angry astonishment.

"Why not, if by doing so I can lead a saloon-keeper to give up his hurtful trade?" was the calm reply.

A rap at the door prevented any response.

"It's the man who called to see you this morning," said Mrs. Conrad, glancing from the window. "I'll ask him into the parlor."

"Tell him I'll be down in a few minutes," returned Deborah, with a change in her countenance that the other did not notice. She, too, had glanced through the window. As she spoke she rose from the table and went from the room. Her face had become suddenly pale, and there was an unusual disturbance in her manner.

PROUD LITTLE POLLY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MY SWEET SELF."

I AM Polly—proud little Polly—and I am the heroine of my own story. But I am not by any means the maddening creature who usually inhabits the three-volume novel—who has a snub nose, tawny hair and a world of soul looking out of her big brown eyes—eyes so big that, when any mortal woman is afflicted with the like, she is hardly ever able to procure concave glasses strong enough to enable her to see moderately well—eyes that, in novels, when united to genius, invariably have the effect of a basilisk upon the hero. Neither are my eyes like the eyes of Mr. Swinburne's wonderful heroine, which were

The greenest of things blue,
The bluest of things gray.

No, my eyes are hazel, my hair is auburn, my nose eminently respectable and in stature I am decidedly below the middle height. Figuratively speaking, I am seated in the bosom of my family, the said family consisting of my father, my brother and myself.

The sole remaining author of my being is fast asleep, with a white handkerchief thrown over his head, which drapery, falling around his thin worn face and meeting the ends of his white whiskers, causes him to look as like an old woman with a white frilled nightcap as it is in the power of mortal man to look. Tom, who is seventeen, and two years my junior, has been home from school for the last year, and is now studying for some examination. He is lying luxuriously on the hearth-rug, a sofa-pillow under his head and a paper of examination questions in his hand. Suddenly looking up, with a puzzled expression upon his dear, ugly, stupid face, he says: "I say, Polly—where is Manila?"

"Don't know," I say, shortly, not liking to be disturbed in the perusal of a pleasant book; "I always thought manilas were cigars."

"Of course they are, but they come from Manila," he remarks, sagely, and with that tone of wisdom which boys invariably use toward their sisters; "however, where is the place itself?"

"Ask your tutor, and don't worry me," I reply. "By the way, Tom, I wish you'd manage—delicately, of course—to present that young man with a comforter; he looked miserable to-day."

"Ah, poor Dynevor! What a lot of money he earns by coaching fellows, and yet he never seems to have a penny."

"Perhaps he has a wife and family," I suggest, laying down my book. I know he has not.

Tom bursts out laughing.

"What! Mr. Dynevor? Why, I believe he lives in one room, and that is over the dairy just as you enter the town. But, Polly, do you know what the fellows say?"

"No—how should I?"

"Well, they say Dynevor wants to marry some girl he's awfully fond of, and is saving up for that."

Suddenly the fire becomes so unbearably warm that I have to get a screen to keep my face from burning.

"How romantic!" I exclaim, yet at the same time feel somehow that I should like to change the conversation.

At this moment a knock is heard at the hall-door. Papa hastily pulls the pocket-handkerchief from off his head and says: "Dear me! dear me! It's not possible I've been asleep?"

"Quite possible, papa dear—pray take another nap. I dare say it is Miss Jones, the dressmaker."

"Oh, for the advent of Miss Jones!" exclaims Tom, fervently. "If it be anybody else, I shall have to rise from my present comfortable but undignified position—and," he continues, pulling the terrier's ears, "your master objects to be disturbed, Whisky."

As he speaks, the door is opened, and the servant appears, saying: "If you please, Mr. Tom, Mr. Dynevor wishes to speak to you in the study."

"All right!" exclaims Tom, rising with alacrity. He is very fond of his tutor, and asks: "Governor, I suppose I may ask Mr. Dynevor to tea?"

"Certainly—to be sure, to be sure, my boy; I like Mr. Dynevor."

Two years before, Mr. Dynevor had come to Idlechester as mathematical teacher to a large collegiate school, all his spare time being fully occupied with tuition. He was a gentlemanly young man, particularly reticent respecting himself. Good-looking, young, talented and kind-hearted, he was idolized by his pupils. I learned all this from Tom, who was never tired of praising his tutor. Occasionally he spent an evening with us, but I sometimes used to fancy he did not care to come, for he always left very early, and seemed odd and embarrassed in his manner as the hour for departure drew near. Whilst Tom is out of the way, and I am engaged in smoothing my "dishevelled hair"—being a heroine, I feel constrained to use that epithet—I may say that papa, Lieutenant Wyvern, is a poor half-pay officer in very delicate health. We sometimes find it hard enough to make both ends meet; few suspect it, though, and many friends say that they would rather spend an evening in our bright, homely little drawing-room than in many a more pretentious-looking one. On this bleak March evening it looks especially cosy and pleasant, and I confess that I feel glad it does, as Mr. Dynevor is here. There are sounds of footsteps in the hall, the drawing-room door is opened, and Tom and his tutor enter.

"Good-evening, Mr. Dynevor," says papa, cheerily but feebly; "sit down near the fire."

"Good-evening, sir. Good-evening, Miss Wyvern;" he bows to me, and then sits down beside papa.

"I say, Polly," says Tom, sotto voce, and with a lugubrious aspect, as I am cutting the cake for tea, "Dynevor's going away."

I make no reply, but look across the table to where the tutor sits. Our eyes meet; he must know instinctively that I have heard the news, for he says: "Yes, I am going away in a fortnight, Miss Wyvern. Tom must look out for another tutor."

"May I ask," inquires papa, hesitatingly, "why you are going to leave us, Mr. Dynevor?"

"Oh, there is no secret about the matter," he replies, in a perfectly unembarrassed tone; "I am offered a much higher salary elsewhere—and money is a very great object with me just now."

I think of what Tom has told me, and, with my sex's usual absence of logic, I at once come to the conclusion that the rumor must be true. But of course it is nothing to me; oh, dear no, nothing to me! Why should it be otherwise?

At nine Mr. Dynevor rises to go, and Tom says to me: "Come down to the gate, Polly; it's a lovely night."

"Do—will you?" asks Mr. Dynevor, holding out his hand involuntarily to me for the first time in his life.

I do not pretend to see it, but turn to the sofa and take therefrom a woollen anti-macassar, which I throw shawl-fashion over my shoulders.

As we walk down the moonlight-flooded path, the conversation is confined to generalities. Suddenly Tom exclaims: "O Mr. Dynevor, I have forgotten that Todhunter's Euclid of yours; I'll fetch it in a minute," and off he runs, leaving me standing with Eustace Dynevor under the budding chestnuts.

There is an awkward little pause, and at length I remark originally—being a woman, I am the first to recover the use of my tongue—"What a beautiful night!"

"Very," is the laconic and equally original response.

"Tom will miss you very much, Mr. Dynevor."
"I have recommended him to try Mr. Barton; he is a good mathematical scholar."

A shiver runs through me; it cannot be from cold, for my cheeks are burning, and my hands are dry and hot. I give a little start, for my companion's hand is on my arm, and to my amazement he is saying: "I may not see you again, Miss Wyvern; so will you now accept my best wishes for your future happiness?"

"I am sure I am very much obliged to you," I reply, wondering what he means, and at the same time drawing my arm away; "it is very kind of you. I wish you the same."

"Thank you," he says, shortly. "I was not sure before whether or not it was true."

"What?" I ask, feeling more than ever bewildered.

"Ha!" he ejaculates, with a queer little laugh.

"You are like all young ladies. You think it interesting to plead ignorance and innocence. I had fancied you were different."

My cheeks become hotter and hotter, and I feel my spirit rising. How dared he speak so to me! My pride and the fancied wound to my self-respect overcome even my woman's curiosity to know what on earth he is talking about. Drawing my improvised shawl closer around my small person, I raise my head erect, and reply, haughtily and mendaciously: "I assure you I plead neither ignorance nor innocence—I am perfectly aware of what I am talking about, Mr. Dynevor."

He is unfastening the gate, and says, with his head bent over the latch: "I am rather hurried to-night. May I ask you to tell Tom not to mind about the book? Good-bye—good-bye, Polly."

He looks at me as he concludes.

"He turned, and I saw his face all wet in the sweet moonshine."

Yes, as sure as I am a living woman, there are tears on Eustace Dynevor's face, as, hastily pressing my hand, he leaves me standing at the gate, and walks quickly down the road. His strange words and manner puzzle me not a little as I saunter back to the house, all the while wondering why Tom does not come. I walk back again to the gate, and look down the road, but all is silent. I cannot bear to go in just yet, for my brain is in a whirl. Strange, half-pleasurable, half-painful feelings are curiously striving for the mastery in my breast. Still Tom does not appear. Suddenly, in the distance, I hear a whistle and a shout. My blood runs cold with terror. I have a presentiment that something terrible has happened, and for a moment I cannot stir. The whistle and shout are repeated. I hasten quickly up the path, rush through the open door into the drawing-room, and there, to my horror, I see that the long-impending sword has fallen, and that my poor father's long-threatened attack of paralysis has overtaken him!

Oh, the weary days and nights that follow! None but those who have watched with sensibilities sharpened by agonized love can realize the misery of watching the hourly decay of the faculties of a loved one. Day after day passes, and morning and evening the doctor's words are: "He may linger on for an indefinite period, but I can give you no hope of his ever ultimately recovering."

"Will he ever properly recover the use of his senses?" I ask one morning, in anguish.

"Probably not," replies the doctor, with professional reserve.

I sink into an arm-chair, and cover my face with my hands.

"My darling, darling father!" I cry—and my long pent-up feelings break from my control, and I sob passionately—"what shall I do without you?"

"I should like to have further advice," says Dr. Holden, who is a youngish man, thick-set, and red-whiskered. He is a declared admirer of mine; but his impertinently familiar manner are simply unbearable to me.

"Very well," I say, raising my tear-stained face, and seeing the doctor standing opposite to me, with his hands behind his back. "Will you kindly arrange about it yourself? Do anything that will effect some good. O papa—my darling, darling father!" And I burst out sobbing again.

"Come, come, now, Miss Polly," he exclaims, putting his arm around me familiarly, "I wish you would try to keep up your spirits—do, my dear, for my sake."

As he speaks he bends down, and his head is on a level with mine. How I hate him, loathe him for his impertinence! My tears have all ceased, and outraged dignity is my predominate feeling. Starting up, I say, coldly: "Dr. Holden, I am not aware that I ever by my manner gave you reason to think you could presume as you have now just done. I consider you owe me an apology."

There is a tap at the door; the servant enters and says my father is awake, and I am required. I leave the room without speaking, and an hour later say to Tom: "Tom, Dr. Holden says he must have further advice about papa."

To my surprise he does not answer, but quietly eats his cold mutton.

"I wish you would see about it after dinner, Tom; perhaps you ought to call on Dr. Holden."

Still no reply.

"Tom, why don't you answer? Will you see about it?"

He lays down his knife and fork, wipes his mouth with his napkin, fidgets a bit, but yet never looks at me or says a word.

"Of course I fancied you were just as anxious about papa as I am," I remark, a little indignantly. "I wish you would take this matter of the doctor's off my hands."

Tom rests his elbow on the table, and, covering his eyes with his hand, says, in a half-choking voice: "Polly, we have no money."

My heart sinks. I had never thought of that, and I cry, despairingly: "Tom, Tom, what shall we do?"

There is a very miserable look on the poor lad's face as he raises his head and looks at me.

"What do you mean, Tom?"

"If every one had their own, it ought to be in Dynevor's pocket. Polly," he continues, his eyes sparkling, "I love that fellow—do you know what he did to-day?"

"What?"

"He is going away to-morrow, so I went to pay him that five pounds I owed him, and, instead of taking it, he said, 'No, Tom, my boy, I couldn't take it conscientiously. You are all under great expenses; pay me when you are earning for yourself.'"

"And you actually took it!" I exclaim. "You have actually been mean enough to do so!"

"There was no meanness about it," asserts Tom, stoutly; "we want the money desperately. Dynevor is the kindest, truest gentleman I have ever met; had I not thought him so, I could not have accepted the favor. I feel proud that he has trusted me."

I feel alternately hot and cold all over. I do not know whether to be grateful to Mr. Dynevor, and feel glad that it is to him that we are under the compliment, or to resent it as an impertinence. In my heart of hearts I am convinced that it is kindness alone which has actuated him, but my evil spirit of pride rises within me and I say steadily: "Tom, that money must be paid to Mr. Dynevor."

"Then how are we to pay the doctor for papa?" inquires Tom, calmly.

I had forgotten that. Suddenly a thought strikes me; I am on the point of revealing it to Tom, but it at once flashes through my mind that of course he cannot understand why I do not care to feel indebted to Mr. Dynevor. Indeed I am not quite sure myself, except that I have felt latterly rather conscious when in his presence, or on hearing any one talk about him. As I am thus ruminating Tom continues:

"I declare I'm sorry I told you, Polly. Dynevor wanted me to promise that I would not, but I said I always told you everything."

That decides me; evidently Mr. Dynevor wants me for some reason or other to be under an obligation to him.

"Tom, I want to go to Blandminster this afternoon; will you stay with papa until I come back?"

He opens his eyes widely.

"To Blandminster, Polly! Why, I suppose you'll walk the three miles there and back! Let me go—you'll be too tired."

"No, I wish to go myself; I have particular business to attend to."

"Oh, all right; I'll stay with papa. I did intend going to say good-bye to Dynevor, but he said he had an engagement."

After dinner I retire to my own room, and, packing up my gold watch and chain, and a massive gold bracelet—the only valuable piece of jewelry I possess, and which had belonged to my mother—I put on my hat and jacket, and set off for Blandminster. It is a large, old-fashioned cathedral town, with that air of sleepiness and respectability about it seemingly inseparable from an ecclesiastical city. The beauteous old Gothic cathedral stands at the entrance to the town, and, as I near it, I see a few people straggling in. Looking up at the clock-tower, I notice that it wants but a few minutes to three o'clock. I am passionately fond of cathedral music, and seldom can resist the fascination of staying for service whenever I come to Blandminster. To-day I half hesitate. I feel so miserable that I think the music will do me good; yet at the same time conscience tells me that I ought not to stay away from home longer than I can possibly avoid. Half regretfully I make up my mind not to yield to temptation, when two figures emerge from the cloisters and enter the cathedral. They have not seen me, but I have seen them, and recognize one of them to be Eustace Dynevor; the other, a young girl, is leaning on his arm.

A sharp pang shoots through me, and in that moment the true state of my heart is all revealed to me. I feel jealous, madly jealous of Eustace Dynevor's companion, and, stealthily following them into the cathedral, seat myself behind one of the carved oaken screens, whence I can see them without being seen in return.

The anthem is Elvey's exquisite adaptation of the first eleven verses of the fifty-sixth Psalm. Another time, and the rare, sweet harmony would have thrilled me through and through, have set every nerve a-quivering with intense enjoyment, and I should have left the cathedral better and happier than when I had entered. But to-day I can only see that Eustace Dynevor is watching every look of the girl beside him, with a wondrous tenderness in his manner. I cannot help admitting that she is interesting-looking. Rather tall, slight, with an exquisite complexion, and soft, wavy masses of fair, silky hair, simply brushed back beneath her small black hat, she forms a pleasing contrast to her dark, intellectual-looking companion. They seem so tender, so absorbed in each other—and I am so miserable! I feel a tear stealing down my cheek, and it angers me. Pride comes to the rescue, and I ask why should I care? Why—oh, why? At all events I can bear the sight no longer, and before the conclusion of the service leave the cathedral unobserved.

I succeed in disposing of my watch and chain for eleven pounds; the bracelet I keep, thinking a time may come when my wants may be greater. I feel so glad to know that we shall not be under pecuniary obligation to any one—it galls me so. Honest hard work, privation even, I feel I could endure rather than be indebted to mortal man. As I walk down through the town, I am in constant dread of meeting Eustace Dynevor and his companion. Of course it must be the girl for whom he is saving his money up to enable him to marry. There is no sign of them as I pass the cathedral—no sign of life there save a few school-boys in college caps and lappets playing in the cloisters. The clock chimes the quarter to five, and I hurry on, as I have a walk of an hour and a half before me. I soon find myself upon the silent country road, and, recollecting a short cut across the fields, strike off into a by-path. I walk along for about half a mile, when I see a figure advancing in the distance. That it is a man is all I can discover, as I am rather short-sighted; but, as he comes nearer, I recognize my tormentor of the morning, Dr. Holden. I wish to bow and pass on, but he stops and says: "This is very late for you to be out by yourself—let me see you home."

"Thank you, I am not afraid, therefore I need not detain you," I reply, coldly.

"Oh, nonsense! I could not think of allowing you to go all that lonely way by yourself," and turning, he walks beside me.

What can I do? By my manner I show him pretty plainly that I consider the polite attention would have been more honored in the breach than in the observance. He does not seem to take any notice, but chats upon indifferent subjects, and presently asks: "How is your father this evening?"

"He was very weak when I left. I had to go to Blandminster on business, or I should not have left him at all. Tom stayed at home."

"Ah, that's right. You mustn't lose all your good looks by being always cooped up in a sick room. Will you take my arm?"

"No, thank you." How my hands tingle to box his ears!

"Dear me! How dignified you are!" he exclaims, familiarly. "I suppose you are vexed with me still."

I make no reply, but walk on in silence.

"Now just think, little Polly," he continues, "you need not try to conceal from me that you are not well off as regards this world's goods—you are not be nicer to be the mistress of my big house? Eh, little Polly?"

I feel maddened. Yet, because he is attending my darling father, I am afraid to insult him by answering him as his impertinent and ill-bred familiarity deserves. By this time we are come to a gate leading into a small wood about half a mile from home. Dr. Holden does not open the gate, but, leaning his arm upon it, says: "Polly, I have to leave you now, for I must go to a patient. But, remember, I'm not going to be put off by those black looks on your little white face. Of course I know it is all acting—a sensible little girl like you would not think of throwing away such a good offer;" and, suddenly stooping down, he consummates his insolence by kissing me on the cheek.

Speechless with indignation and horror, I gaze at him as he turns and retraces his steps along the path we have just come, and, to my unutterable dismay, I see Eustace Dynevor coming toward me. I know he must have witnessed the whole scene, and my heart dies within me—shame, anger, mortification, all welling up in my breast. Dr. Holden nods curtly to him, and then turning a corner is out of sight. Eustace Dynevor soon overtakes me. I think he merely wishes to raise his hat and pass on, but I hold out my hand to him, saying: "Good-evening, Mr. Dynevor; I am glad to have met you." I do not dare to look up, for I know he is steadily looking at me, and my flaming cheeks and quivering, tell-tale mouth are, no doubt, to him indications of confusion at being caught in the midst of a love-scene.

"I consider myself fortunate to have met you, Miss Wyvern, as this is my last evening here."

He speaks so quietly that I feel almost angry with him. But why should he not? I reflect for a moment—did he not look loving and beloved—whilst I—I—well, never mind!

"I wanted to see you," I say, becoming redder and redder, and stopping in the middle of the woodland path,

"Well," he asks, with an air of kindly interest on his face, "what is it? Can I be of any use to you, Miss Wyvern?"

What a strange anomaly a woman is! Just now I feel his kindliness harder to bear than coldness would be.

"Oh, dear, no!" I reply—rather discourteously, I am afraid. "But—but there there was some misunderstanding between my brother and you about money matters."

I feel I am bungling over the business, and look at him—it is some small satisfaction to see that he looks thoroughly uncomfortable.

"No," he says, quickly, "we have arranged all that. Here you are now nearly at your own gate, so I shall say good-bye."

"No—no! Stop!" I exclaim. "I know all about it. We are very much indebted to you, I am sure; nevertheless you must allow me to pay you—I have the money here;" and I pull my purse out of my pocket, at the same time, in my haste, drawing out the bracelet, too, which falls to the ground. He picks it up, and, holding it in his hand, says, quietly: "The matter is entirely between Tom and me. You have nothing whatever to say to it. What a pretty bracelet! A present, I presume?"

But I am determined not to be put off. I ignore his last remark, and exclaim: "You must take your money—I insist upon it."

"I tell you," he repeats, "it is quite between Tom and me. You have nothing whatever to say to it."

"That is an evasion!" I cry, vehemently, while I feel I am fast losing control over myself. "I could not bear the idea of being indebted to you, so I have procured the money. You must take it."

A strange expression comes over his face as he looks down at me. For a minute he does not speak; then, handing me the bracelet, he asks: "Have you the money with you?"

"Yes;" and I open my purse with nervous, trembling fingers. I count five pounds into his broad palm, and then he says—

"I can quite understand your feeling. One only cares to be indebted to those one loves; and no doubt it is a pleasure to you to be indebted to some one else for this rather than to me. Good-bye," and, raising his hat, he walks down the road and is out of sight in a few minutes.

I stand there thinking. Great Heavens! the meaning of his words at once flashes upon me—he thinks I have borrowed the money from Dr. Holden! In an agony I turn back to the woodland path, and walk backward and forward, trying to quiet my distracted nerves. I know instinctively that I have acted indiscreetly and discourteously in the way in which I have returned the money, but it is all over now and cannot be helped. I know I ought to return to the house, but somehow or other I cannot. The coming shadows are falling thick and fast, and, as I stand at the head of the garden and look toward my home, there seems to be a darker shadow than any of the others brooding over it. My nerves have been wound up to such a pitch that I seem to feel everything with a painful intensity, so much so that, when I meet Tom half-way down the garden walk, and give one look into his white, scared face, I throw myself into his arms, crying: "Tom, Tom, what is it? I know something has happened."

He clasps me closer and closer to him, and says, with a great sob in his voice: "O Polly—little Polly!"

"What is it—what is it?" I almost shriek. "Is papa worse?"

He still holds me in his arms, and says, brokenly: "Polly—Polly darling, there are only you and I now!"

It is all over. A fortnight has passed since our darling father was laid in the little churchyard. Tom and I, and our kind friend Mr. Belton, the solicitor, are looking over our business matters. There is not much to settle, for, after everything is paid, we find we have only been three and four hundred pounds in the world. This Tom insists on being settled on me for my own and sole use, and declares his intention of at once looking out for a situation.

"Tom," I say, "I wish you would take the money, and go on with your examination. I know you have set your heart upon going to Woolwich."

"No, Polly, it must be settled upon you. A man can rough it; but it is not right for a woman to have to face the world, if she has any mankind to look after her."

"Bravo, Tom!" exclaims Mr. Belton. "But recollect, my boy, a few hundred pounds will soon melt away."

"I want Polly to come and live with me. I'll work for her, and be glad to do so."

"I know you would, Tom," I say; "but I could not think of being a burden on you. I'll go out as a governess."

"You shall not!" he exclaims, decidedly. "You must come and live with me, Polly, if we can by any means manage it."

I rebel, but to no purpose. If I will not share his home, Tom threatens to emigrate, and never to write to me—says even that he will go to the bad. Finally he overcomes all my scruples, and we agree to stand by each other at all risks.

Heaven is very good to us. It has taken one home from us, but it soon puts us in the way of getting another. A friend has procured Tom a good situation on a railway in London, and thither we remove one bright May day, leaving, not without many bitter tears, the pleasant home where we were born and had spent our childhood and early youth.

And thus it comes to pass that Tom and I are domesticated in lodgings out near Holloway. The days feel very long and dreary, and I am sometimes very lonely as I sit over my sewing. We have kept our old piano, and one or two other beloved articles of furniture, and I strive to make our little sitting-room as home-like as I possibly can. We are very poor, and I have to exhaust every economical device to eke out our small income. Quietly and uneventfully the days pass. We know no one, and nobody seems to care to know us. Who ever does care to know the poor? Tom goes out early in the morning, and does not return until seven in the evening, consequently I am very much alone. I feel my spirits sinking because of the loneliness and monotony of my life, but I make an effort to be cheerful, and show the poor, tired, good-hearted fellow a bright face when he returns jaded after his day's work.

But Christmas-time comes round, and Tom does not return so early. They are very busy at the railway-station, and sometimes it is between nine and ten o'clock when he comes home. Nasty, drizzly, miserable weather it is, so unpleasant and uninviting that I do not even care to go out for a walk through the muddy streets. It is just four days before Christmas Day, and I am busied with my small festive preparations. A thick fog is coming on, so that I am obliged to light the lamp, although it is only three o'clock in the afternoon; and, as I go to the window to draw down the blind, I see a cab drive up to the door. "No one for me," I think, with a sigh; "no chance of any one coming to see us!" and I feel my lips quiver, a little as the desolation of our lot seems to flash the more vividly across my mind at this season when everybody seems to be so happy. Tying on a colored calico apron, I sit down to my task of stoning raisins, when there is a tap at the door, and the untidy lodging-house servant inserts her unkempt head, saying: "A gentleman to see you, miss."

"It is the curate," I think; and then add aloud: "Ask him to come in."

Before I have time to take off my huge apron, the visitor enters, and Eustace Dynevor, attired in deep mourning, stands before me. For a minute I am thunderstruck, and cannot say anything. Laying his hat upon the table, he comes over, and, taking my two hands in his, says: "I am delighted to see you again."

"Thank you," I answer, whilst my hands lie nervously in his firm grasp. "How did you learn where we were living?"

He ignores my question, and, still holding my hands in his, inquires: "Are you glad to see me?"

"I am always glad to see an old friend," I reply, evasively.

He drops my hands suddenly.

"I went to Tom's office to-day and saw him, Miss Wyvern"—he looks wistfully at me as he speaks. "My heart was very sore the last time I saw you; I was sure the report that you were engaged to be married to Dr. Holden was true. Tom has told me the truth to-day."

I had told Tom all about the episode with Dr. Holden which Mr. Dynevor had witnessed.

I cannot say anything, but, as I stand there, not daring to look up at Eustace Dynevor, the thought of what I had witnessed in the old cathedral comes vividly before my mind's eye. He continues: "I have come here to-day to ask you to be my wife; I love you very dearly, and have done so for a long time."

But the fair face of the girl I saw with him in the cathedral rises up before me again, and my woman's pride urges me to say: "Thank you very much for the honor you have done me, Mr. Dynevor, but"—I say the words with an effort—"I may as well tell you the truth. I heard you were going to be married; I saw a lady with you at Blandminster, and—and"—I conclude hastily and ignominiously—"I don't care to share your affections."

He replies, quietly: "I am glad you saw her. She is dead now, Polly," and he again takes my hands. "That was my poor imbecile sister, whom I have been working to support ever since my father died, three years ago. Whilst she lived I did not feel free to marry—I could not afford it; but now, Polly, if you can care for me, will you be my wife? There is no one in the wide world to divide my affection with you."

I hang my head for very shame, and say, diffidently: "I am afraid I am not good enough—I have been so proud and passionate toward you."

"Then the very best thing you can do is to let me take you under my charge, and see if I cannot improve you. Will you?" he asks, seating me on the little horse-hair sofa, and sitting down beside me.

I feel the blood rushing all over my face and neck as he puts his arm around me—yet I cannot answer him. He repeats his question two or three times before I can so far conquer my pride as to say: "I am afraid that, if you take me, I shall be prouder than ever."

When Tom comes home to tea he endeavors to get up an appearance of surprise at seeing Eustace Dynevor seated by our fireside; but the attempt is so transparent that neither of us is deluded into the idea that it is anything more than he was quite prepared for. Ah, it is an evening of evenings, ever to be remembered in my life; and, as Eustace says farewell to me that night, his fond, earnest words sink deep into my heart, and I indeed feel "PROUD LITTLE POLLY!"

RACHEL DILLOWAY'S SON.*

BY MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR.

CHAPTER XV.

IT had been a hot, breathless day in June; exceptionally hot, people said, even for that exceptionally hot season. They said, also, that every one was out of town; Linborough, driven by the heat, having fled earlier than usual to the mountains or the sea.

But there was a vast, tolling multitude left, even after "every one" had departed. The densely-crowded streets showed no diminution of their hurrying throngs. One could but wonder still, standing at the crossings, where the long procession came from which, like Tennyson's brook, seemed to flow on forever. It was only the favored few, after all, who were able to flee from the burden and heat of the day, and find rest in green pastures and beside still waters. "Every one," in Linborough, as in other cities, meant but a very small fragment of the mighty whole.

But now the sun had gone down in a blaze of glory; and to such of the streets as the sea-breeze could reach, it stole with a breath of coolness and healing. For Linborough, herself, is a city by the sea; and she sends her servants, the ships, whither-soever she will, saying to one "go," and he goeth, and to another "come," and he cometh.

The windows of a moderately-sized, comfortably-furnished room in the third story of a house in one of these streets, were thrown open. Also those of a bed-room in the rear. A large chintz-covered arm-chair had been wheeled between them, and in it reclined a lady in a white dressing-gown. She had evidently been very beautiful once; and even now, when care and suffering had left their indelible characters upon her face, it had a delicate, flower-like loveliness about it that won you in spite of yourself. For it was not a noble face. It was rather weak than otherwise. The small mouth quivered helplessly, and the delicate chin gave little promise of strength. The eyes, blue as any forget-me-nots, blue as lapis-lazuli, blue as the sapphire skies of June, had a trick of filling with tears on the smallest provocation; and when she spoke—as she did presently to a little girl, who was hanging out of the window trying to catch a whiff of the salt sea-breeze—her voice, low and sweet as the tinkling of a silver bell, was yet plaintive and querulous.

"Do you see anything of Rose?" she said. "It is strange she does not come back. It is almost time for me to take my drops."

"Oh, no, mamma!" answered little Daisy, glancing up and down the street, however. "It isn't time for her to come yet. You know she did not go out till after sunset, and it is quite a long walk. Shall I get the cordial? Rosy showed me how to fix it."

"How to prepare it, you mean. You are growing careless as to your speech, and forming bad habits, Daisy. But I do not wonder—tossed about as you have been for the last two years. I did not think, once, that my children—"

"There! don't fret about it, mamma, dear," said Daisy, springing to her mother's side, and kissing her forehead. "I will try to speak correctly; but I rather like being tossed about. It is good fun to travel round. Shall I get the drops?"

"Not yet. Fan me, Daisy. It seems to me there is not a breath of air."

"Oh, but it's so much cooler than it was an hour ago!" said the child, cheerily, picking up the fan she had piled half the day. "Seems to me there's a pretty good breeze comes in here between these two windows. A corner room is such a comfort, Rosy says!"

"Where was Rose going? It is not proper for a young girl like her to be in the street alone at this hour. It is growing dark."

* Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1874, by MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

"Only in here, mamma. It's real light out of doors, and the sky is as red as—as fire!" she added quickly, having been at a loss for a simile. "She was going to see Mr. Stuart about the stocks and things."

"Why, how foolish of her!" exclaimed Mrs. Sterling, putting wearily back one or two golden-brown curls that escaped from beneath her cap of fine old lace. "I should have told her better if she had consulted me. Mr. Stuart will not be in his office at this time of day."

"Oh, she knows that—Rosey does," said Daisy, eagerly. "He—that is—Mr. Stuart—"

"Well—what? Why do you not go on, child?"

The "child" laughed merrily. "I was just thinking," she said, "how pretty you look when the wind the fan makes—so" suiting the action to the word—"blows your hair back. It all goes into little rings like grape-vine tendrils. Mine is just as straight as a shoe-string!" and Daisy ran her fingers scornfully through the heavy black hair that fell like a cloud upon her shoulders. "I wish you would let me put it in a net, mamma, and have it out of the way."

"Never mind about the hair now," observed Mrs. Sterling. "What were you going to say about Mr. Stuart?"

"Oh, yes! I forgot what I was talking about. He told her to come to his house after it got cooler; it would be so hot in the office during business hours. I think it was very kind of him," remarked Daisy, wisely.

"But it does not seem to be quite the thing," said Mrs. Sterling, with a distressed face, speaking to herself rather than to the child. "Rose is so unconventional. She might have sent for Mr. Stuart or—"

"Here she comes!" cried Daisy, with a little impulsive jump up and down. "I hear her coming up-stairs. There, mamma! She's back all right—before dark—and in time to give you the drops and everything! That's good!"

Little optimist that she was, it was hard to find anything, or any train of circumstances, that were not "good" in Daisy's eyes.

It was not a blush rose that came in a moment after, and hardly a white rose, either. The heat, or something else, had driven all the lovely, bright coloring out of Rose Sterling's cheeks, and drawn dark circles about her eyes. She went through into the next room to lay off her bonnet without speaking.

Presently she re-appeared, and took the fan out of Daisy's hand.

"There!" she said. "Let me take the fan. I have made a discovery. Daisy, do you run down-stairs, and through the straight, narrow hall to the right. Open the door at the end, and you will find a plot of grass as big as a pocket-handkerchief, with a fountain the size of a penny trumpet in the middle. But it is better than nothing; and there are two or three well-behaved children playing there. Go and take a good run before you go to bed, Elsie. But be sure not to go into the street."

Daisy bounded away, while her mother looked up anxiously.

"Is it best, Rose? Are you sure they are children of nice families? Coming here as strangers, we must be careful what acquaintances we make."

"Oh, they are just the children belonging to the house," Rose answered, with a look in her eyes as if she were thinking of something else. "Daisy is such a dear little thing I am not afraid to trust her; and she must have the fresh air for a few minutes after this hot day, mother dear."

"I know it; but the trouble is she always picks up such queer acquaintances. She will come in, I don't doubt, to tell us what a treasure she has found in the washerwoman's little boy or girl. She makes no proper distinctions."

Rose smiled, remembering that one of the children playing by the fountain was a laughing, bright-eyed fairy she had seen in the laundry the day before. But she said nothing of this. Glancing at a watch that hung by the window, she prepared her mother's cordial, and wheeled her chair still closer to the window.

"Is not that refreshing?" she said. "Mother, I have been to see Mr. Stuart."

"Yes, I know. If you had not gone while I was sleeping, I should have advised you not to go to his house."

"Not to go to his house?" asked Rose. "But why? He told me to; and it is very much nearer than the office."

"Why, Mrs. Stuart has not called upon you; and she must have thought it an odd procedure on your part. You should have waited, as a stranger, to receive her call."

"Oh, my dear mother, it was a mere matter of business!" cried Rose. "Mrs. Stuart is nothing to me, nor I to her. I don't suppose she noticed me any more than if I had been a fly, though she passed through the room once or twice. Mr. Stuart is very courteous and gentlemanly; but I have no idea his wife intends to call on her husband's clients. Where should we receive her if she did?" mentally contrasting the elegantly-appointed house she had just left, with their two small rooms in a second-rate lodging-house.

"Well, I am sure I see no reason why she should not call," said Mrs. Sterling, her eyes filling. "Have we fallen so low that even our lawyer's wife looks down on us? But we are ladies, born and bred, Rose—ladies by divine right. Never forget that, child. The very best blood in the land ran in the veins of your grandmother and your great-grandmother—and in those of generations farther back. And it is equally true of the male line. Little did I dream when I was at your age, of ever seeing a day like this, Rosamond!"

When Mrs. Sterling called her "Rosamond," Rose always knew it was time to change the subject. She was at such times, to her mother, not simple Rose Sterling, but the embodied essence of all the knights and dames of high degree who had so long been dust and ashes. So she said, soothingly, as she removed her mother's slippers, and prepared to give the dainty limbs the nightly rubbing that was so essential to her comfort: "Yes, mamma, I'll remember it all. Your daughters can never forget that they are ladies. But aren't you getting tired, dear? Isn't it time for you to go to bed?"

"You have not told me what Mr. Stuart said, yet," was the answer.

"No more have I," said Rose, lightly, though a swift shadow passed over her face. "But that was because you conjured up the ghost of my great-grandmother, and its mighty presence drove other thoughts out of my head. There is such an incongruity between it and law papers! Let us leave Mr. Stuart till to-morrow, mamma. It is not well to attend to business at this time of night. See! it is almost nine o'clock."

"You had better call Daisy," said Mrs. Sterling, wearily, "and then I will be undressed. I have not a bit of strength, Rose. I do not know what is going to become of me."

"Oh, Daisy and I are going to nurse you up, and you will be well before you know it. This is a sort of reaction after the fatigue of the voyage. Linborough seems to be a pleasant place, mother. We will make ourselves very comfortable after a little."

"Oh, I don't know!" sighed Mrs. Sterling. "Everything seems so raw and crude, after Paris. I am afraid I shall not like the North, any way; but it would be too dreadful to go back to Charleston with our fallen fortunes. If we could only have poor old Maum Chloe and Alphonse it would be such a blessing."

"Yes," said Rose, with a quick thought of the skilful, tender hands and willing feet that had ministered to her childish wants. "It seems as if we needed them, here among strangers, a great deal more than we did when we had them. But there's no use fretting," she added, brightly, "and here's dear little Daisy, looking as fresh as a dew-drop. Bring the dressing-case, dear, and brush mamma's hair, while I make the bed ready. She is going to sleep like a top to-night."

But Rose did not sleep, though she compelled herself to be quiet, through the long hours of feverish unrest, lest she should disturb her invalid mother, who occupied a single bed in the same room. Daisy slept the sweet, unconscious sleep of childhood, hardly stirring all night long. Rose was thankful, for her sake, even while she almost envied her, listening to her quiet breathings. She, herself, had heard bad news that day; to explain which it is necessary to go back a little.

Mrs. Sterling was the widowed daughter of a Southern gentleman of large wealth and assured position. She was an only daughter; and after the death of her husband, she had returned with Rose and Daisy—the latter a mere babe—to her father's roof. A few still years passed, and then came the bitter, fratricidal strife which neither the North, nor the South, can ever hope to forget. God grant that they may yet be able to forgive—on both sides—heartily and generously!

Her father was an old man then, "well stricken in years," too old and too feeble even for conscription. He was too old, alas! to feel the thrilling of State pride, the glow of eager, martial enthusiasm that might else have upheld and inspired him, as it did so many younger men, in the midst of what seemed almost the "wreck of matter and the crush of worlds." Bloodshed was frightful to him; the war was a haunting, abiding horror. He was willing to flee to the ends of the earth, if so he could escape it and find rest.

So he gathered up the poor, scattered remnants of his once large fortune, and, with his daughter and her two children—his last remaining son having fallen on the battle-field—he managed to run, the blockade, and fled to Paris.

But the anxiety and fatigue, and the hasty sundering of all old ties, was too much for his waning strength; and he died in a few months. Until the close of the war, Mrs. Sterling and her daughters led a nomadic, yet quiet life, drifting from place to place as circumstances led; while the cruise of oil slowly, but steadily diminished.

Mrs. Sterling had never stood alone, and it was small wonder that now she stared blankly into the future, wondering what was to be done when her funds were all gone. There was still enough to keep them from the immediate fear of want, but little beyond that. She was not the woman who could have commanded fate, even in her best days. Now she was really ill; wasting away, without any apparent disease. Life had been too hard for her—that was all.

But, one day, a memory came to her like a flash of light. She remembered that in the old, prosperous, peaceful days, her father had invested several thousand dollars—twenty thousand, she believed—in copper-mining stocks. He had considered it a dead loss after the war broke out; and never gave it a thought in his consideration of ways and means.

But now that the war was over, was not the matter worth looking into? At all events, she was tired of wandering. She had a longing for home, even though it should be a home at the North. America was her native land, after all. She would sail for Linborough, which she believed to be the head-quarters of the companies in which her father had invested.

In all this, Rose, who was fast growing into womanhood, heartily concurred—and here they were.

The problem that Rose Sterling tried to solve that night was indeed a hard one, and one that might have momentous consequences. How could she tell her poor mother that the hope that had buoyed her up through the tedious, wearisome journey across the Atlantic was a false one? She had sought out Mr. Stuart, whose name Mrs. Sterling remembered as that of a lawyer with whom her father had formerly had dealings, and had placed the investigation of the matter in his hands. She had seen him that evening and he had told her—what? That the title to the stocks was all right; there was no question as to that; but that the companies were declaring no dividends—had, in fact, declared none since the beginning of the war.

And it was to those dividends, past, present and prospective, that her mother looked for the means of livelihood.

Mr. Stuart had seen her trouble. The sweet, transparent face of the young girl was a true interpreter.

"I am very sorry I have no better news for you, my dear Miss Sterling," he said. "The stocks will, doubtless, be good for something sometime."

"But when?" she asked. "How soon?"

He shook his head. "That is a hard question to answer. The companies are largely involved, and their expenses are heavy. The stockholders do not look for dividends for some years, I understand."

For some years! But that might be too late. Rose played with the fringe of her parasol. At length she looked up.

"I know absolutely nothing about business, Mr. Stuart, and it is very probable that I shall not use business-like phrases. But my grandfather must have bought the stocks—and can they not be sold again? We need to realize something from them at once."

Mr. Stuart ran his fingers through his iron-gray hair, and then stroked his full beard meditatively for a minute or two before he replied.

"It would not be wise to sell at present," he said at last. "In fact, it would be very unwise. If you were to throw the stocks upon the market now, you would not realize one thousand dollars from the whole investment. Whereas, as I said, they will probably be valuable some time. I should earnestly advise you to keep them. A present sale would be ruinous."

Rose bowed herself out. But there were no wings on her feet, as she walked slowly homeward. Her mother had felt quite rich since the thought of the stocks occurred to her, and the petty economies of her daily life had seemed more than ever distasteful. She had always lived, until this trouble came, in a large, free, open-handed way. It seemed ignoble to her to count sixpences and to reckon closely. She hated all scheming and contriving, and the thought of the almighty dollar. She wanted to spend it, rather than to study how to save it. When they left the steamer the other day, if it had not been for Rose's entreaties she would have gone at once to the highest-priced hotel in the city. Why should they scrimp and trouble themselves? There were the stocks, to be sure! And very likely the original investment had doubled by this time. She did not see why they need go to a cheap hotel.

But Rose, young as she was, had more than once proved herself stronger than her mother, and a better manager. Gradually the child had become the financial agent of their little firm. She had learned to step in between her mother and the annoyances, and petty cares, and economies, that were so grievous to her. She loved her with a pitying, protecting love; even while she was herself unconscious how entirely she had ceased to lean upon her. She was proud of her, too, admiring her delicate, fragile loveliness, and the very refinement of ladyhood that hung about her like a faint perfume.

As she walked homeward in the dusk twilight, it seemed to her that all the dead grandfathers and grandmothers thronged about her, holding up warning hands, and oppressing her with the very weight of their long-buried magnificence.

"Oh, dear! if we had never been anybody—that is, anybody in particular—it would be so much easier!" sighed our Rose. "It is a little too hard to be poor, and yet have to carry the glory of all one's dead and gone ancestors on one's shoulders."

CHAPTER XVI.

SHE fell into a broken sleep toward morning; but when she awoke her thoughts had crystallized. If it were possible to avoid it, she would not tell her mother the true state of the case at present. She would wait until she seemed stronger. Always before, the sea had been Mrs. Sterling's tonic. But this time it had been cruel to her, and tried her sorely. Rose thought she would rally before long, and be better able to hear of the downfall of her hopes. Such concealment would have been impossible in most cases; but in this it would not be so very difficult. The mother did not like to trouble herself with business matters, and she was always glad to drop her burdens. If Rose told her that some delay seemed unavoidable, but that Mr. Stuart thought it would all be right in the end, it would satisfy her, and she would not be likely to ask troublesome questions.

But, meanwhile, something must be done. Rose lay awake in the gray stillness of the dawn, thinking. Their capital had slowly dwindled since her grandfather's death, until now their whole income amounted to less than six hundred dollars a year; enough to keep them from actually starving, of course—but a mere pittance, a beggarly pittance, when Mrs. Sterling's expensive habits were considered. She did not know how to be poor. She had not the slightest idea of the true meaning of the words economy and self-denial in little things. She could be made to understand that certain costly luxuries were entirely out of her reach, but she could not comprehend the fact that there were but one hundred cents in a dollar. Certain things were necessities. She had always had them, and of course she always must have them. Why, how could people exist without dainty toilet appurtenances, delicate perfumes and all choice appliances of personal comfort? One might as well be dead.

She was no epicure; but her appetite was dainty and fastidious. Whatever was placed before her must be of the choicest. If she wanted hot-house grapes, or strawberries out of season, why should she not have them? What was a little fruit, that she must deny herself? If she wanted cream, and wine, and fresh eggs, and the daintiest morsels of meat, how could she get along without them? Surely these things were necessities, not luxuries.

Rose did not say all this deliberately to herself as she lay there with her face turned toward the east, where the sky was flushing in the early dawn. She only felt it, in her inner consciousness. She never reasoned about her mother, or with her. Indeed, she took things for granted very much as Mrs. Sterling herself did. Mother must have certain accustomed comforts. That was settled. The only question was as to the means of getting them. More money must be had—but where was it coming from?

Girls no older than herself earned it—worked, actually worked, for money. She had seen them in the early morning hours flocking to sewing-rooms, to factories, to shops. But what could she do? Teach? Teach what? She spoke French as well as she did English; for when they first went abroad she had had three years in the best Parisian schools. But she doubted whether she could teach it—for she had not studied it with that object in view. Music? She shook her head. Drawing? Painting in water colors? The child went over the whole list, her face growing blanker each moment.

"You don't know enough to teach, Rose Sterling," she said, finally, with a firm compression of her lips. "You know a good many things pretty well; but you don't know anything perfectly. So don't be a humbug, and try to do what you can't do."

She smiled somewhat grimly, thinking of the grandmothers and the great-grandmothers. The miniature of one of them, painted by Malbone early in the century, stood on her mother's dressing-table now, in a little gilded shrine—a dainty creature on whom the winds had never blown too roughly; with powdered hair rolled back from her white forehead, and one long curl falling coquettishly on the ivory neck. She wore a purple velvet bodice, curiously clasped with antique jewels. What had life been to her, Rose wondered? Had it all been as fair and bright as, it seemed to Rose, it must have been with no perplexing money troubles, no anxious questionings such as these that had driven the slumber from her own young eyelids?

"Poor mother!" sighed Rose, at last. "It is so much harder for her than for Daisy and me. We have not lived as long as she has, and we are used to it!"

Rather an enigmatical sentence, I know. But it is just what the girl said. Does it need to be translated to your comprehension?

She had no false pride—and yet—and yet! All the traditions of her family were opposed to the thought of earning money. That is, by its women. The men had gone on adding to their ancestral fortunes in all grand, lordly ways, but no one of them even, had ever earned a dollar by actual work. They had "invested," and "speculated," and sent ships to sea, even as Antonio sent his. Their names, like his, were known "on the Rialto." But of the actual heaviness of the primal curse—if curse it was—they knew absolutely nothing. Was it any wonder that their ghosts seemed to stand in Rose's way, and to make the path harder and darker?

But something must be done, and that immediately. They must not encroach farther upon their small capital, and they could not live on their income.

Just then Mrs. Sterling stirred.

"Rose," she said, softly, "are you awake?"

"Yes, dear," was the answer, as Rose sprang up.

"What will you have, mother?"

"Hand me my rose-cream, please. My lips are parched. And won't you just wet this handkerchief with cologne. Not that. The other flask. I wish we had got more of it in Paris, for I doubt if we can find as good an article here. You must inquire the next time you go out, dear. Do the shops look as if they were good for anything? Oh, I forgot! Did you get the grapes last night?"

"It was so nearly dark when I left Mr. Stuart's that I did not like to go after them," was the answer. "But here is an orange. Shall I peel it for you?"

Her mother looked at her, as she bent over the bed, arranging the pillows.

"Haven't you slept?" she asked. "You look pale and gray in this light. I hope this climate is not going to ruin your complexion. You must try the rose-cream. And, Rose, you must be careful about your hands. I do not like to see your forefinger pricked like a seamstress'. Yes, I'll have just one little morsel of the orange. There, dear! now go and lie down again, and try to get another nap."

She obeyed. That is, she laid her head upon the pillow again.

Rose-cream, fragrant waters, delicate fruits, dainty complexion, fair, white hands, that, like the lilies of the field, toiled not nor spun! All these stood for so much in her mother's thought of life, and they symbolized more. And she was too frail, and had lived too many years, fair and flower-like as she looked, to learn new ways of thinking and feeling now. She did not like to see Rose's finger pricked like a seamstress'. How would she bear it, then, if Rose should speak of trying to find some real work to do, that would put her in the class of working-women? And the doctor on the steamer had told Rose that Mrs. Sterling required the very tenderest care; that all perplexities and annoyances should be kept away from her, and that she must not be allowed to worry! Would it not be better to sell the stocks even for a thousand dollars, and use the money for her mother's comfort as long as it lasted? But she might live many years—and when the money was gone—what then? No; Mr. Stuart was right. The stocks must not be sold. They might, in time, prove a sure support for her mother's declining years; and they might educate little Daisy.

Mrs. Sterling went to sleep again, and Rose got up, wearied with much thinking. Thinking that, after all, had settled but one question. Whatever she did, she must do without her mother's knowledge. It might be necessary to take Daisy into her confidence; but she knew she could trust her.

It is needless to tell of the weary days that followed. A stranger in a strange place, every door seemed locked. She would have been willing to go into a shop—I am not sure but she would have been willing to go into somebody's kitchen, little as she knew of the culinary art. But how could she? Every day her mother grew feebler and yet more feeble. She could not leave her, even to try to earn the comforts she needed. Could she not get law papers to copy? It was hard to go to Mr. Stuart, but she went.

With the thought of the stately gentleman who had been his client so many years before still vividly impressed upon him, it never occurred to Mr. Stuart that the young lady—his granddaughter—wished the copying for herself. She belonged to “the class of Vere de Vere.” She had been travelling abroad with her mother; and they had come to Linborough to investigate the affairs of the mining companies. He supposed that she came to him in behalf of some one else—and—he had plenty of protégés of his own. There were soldiers’ widows and soldiers’ daughters looking for such work constantly. So he made suave and courteous excuse, and advised her to go to Pleader & Co.

But Pleader & Co.—for she spoke boldly in her own behalf here—desired to see a specimen of her handwriting, and seated her at a desk forthwith.

“She’s a mighty pretty girl,” said some one in a loud aside, adding an oath by way of emphasis.

What wonder was it that Rose, after one or two vain attempts to guide the pen they had given her, dropped it in despair? With flaming cheeks and the tread of a Juno she swept out of the office.

As she was going home, however—home meaning their lodgings in E. Street—almost despairing, and wholly disheartened, her eye was caught by a box of artificial flowers in a window. A sudden thought struck her, and she went in.

“Where do you get your flowers, madame?” she asked, without giving herself time to think. “Are they made here?”

“In this country?” with a little toss of the head.

“Ah, no! they are imported. We keep nothing but the real French. Do you wish to order, miss?” and the speaker lifted a cluster of pansies, bending in shape one of the velvet petals.

“Not to-day,” she answered. “But do you happen to have any American flowers in the shop? I should like to see them.”

The shop-woman moved languidly to the lower end of the room, and languidly reached for a box in an out-of-the-way corner.

“That is the best we can do for you,” she said, indifferently. “We never think of showing them.”

The handsomely-dressed young lady who deliberately preferred American flowers to the best imported, could not be worth putting herself out of the way for.

“I do not wish to purchase,” answered Rose, looking up with a bright blush, and a smile that went straight to the woman’s heart. “Do not think me impertinent, but I want to ask you a question or two. May I?”

“Certainly.” What was the young lady driving at?

“What do your imported flowers cost you? What do you have to pay, for instance, for a wreath like this?” and she took up a long, trailing spray of tea-roses with their shaded leaves.

“We are not often asked as plain a question as that,” said the woman, smiling; “and we don’t often answer when we are. But I’m willing to tell you, for I see you are in earnest, and not trying to beat us down.”

For the good of the trade, her next words shall remain unwritten. But Rose heard them.

“I asked,” she said, hesitating a little, as she toyed with a pond-lily bud, “because I can make flowers myself—real ‘French’ flowers—as good as any here, if not better. I learned in Paris.”

“You don’t say! Well, really! Just as an amusement, I suppose? To my mind, they are ever so much prettier than the wax-flowers young ladies make such a fuss over.”

Rose hesitated a moment, and her color deepened.

“I—I should like to make some for you, if you would let me,” she said. “I would engage that they should cost you no more than these; and it might be a convenience, sometimes, to be able to get what you need at very short notice.”

Mrs. Morrison made no answer, as she carefully re-arranged the box of flowers. She was thinking. She had not much faith in young ladies’ work, done “just for fun,” like their crotchet and embroidery. It didn’t amount to much generally. But then—there was that wreath of blue violets that Miss Blanche Tremaine had set her heart upon for Wednesday night; and she—Mrs. Morrison—knew there were none to be had in the city. And it was going to be such a disappointment to one of her best customers.

“See here!” she said at length, bringing her hand down emphatically. “I’ve a notion to try you. Could you make a wreath of violets like this”—showing a single flower, the only one left in the shop—“say three-quarters of a yard long, and have it done by four o’clock, Wednesday?”

“Yes,” said Rose; “and I should be so glad to do it.”

“Very well, then. I’ll tell you what I’ll do. Such a wreath is wanted for a young lady’s coming-out ball, and I cannot get it in season. You may make one, and, if it suits, I’ll pay you all it’s worth—every cent. But you must not get tired of it, and disappoint us!”

You see she still thought it was a mere whim, a girlish notion on the part of Rose, some frolic or wager she was determined to carry out; and she had not much hope that the flowers would suit.

“Never fear,” Rose answered, with a brighter face than she had worn for many a day. “You shall have your wreath, if I sit up all night to finish it. You do not think me in sober earnest; but I am. I must earn some money, and I want work. If the flowers please you, will you give me more to do?”

“Bless your heart, yes!” said Mrs. Morrison, warmly. “I’d full as lief pay you as those foreign folks. But I shall have to say they’re ‘French’ flowers, or I can’t sell ‘em.”

Rose did not hear the last sentence. She had nodded a swift good-bye, and was out of the shop.

One summer in Paris, a young girl noted for her skill in imitating every flower that grows, and who supported herself by her beautiful handiwork, lived in a room above theirs. She was a pretty, dainty creature, who seemed to have caught a certain airy grace from her own roses and lilies, and the quick sympathies of girlhood drew her and Rose together. Rose used to spend hours in Marie’s chamber, watching her deft fingers as they fluttered among snowy and crimson and violet petals, by the mere magic of their touch waking them into life and beauty.

"I believe I could do it myself," she said, one day. "It seems easy when you do it."

"Try it, then, ma belle," answered Marie, with a slow smile, as she drew her head critically on one side to mark the shading of an ivy leaf. "Try it. It is truly not so hard when one knows how."

Then the pretty work went on, week after week, until Marie declared she could hardly tell Rose's from her own; and more than once, when she had been overwhelmed with orders, Rose had helped her, and no one had known the difference.

Rose remembered all this, as she hastened homeward, and wondered she had not thought of flower-work before. She had brought with her all the curious, quaint little tools and instruments she had used with Marie, and a quantity of choice material—all she would need for the present.

"And I have Marie's address, and can order more, if I need," she said. "Why, nothing could be better!" Rose felt very happy, very rich that night. Her finger-tips tingled with eagerness to begin their task.

"What in the world are you going to do, Rose?" asked her mother, an hour afterward, as the girl was arranging her materials on a little table.

"Oh, I am going to see if I have forgotten how to make blue violets," she answered. "Marie would be sorry if I should neglect the pretty art she taught me. I wonder where she is to-day!" and asking no more questions, Mrs. Sterling's thoughts wandered away to the Boulevards and Les Champs Elysees.

Rose was out of practice, and the work went slowly at first. But after a while her old deftness returned, and by noon of Wednesday the wreath was finished. She laid it in a little box and took it to Mrs. Morrison. Her cheek flushed and her heart beat painfully as that lady lifted the cover.

"Why, it's lovely!" she cried. "It's just perfect. See here, Marthy! we never had so pretty a wreath of blue flowers in the shop. Blues are hard to find, you know," she added, by way of explanation, and as a half apology for her enthusiasm. "Miss Blanche will be delighted, and I'm real glad you've succeeded so well. But what's the matter? Marthy, get a chair, quick!"

Rose was tired, excited and overwrought. She had slept little for two nights, and she had been haunted, after the first warm glow had passed, by the dread of failure; by the fear that, after all, her work might not "suit." It was small wonder that now, coming out of the hot streets into the shady little shop, and being so suddenly relieved of her anxiety, her head swam, her lips turned white, and she clung to the counter for support.

"Marthy" brought the chair, and Mrs. Morrison a glass of water.

"Here, taste this," she said, removing Rose's hat, "and I'll put some on top of your head. It's the heat, I guess," and she suited the action to the word. "'Tain't a stroke, is it? I'm dreadful afraid of sunstrokes."

But, meanwhile, a few bright drops had forced their way into Rose's eyes, and so relieved in some degree the pressure on heart and brain. She could smile again.

"It is nothing, thank you," she said, brushing away the tears. "Only I am tired and a little foolish, perhaps. I am not ill in the least, Mrs. Morrison," seeing that lady still looked anxious, partly on Rose's account and partly on her own. It would be awkward to have the young lady faint away, or anything, right there in the shop.

Kind-hearted she was, too, and motherly. She could not help feeling an interest in this young flower-girl, who seemed to have dropped down out of the stars, as she said to herself, "just in time to make Miss Blanche Tremaine's wreath." She was not without her own little morsel of curiosity, either.

"I guess this is about the first money you ever earned, my dear," she said, as she gave her the pay for the flowers. "You don't look much as if you'd been brought up to work for a living."

"But it is not the last I shall earn, I hope and believe," said Rose, evasively. "Which shall I make first, Mrs. Morrison, the orange-blossoms or the forget-me-nots?"

For Mrs. Morrison, fully appreciating the rare beauty and delicacy of her work, had already given her further orders.

"Oh, I don't care; suit yourself. They are both for the same wedding. The bridesmaids are going to wear forget-me-nots, they say."

Rose's heart bounded exultantly as she went home with her first earnings in her pocket. I doubt if the dainty beauty in the gilded shrine had ever felt any richer. There is a pleasant sense of power in knowing one can earn something, even if it be by making muslin roses and velvet pansies. She stopped only long enough to buy a few real, fragrant flowers for her mother's table, and some clusters of white and purple grapes, and hurried on, seeking the shady side of the street.

Daisy met her at the door, holding up her finger. "Hush!" she whispered. "Mamma is asleep yet."

"That's strange," said Rose, softly. "O Daisy, it's so warm out! You don't know anything about it here. Hasn't mother waked since I went away? No? What a quiet little nurse you must have been, Dot."

"She just stirred once, and made a little sound, but when I went to her she was fast asleep again. Tell me about the wreath, Rosy-posy. Did Mrs. Morrison seem to like it?"

For little Daisy had been let into the secret. Her co-operation was needful.

"Yes, she liked it, and paid me for it. See here!" and Rose opened her portemonnaie with a great show of cautiousness. "Aren't we rich?"

Daisy laughed. "I can help you, Rosy. I can wind stems and things, and cut wires, and, by and by, I can make flowers as well as anybody, can't I?"

"Yes, Daisy," taking her on her lap. "But not now. I do believe we can find a wee bit of a house, somewhere, or, maybe, a suite of rooms, and have a real little home of our own. Do our own work, you know—you and I—as Marie did hers, and try to make poor mamma comfortable. Wouldn't you like that?"

"Indeed I would. And then mamma could unpack all her pretty things. And, Rose, we'd have omelettes and croquettes for breakfast 'most every morning, wouldn't we?"

"You little epicure! Yes, if we can learn how to make them. But you must go to school, Daisy. I think mother would let you go to a public school here. Almost all the children do. How would you like that?"

And thus the sisters chatted on for an hour, until the long, slanting shadows told that the sun was low.

"Now I really must wake mother," said Rose, putting the little girl from her lap. "She will not sleep a wink to-night."

She went into the bed-room.

But why need I go on? You know already the meaning of the cry that startled Daisy in another instant. The fair, sweet, dainty mother had started on the journey each soul must take alone. She had gone where neither human voice nor human touch could wake her.

Do you say there are too many deaths told about, or hinted at, or suggested, in this story?

How can I help it? The issues of life and death are not with me. Human beings die when their time comes, whether story-tellers will it or no.

THE HAPPY NEW YEAR.

"HAPPY New Year!"

A bright face looked into the chamber; a sweet voice rang through it in tones of music.

"Happy New Year, darling!"

And Mr. Ellis stooped to kiss the child. But the kiss he gave was not fervent. It was kind and gentle, but not loving.

A pair of large blue orbs looked up at him in a kind of hurt surprise. Then, as if she felt repelled, the child, after standing for a moment or two in a shy, embarrassed way, went out of the chamber and left her father alone.

Mr. Ellis was less comfortable in mind after she went out than before she came in. A ray of heart-sunshine had swept into the room, and though he had failed to perceive its warmth, it was colder and darker after its withdrawal. He breathed out involuntarily a heavy sigh. It was not a happy new year. In fact, the new years came in always with an added weight of care, annoyance and discouragement for Mr. Ellis, each heavier and more discouraging than the one that preceded.

"Happy New Year!" cried one child after another, as it looked into his room or met him on the stairs. "Happy New Year!" greeted him from many voices.

But it was not a happy new year. Oh, no! Mr. Ellis's new years were no longer happy ones. Why? Let us go back a little.

Just ten years before the time in which he comes before the reader, James Ellis, then a clerk on a salary of one thousand dollars, took to himself a wife; but in doing so, he made one mistake, and that was going in debt for the furniture of his little rented house. For over three years he had been getting a salary of one thousand dollars, and out of this had saved scarcely enough to buy his wedding suit and the marriage ring. How, on the same income, he was to support a wife, besides himself, and pay the five hundred dollars it cost to furnish his house, was one of the mysteries in finance he had not stopped to solve.

It is no matter of surprise that the first New Year's Day following the marriage of Mr. Ellis was not for him a very happy one. He had a dear little wife, and was very fond of her; and she was good and loving, and as careful as she could be to make home the pleasantest place for him in all the world. But there had been a grave error in the way their new life was begun, and error of any and every kind surely works for all its measure of disquietude, pain or disaster. There is no escape.

The first New Year's Day brought in to Mr. Ellis unsettled accounts for over one hundred and fifty dollars, besides the five hundred dollars he had borrowed from a friend to meet his furniture bills. These accounts came in from the grocer, the dry-goods merchant, the coal-dealer and others, with whom bills had run up that might have been settled with the cash he had let slip through his hands for articles of ornament they did not need, or for various little self-indulgences. If there had been a rigid system of cash down for every article that was purchased, and a just self-denial in the matter of things not actually needful to comfort, that first New Year's Day would have found Mr. Ellis in a far different and happier state of mind.

The true remedy was neither seen nor adopted.

"I must have a larger income," said Mr. Ellis. If he had said, "I must adopt a new system and practise a closer economy," the case would have been more hopeful.

On the next day Mr. Ellis asked to have his salary increased. Business had not been very good for the past season, and there was some demur; but he was a faithful and intelligent clerk, and, in view of this, two hundred dollars were added to his salary—not more, really, than the deficits of the last six months; yet enough to cause our young friend to feel much elated, and to lure him into a freer instead of a closer style of living.

The second New Year's Day brought another day of reckoning. A baby had been born, and with this sunbeam that came brightly into their home, came also added expenses, and consequent increase of debt. The original five hundred dollars borrowed to furnish the house was yet unpaid, and the friend who loaned that sum had grown cold in consequence.

"Happy New Year!" called his sweet little wife, as the sun looked brightly in through their chamber window, awakening her with its kiss.

"Happy New Year!" he answered, trying to throw into his voice the gladness that was not in his heart; for he had been awake for over an hour, thinking of the bills that had been received on the day before, and of others which were to come in—bills that he had no present means of paying.

"I must get more salary," said Mr. Ellis to himself, as he brooded that New Year's Day over his unhappy affairs. He asked for an increase, but was denied.

"I am worth more than twelve hundred a year, and will have it!" was his mental ejaculation. So he set himself to work to find another situation, and after a few months succeeded in obtaining a new place and a salary of two thousand a year.

This good fortune quite set up our young friend. He felt rich; and on the strength of this feeling indulged himself with a new parlor carpet and a set of chairs—on credit.

But the next New Year's Day brought its sure reckoning, and Mr. Ellis found himself further behindhand than when his salary was only one thousand dollars, and deeper in the Slough of Despond.

"This will never do," he said to himself, after brooding all day over his miserable affairs. "I cannot live on two thousand dollars. The case is hopeless."

Then a ray of light shot into his mind. He was a quick, clear-headed accountant, and the suggestion came to him that he might get books to post and accounts to settle, as night work. A sense of relief pervaded his heart as this idea took shape and settled into a purpose. On the very next day he sent an advertisement to one of the papers, and in less than a week had an engagement to post a set of books and get off a balance-sheet, work that would occupy his evenings for at least a month, and for which he was to receive one hundred dollars.

A better day was dawning upon Mr. Ellis—so he thought and felt; and his heart grew light and hopeful. So the day would have been better, if to larger resources had been added economy and self-denial. But this was not the case. He poured more water into his barrel, and the added pressure made the water flow through the unstopped leaks more freely.

It was no better with him when the next New Year's Day came round. And so it went on for ten years; and we find him still as unhappy on New Year's dawn as when it first opened on his married life.

The day came in bright and sunny. As Mr. Ellis took his seat at the breakfast-table, he looked into the faces of five pleasant children, and across at his still young and attractive wife. He ought to be a happy man with treasures like these. But he was not; and the shadows that were on his countenance threw themselves across and around the table, and dimmed the sunshine of young hearts. The children talked gayly at first; but gradually a silence fell upon them. The oldest of them could be seen stealing glances of inquiry at their father's face, and then dropping their eyes thoughtfully. Mrs. Ellis did the same, sighing faintly to herself, and feeling a sense of oppression going down like a heavy hand on her bosom. She knew but too well why there was a cloud on her husband's brow.

"Happy New Year!" said a neighbor, cheerily, to Mr. Ellis, an hour after breakfast, meeting him a little way from his own door.

"I don't see it!" was the reply of our friend, in a half-playful, half-worried manner.

"You ought to see it, then," answered the neighbor. "If you don't, there's something wrong."

"Of course there is. In fact there's always something wrong with me on New Year's Day."

"Bills?" said the neighbor, shrugging his shoulders and arching his eyebrows.

"Bills!" answered Ellis, moodily.

"I thought so," frankly responded the other.

"You did, ha!" His manner a little nettled.

"Of course. What else could mar your happiness to-day—a man with such a dear, good little wife, and so many sweet children as you have?"

"What am I to do?" asked Ellis, breaking down.

"Do? Why have no bills on New Year's Day."

"Easier said than done."

"Of course it is; but that is no reason why it cannot be done."

"I should like to know the remedy," said Ellis.

"It is very simple," said the neighbor.

Ellis looked at him inquiringly.

"Always pay for what you buy at the time you get it."

"Easily enough said; but, suppose you haven't the money in hand?"

"Then don't buy."

"Not bread and meat for your children?"

The neighbor turned and looked at Ellis from head to foot, with an expression of countenance that had in it surprise, reproof and just a little contempt.

"What is your income a year?" he asked, in a quiet, repressed way.

"About two thousand five hundred dollars, take one year with another," was replied.

"Humph! A fair show for bread and meat at least, one would think."

"But bread and meat aren't all," answered Ellis, putting himself on the defensive.

"No; but they represent our necessities, which usually do not cost half as much as our superfluities. Here is where the pinch comes. It is for the things they might do without that men are troubled with bills at New Years."

"Not my case," said Ellis, rallying a little. "I have a grocer's bill and a butcher's bill; a shoe-maker's and a tailor's bill; a doctor's bill and a—"

"But where have your two thousand five hundred dollars gone," interrupted the neighbor, "and these bills not settled before?"

This threw Mr. Ellis's mind into confusion. He could not give a prompt answer to the question.

"How much rent do you pay?" asked the neighbor.

"Six hundred dollars," replied Ellis.

"Can you afford to pay so much?"

"No."

"Then why do you pay it?"

"Because I can't get a house to suit me for any less."

"Suit you!" exclaimed the neighbor, shaking his head. "Ah, my good friend! I see where the trouble lies. It is what suits—what is desired—and not what can be afforded that governs you in expenditure. No man who lives by this rule can hope for anything but the worry and humiliation of debt."

"Which I have to my heart's content," said Ellis, bitterly. "And, struggle as I will, I cannot free myself from its coils."

"Don't say that. You may if you will."

"If you will show me the way out of this dreadful state of affairs, I will hold you as my truest friend."

The neighbor was silent for some moments.

"Are you really in earnest?" he asked at length.

"Never more so in my life," replied Ellis.

"Will you lay before me a full statement of your affairs?"

"Yes."

"And then follow strictly the line of action I demonstrate to your reason as the only one that will lead you out of this labyrinth of trouble in which you are involved?"

"I will."

"Come to my house this evening," said the neighbor. "Bring with you a statement, as near as you can make it out, of all you owe, and the longest time you can get for its full payment. We will then look the matter squarely in the face, and see what can be done."

The list of unsettled accounts brought in by Mr. Ellis was a long and discouraging one, amounting in all to over fifteen hundred dollars.

"I am ashamed to make this exhibition," he said, in a choking voice, and with a look of humiliation.

The neighbor went over the list in a quiet, business way, ticking off various items with his pencil. He then made a list of these items, and, footing up the amount, said: "These are all things that might have been done without, and you see they have cost you over three hundred dollars."

"Yes, I see," answered Ellis, in a subdued voice.

"And I think it may be safely assumed," said the neighbor, "taking your way of doing things, that you have let as much more run through your fingers in expenditures of various kinds not absolutely demanded for health or comfort in your family."

Mr. Ellis assented.

"Here, then, are between six and seven hundred dollars in a single year—nearly half the amount of all you owe. The wonder is, if you have been going on in this loose way for ten years, that you are not three times as much in debt as you are. The remedy is plain. Don't you see it?"

"If I were even with the world, I see how I might not only keep out of debt, but save something every year. But what am I to do with this debt?" asked Ellis, gloomily.

"To keep on in the way you have been going will not help to pay it off."

"No; that is clear enough."

"You have been going in the wrong way, Mr. Ellis," continued the neighbor. "If you keep on in that way, trouble, worry, humiliation and final disaster are sure to come. You must stop, turn around, and go the other way. Every step you take in this new way will lead you toward pecuniary ease and comfort of mind. It will be better with you in three months from to-day, if you have cut down your ordinary expenditures—which may be done—two hundred and fifty dollars, than if you had not cut them down at all. You will not only have lightened the burden of debt just so much, but have laid the foundation of a new order of things that will lead you to a pleasant and prosperous future."

Mr. Ellis sat in silent thought for a long time. Then, looking up, he said, with a deep sigh: "I shall not have a dollar of ready money to begin with. Everything I can raise will have to be exhausted on these bills, or I shall be tormented out of my life. I must pay a little here and a little there; put this one off with a promise, and that one with a frowning denial. Oh, dear, what a miserable life it is! And I must still keep the grocer's pass-book going, or starve."

"Cash down! It must be cash down!" exclaimed the neighbor. "There is no other hope for you!"

"But where is the cash to come from?"

"Reserve enough from the payment of bills to keep your table and pay your servants' wages. Take your wife fully into your confidence. Lay your affairs all open before her. Put the money needed for expenses into her hands, and ask her to make it go as far as possible. Spend nothing yourself. In fact, don't carry money about you. It is a temptation."

Mr. Ellis drew a long, deep breath.

"If I had a clear one hundred dollars to start with," he said.

The neighbor understood him, and would have cheerfully placed that sum at his disposal; but he did not think it well. It would be best for Mr. Ellis, in the end, if he worked out his own pecuniary salvation.

"To meet difficulties and overcome them," he replied, "gives us discipline and strength. It isn't the hundred dollars you want, but the courage and resolution to turn about squarely and go in a new direction. It will be easier to walk therein than in the old way—a hundred times easier."

And so our friend found it. Let us see how it is with him twelve months afterward.

"Happy New Year!" A bright face looked into the chamber, as it had looked a year ago; a sweet voice rang through it in tones of music.

"Happy New Year, darling!" answered Mr. Ellis, in a cheery voice, not now stooping in a sort of mechanical way to kiss the child, but catching her up in his arms and hugging her tightly.

"Happy New Year!" met him on the stairs and at the breakfast-table; and he flung the greeting back with a heartiness of enjoyment and a lightness of spirit never felt before.

The door-bell rang as he sat at the table. But the sound jarred no nerve, awakened no troubled feeling, brought no image of an unpaid bill. True, there were unpaid bills, but none of recent date; none but what had been adjusted to mutual satisfaction. Their aggregate, instead of being fifteen hundred dollars, was scarcely six hundred, and this sum he expected to wipe off in less than six months.

"Happy New Year!"

How swiftly time flies. Twelve months had come and gone again.

"It is a happy New Year! the happiest I have ever known," responded Mr. Ellis to the New Year's greeting of his little wife, and he kissed her in a wild, frolicsome way. "I feel like a twelve-year-old boy. Happy New Year, darlings!" catching up his little ones and dancing about the room with them in his arms. "Happy New Year to everybody!"

Not a bill on his table! Not a dollar owed to any one! Mr. Ellis was indeed a happy man.

JANE FIELD'S WORK.

BY ELLA F. MOSBY.

"The task that needs me is the task I need."

JANE FIELD—the heroine of my story—was not a strong-minded woman, nor even a cultivated one. One look at her broad, kindly countenance, full of contentment, and her patient gray eyes, was enough to convince you that she was satisfied with her little world, and had no restless aspirations after change. She had obeyed willingly all her life, first her parents, and afterward even the children, her half-brothers and sisters, had exercised from their very babyhood a lovingly unconscious tyranny over her which Jane truly found pleasant. She would have felt no interest in "spheres" or "missions," if they had been subjects she understood. Yet she did a man's work without opposition, and received a man's wages without demur on the part of her employers. It came about in this way:

Her mother was a pleasant-faced little woman, without a particle of courage or force of will. She married an improvident and unsuccessful man, who died young, leaving her a widow, with one little girl of five years old—Jane herself—and without any visible means of support for either. In this straitened situation, she came to H—to live by her own labor, although she was ill-fitted in any respect to fight the battle of life, nor was she strong enough in soul to do her work willingly for love's sake. In the midst of her hardest difficulties and discouragements she happened, one day, to meet Berke Litchfield, an old lover of hers many years ago, and who was now a strong, sturdy miner, looking fully able to support a dozen or so by his own hands.

She was too much absorbed in her own troubles to remember the old dream. But some lingering fancy from his past youth stirred in the man's heart as he saw the pale, tired little woman going every day about her work with her thin-faced little girl, and at last he offered a home as his wife. Not with any special show of sentiment—Berke was never given to that—but kindly enough.

"Thou knowest, Jennie," he said in his rough, but pleasant voice, "I vowed I would never ask thee a second time, but a bad vow is best broken; and thou art too weak to be left by thyself. I don't like seeing it while I am strong enough for us both."

Mrs. Field looked up with a smile. It would be a pleasant relief, she thought, to be freed from her present anxiety and toilsome labor. Then she looked at Jane, and sighed.

The man understood her glance. He called the child to him, and smoothed her light, tangled hair.

"She shall be my daughter now—will you not, little one? Jennie, I will take as good care of her as if she were mine in truth."

So they were married, and as Jane grew up, she had the cares of a nurse to five brothers and sisters, all of whom learned quickly enough to run to her patient arms as their never-failing refuge in all kinds of childish trouble or perplexity; and listen for her cheerful voice as the source of most of their little pleasures. But the duty she loved best of all was to render any service to her step-father. Every day at noon she carried his basket of dinner to him in the mines; for they lived very near the Snowfield Coal-Mine, in a little black-looking house, so small that it seemed to be attached to the No. 56 which hung conspicuously over the door. He liked to have her talk to him while he ate. Sometimes she tried to manage his tools, and so her hands became stronger and more expert in their use every day.

About this time, Jimmy, the sixth child, was born, and soon afterward she noticed that he began to look very tired when he came home, and said very little, even to her mother. Also, when he had finished his dinner, and returned to his work, he sometimes seemed unable to find his tools at once, and groped after them like a man feeling his way in the dark. One day, he wearily put his hands over his eyes, as he got up from dinner, and Jane said, softly: "Father, thou'rt downright tired. Let me work awhile."

"Nay, lass, but—I do less and less every day, and get less wages."

"Then rest now, father, and let me work. Thou'st worked many a day for me."

It was the same the next day, and the next, and the one hour's work lengthened into two and three, until the mother began to fret over Jane's long delay at the mine.

Berke Litchfield roused up at that, and—for the first time—spoke roughly to his wife.

"Nay, do thou let that alone. I'll not hear it."

One evening, as Jane was finishing the whole afternoon's work, she was surprised by his coming near, in his dazed, uncertain way, and asking, wistfully: "Lass, art thou tired?"

"I could do as much again," she replied, laughing.

"Eh, but thou'rt a powerful lass for thy age." And he said no more until she came to take him home. Then he spoke in a weary, broken-down way, that went to Jane's heart: "It's all up now, my lass. Thou'lt have to take me home for good. I'll never see thy face again, nor little Jimmy's." Then suddenly stretching his powerful limbs, he cried out in a voice hoarse with pain, and unlike his own: "My God! I am blind—and my children—"

"Poor father," said Jane, gently, touching his arm, "but I'll do the work all the same."

"Eh? But thou'rt only a girl. They'll not let thee."

"I'll do a week's work first, and show them I can. They'll be glad enough to have thy place filled now, father."

For it so happened that a strike was imminent at the Snowfield Mine, and Berke Litchfield was one of the few steady men who could always be relied on by his employers. And so it happened that at a man's wages Jane did a man's work in the mines, and did it well.

A low fever broke out in H—the fourth year after this, and the mother and little Jimmy sickened and died. People wondered what Jane would do now; but Mollie, the oldest of the Litchfield children, was a quiet, steady girl, and could be trusted to take care of Ned and Ellen at home. Robert was already working in the mines, and it was not long before a place was found for Dick, through the kindness of Jane's employers. Her blind step-father never left her.

But Jane did lose her place at last. One day, passing by "No. 56"—it was a pleasant-looking place now, because it was kept so clean, and a few scarlet flowers in bloom made the little window-sill bright all the summer long—passing by there one day, I was surprised to meet Tom Bolton coming out.

Tom was an honest, hard-working young farmer, whose little farm joined mine. I stopped him, and after a little talk about long rains and late seasons, I said, as we walked on: "Why, Tom, I did not know you knew the Litchfields. Jane is a good girl, isn't she?"

Tom's sudden blush and confused answer threw a light over his late visit. I shook hands with him, and congratulated him heartily. Of course I had much to say of Jane's merits.

"Aye, sir," he answered, with a broad smile of satisfaction, "there's such a pleasant, kindly way about her; and then the children do take to her so!"

"How will you manage about them, Tom?" I asked.

"Mrs. Hays" (the employer's wife) "will give Mollie a good place any time she is ready to go. Ellen and Ned will come to us; and the other boys, you know, are at work for themselves, and doing well. They're honest lads, sir."

"But Litchfield himself?" I said.

"The father? Why nothing but death will ever part Jane from him—and good reasons, too—he was a kind friend to her when she was helpless."

"She has fully repaid it since, Tom."

"True, sir; but the more you do for one the more you love him; and 'a good daughter makes a good wife,' as they say, sir. Oh, he's heartily welcome."

And so Jane left the mines.

Home-Life and Character.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSISSIWAY POTTS.

THIRD SERIES.—No. 1.

I COULDN'T stand it any longer. I knew it would make me sick. I looked across at the deacon, kind of appealingly, and he took the hint and sat over, and I slipped into the seat beside him. Nobody else knew why I moved. The smell of hair restorative in a close church is bad enough, but that 'long side of tobacco smoke made close proximity intolerable.

Now, last fall, at the association, some of the brethren got up resolutions against the use of tobacco—something about requiring them to abandon the use of it altogether. I voted against it. I thought we had no right to dictate to others what they should eat, drink and wear; that if a man chose to wear a filthy wad of tobacco inside of his mouth, it was no concern of ours, no more than if he wore his trousers wrong side behind or his coat wrong end up.

But yesterday, at church, I felt like reconsidering my vote. It did seem too bad that one man's breath should poison the whole inside of a meeting-house; that we should all come in out of the fresh, crisp, bracing airs on this sunny Sabbath day and be met with a nauseating stench.

How a tobacco-chewer or a smoker can unblushingly mingle among cleanly men not given to filthy habits, and come into the presence of women—sensitive, delicate, refined women—is past my comprehension. A man would be hooted at who would sit down among ladies and craunch a raw onion, or eat a smoked herring, or pick the meat off a mutton bone that was old enough to be buried a week before; and yet none of these are any worse than the breath of the man who chews or smokes tobacco.

We have all seen women riding in carriages while the gentleman accompanying them smoked as vigorously as the chimney of a gas manufactory. We always thought those were the ladies to associate with such gentlemen; that "like loves like."

Just as granny and the deacon and I were starting to church last Sabbath, a newly-wedded pair passed us, tilting along in a new carriage. They looked pretty, bright and cheerful and happy, and were going to make their appearance that day. Positively, her white veil had a real hazy, blue Indian summery look, just because of the cloud of smoke that enveloped the married couple. I laughed at Lily, who stood waiting to wrap us up comfortably.

"Why," said she, "do look at that bride! She must be intensely and blindly married to submit to such treatment. She will be as well smoked as a last year's jowel before they make their appearance, I'm afraid."

This will reach many households just in the nick of time—about the time of butchering. In a well-regulated family in the country a beef will be killed, of course; and some of my readers may not know how to care for the beef, so that the last in the barrel will be as good as the first. You don't want hard, blue, knotty, salty stuff, with all the juices turned to salt, and with no more sustenance in it than there would be in a piece of corduroy; that is the old, careless, haphazard way that our fathers and grandfathers used to cure their beef.

Now I never tasted better beef than at Dr. Bodkins. He always attends to curing it himself, for he is an epicure in his tastes. This is the way he makes a pickle: Six gallons of water, three pounds of brown sugar, nine pounds of pure salt, one quart of molasses, three ounces of saltpetre and one ounce of soda; this for one hundred pounds. These ingredients are to be boiled and skimmed—impurities will rise from the sugar and salt for some time while boiling. We have used a recipe almost like this in the Potts family for years, but the crowning excellence of the cured beef, we missed in not knowing exactly how the doctor did. After his ingredients were all ready to be put together, he paused long enough to put on the finishing touch, which was, to put in the saltpetre alone, let it dissolve, and when the water was boiling dip the beef, piece by piece, into the boiling saltpetre water, and hold it for a few seconds only in the hot bath. This immersion contracts the surface by closing the pores and prevents the juices of the meat from going out into the pickle. Then make the pickle as first directed and, when perfectly cold, pour it on the meat and see that it is kept under by means of boards and weights.

The doctor's beef preserves its color, and cuts almost as juicy as a fresh roast. This amount of pickle is intended for one hundred pounds of beef.

I don't know what I would do if I had not such good neighbors. Now Sister Bodkin never bakes mince or pumpkin pies without sending us some, and if she finds out any new thing which could benefit us in comfort, anything suggestive of economy, anything promotive of happiness or pleasure, she rejoices to let us know of it. How many women there are who will even refuse a new pattern, the knowledge of a new item in cooking, or a share of the abundance of orchard or garden! And yet that woman and I have little spats sometimes, a kind of lover's quarrel—it don't last long and we go on loving each other just the same afterward, for how can we help it.

For instance, Brother Jenkins does not preach at our church any more, we have Brother Burly, of West Virginia, now. Well, after Brother Jenkins left and it was known that Pottsville Church was without a pastor, we were besieged with brethren in quest of a field. As is often the case, one brother liked this one, and another that one, and we were in a fair way of becoming divided. Sister Bodkin and about a dozen others took a violent liking to a long-bearded, lank-jawed, white-eyed old brother, who put the ah! on to the end of half his words.

The day we met to decide this momentous question, I happened to sit beside Sister Bodkin. We all voted. I was so 'fraid' that old grand-daddy-long-legs would receive the most votes that I almost held my breath for fear; but we who voted for Brother Burly had fifty votes, while the others only had twelve.

I was uneasy for fear I did not harbor Christian feelings of kindness to all concerned in this matter.

I kept saying to myself in a low whisper: "Now, Pipsissaway Potts, other people have likes an' dislikes, the same as you have, and it behooves you to cherish love to all your brethren and sisters, and to feel charitable toward them, and to extend good-will to all in case you are disappointed in your choice." I said: "Yea, I will; the Lord helping me I will!"

I nudged Sister Bodkin, and said, in a kind whisper: "I am so glad it is all over, and I hope God's blessing will attend the work of to-day."

"Well, it won't; I say it won't, now; hadn't ought to!" snarled the dear, blessed woman beside me, and with a quick, impatient twitch, she gathered the folds of her alpaca away from mine, wouldn't even let our civil, well-kept alpaca be neighborly and whisper together.

Oh, I felt as if I wanted to howl like a lonesome dog! I kind of choked, and rolled my tongue aimlessly around in my mouth, and plucked at the lilac ribbon about my neck, and then a few tears came rolling down my cheeks. That relieved me and saved a spell of bleeding at the nose. She muttered something in a curt whisper that I did not hear, but the very sound of it hurt like a stinging lash.

Now, you may think that my esteemed friend and neighbor was a very human woman. Granted. But I knew that blessed woman had the spirit of Christ in her heart for all of that, and knowing this, I loved her all the better for her conflict with the devil. I knew she would come out conqueror, and I did not have long to wait for the proof, either.

She always prays for the minister—she never forgets him at a throne of grace. I watched and waited. The first night at prayer-meeting she prayed all around him, prayed for the church, and the deacons, and the youth, and the members of other churches, but not the new pastor. At the next prayer-meeting it was the same, only she came a little nearer to the point. She wept, too—that was a favorable symptom.

On the afternoon before the next prayer-meeting there was a soft tap at my door, and Sister Bodkin came in. She had been crying. She didn't sit down until she had spoken her errand.

"I have done wrong and have cherished unkind thoughts and feelings, Sister Potts, and I want you to forgive me;" and down she sat right on the floor where she was standing and put both thin hands up over her face and cried right out.

"I've been so ashamed and so miserable," she sobbed. "I don't know how I could have acted so; it was unwomanly and showed me to be such a narrow-minded bigot."

She said she didn't see how I could love her, but I told her I knew better than she did herself what kind of a woman she was, and that I knew all the time she would come out the victor in the end.

That night she did not forget to pray for the minister.

Now all this was a secret between us two, and I would not tell it now, only that the incident may benefit others. Half the troubles in families, and churches, and neighborhoods comes from our talking too much, and making confidants of others, and from being officious and too ready, as Aunt Patty would say, to "impart our knowledge." We spend a great deal of time in talking about the private affairs of our friends—things that are none of our business. How much better not to invite the confidence of indiscreet people, not to listen to their idle talk, but turn the conversation into other channels. Why, half the men who run to the law for redress from fancied wrongs would not do so were they not urged on by the deceitful tongues of those who do not care a straw for them! The more a man dwells upon the injustice of another, the greater seems the wrong he has borne; it grows in magnitude, and he feels himself persecuted, trodden upon, and thinks he has the sympathy of all.

If you know anything evil of another, if you see something in his conduct, say not a word about it. What good will it do you to gossip, or disseminate, or poison others, and prejudice them against him? No two persons can tell the same story alike; and that is where the mischief lies; just the changing of one word, or the emphasis placed on a different word, will put a new face on a story, and alter the whole meaning of it.

Yes, talking too much is the root of all dissatisfaction, sorrow, pain and heart-burning. You will see instances of it in the best families, and among the best friends. How often, when the head of a family dies, in settling the estate all sweet ties are broken, old loves sundered, dear brothers and sisters separated in anger, and left with feelings of animosity rankling in their hearts for all time, and, if traced back, the whole trouble would be found to have originated from too much talk, perhaps from conferring with meddlesome neighbors whose officious relation in the private affairs of others caused all this.

In all cases it is best to keep one's own counsel, to keep matters under one's own control, not to talk too much, and especially of the family affairs of others. If you have troubles, there is One to whom you can lift up your heart at all times, One who will not betray you or lead you to act unwisely or indiscreetly, and whose counsel can be depended upon, trusted implicitly, and in whose goodness and truth your faith need never be shaken or doubting. Go to Him instead of the impetuous, hot-headed neighbor, whose advice would only add fuel to the fire.

I never shall forget my first lesson in this item of mischief-making by meddlesome neighbors. When I was thirteen years old, the first death came to our household—that of a very beautiful little baby-sister only a few weeks old. We children were inconsolable over our loss. It was the first sorrow that our mother ever knew, and her grief was pitiful to witness.

That cold, raw November day, after we came home from the funeral, I gathered up everything that would remind my mother of Rosaline, and put them out of her sight. But there was one thing that I could not bear to burn or bury, and I would never dare to let her see it, and that was the cloths with bran and mustard poultices on them which had been taken off the baby's feet when she died. Oh! the very imprint of each precious little foot was there—the little dots of toes, and the dear little heels, the tiny length and breadth—that was so much of the wee baby Rosaline! I kept them hid in a hollow maple-tree in the woods above the house, and every day for awhile I would go there and open them gently and cry over them. Sometimes my grief was intolerable, and I would lie among the dead leaves at the gnarled base of the maple and agonize in my lonely child-sorrow. Then I would steal down to the house and look over the little dresses and petticoats, and it did seem to me that I could not live and endure this great woe.

In less than one year our mother's grave was close beside the baby's. We were left very lonely—our father and his five little children. I can see now how and where I did not do my duty as the eldest; but then I did the best I knew in my poor, imperfect way.

A kind old lady, whom we had been taught to call Aunt Polly, lived near us, and she used to show me how to cook, and sew on patches, and sweep, and keep things in tolerable order. A poor family lived near us, and one day Aunt Polly suggested to my grandmother that it would be good economy for me to give all the baby's clothes to the poor neighbor's little one. The bare suggestion was dreadful to me, and I cried, and went to my father and begged of him not to make me do it. He thought it would be advisable to give the clothes away, but said he would not compel me to do so.

I said to my grandmother: "Papa says I may sell butter, and buy that little baby a dress, but he will not make me give away Rosaline's clothes unless I want to."

"They are of no use to you whatever," was her reply; "but do as you please about it."

So I bought a new dress, and cut and made it for the poor woman's baby.

"What do you intend to do with your mother's clothes?" Aunt Polly asked one day, soon after this.

"Oh, we will have them made over for ourselves as soon as we can bear to wear them; we need them badly enough," was my answer.

"Well, I thought you'd better give some of them to your grandmother; it would please her so," was the soft reply.

Oh, I could hardly stand this cold interference—this traffic, it seemed, of the most precious things we held; but I bore it all kindly, and without a hasty word; though I did cry often when I sat alone with my mother's most familiar wearing apparel spread out before me that I could look upon it and seem to see her as she looked in life.

At the request of Aunt Polly, I gave all my mother's lace caps, except one, to our grandmother. This was done kindly and quietly, and to all appearance cheerfully.

One day Aunt Polly took me aside and said: "So you've been abusing me, I hear—been calling me ill names. That is great recompense for all my kindness!"

It was no use for me to say that I had never spoken unkindly of her; that these reports were idle gossip; that for her care and watchful kindness I was grateful; it did no good whatever. Mrs. So-and-so had told her and had affirmed it to be true; a "certain individual" had told her so, and the poor old lady went off in high dudgeon, leaving me in tears. Three or four days afterward, I was at a wool-picking at my aunt's, and hardly a woman took any notice of me; my grandmother looked down her nose very demurely; my aunts acted as if they wanted to call me Miss Potts every time they addressed me; and old women peered over their glasses at the little girl sitting under the window on a peck measure and scanned her critically. But I played with the babies and the kittens, and had very pleasant times, for all of that.

In the evening, one of the cousins went part of the way home with me, and she told me the whole story. My! how it had grown! It was all over the town—and I hadn't known it—that I had abused my dear old grandmother, and called her ill names; had said very hard things to my father, and threatened of leaving home; had been violently angry, and thrown my mother's clothes out of the house after my grandmother; and had treated Aunt Polly in a way she could never forgive.

Then somebody had added the cruellest stings to this story, now swollen into one of magnitude, and I went home crying, and told my father all about it.

His judgment in matters of this kind is excellent. This was what he said:

"Now don't mind it at all—that is a little experience which is very common and comes in every one's life. People don't mean to lie, child, but they can't tell a story exactly as they hear it; some will magnify, and paint, and put on high colors in spite of themselves; but they don't mean to do it, they incline to be imaginative. No one wants to wrong you. Now don't be silly; just take my advice, and say nothing about this affair, and act as if you had never heard it. Live it down; any one can, by an upright life, live down an idle report that would injure them materially if they tried to follow it up and find out where it started from and settle the whole affair. Life is too valuable to be trifled away chasing after lies. And, then, one should not feel hurt over that which is false—without foundation—if you consider well you will see that it is only your pride of self that is hurt—your poor self-esteem wounded—nothing more."

Why I laughed, red-eyed as I was, to think I had cried over a bit of tattle; and from that day to this, no gossip has given me one minute's pain. People may criticize, and measure me, and put their own construction on what I say, and do, and write, but nothing unkind ever hurts me or makes me feel vindictive.

Now this kind of talk from Deacon Potts to his little Pipsey, long, long ago—ripe fifty talking to tender fifteen from his standpoint; clear-seeing, kindly-disposed, untouched by the frosts of malice, mellowed by the varied experience of a lifetime—how good it was! how valuable! how timely! May my young girl-readers take the homely but blessed truth of his words to themselves, and may they gain wisdom and profit therefrom, and may it do them good as it did me.

Lily and I went to visit an aunt of ours last fall, out in Indiana. We had a royal visit. One hundred miles we rode in the cars, then twenty-five in a coach, and the rest of the way, five miles, a cousin took us in her carriage. We stayed one week, and it seemed that a Sabbath stillness was about us all the time, away out in the quiet country, far from the busy sounds of buzzing wheels, and axe, and saw, and hammer, and plane; away from the railroads, and telegraph offices, and daily mails, and school bells, and yet the change was delightful. October put on her gay robes of scarlet, and gold, and bronze, and the serene skies were their very bluest, and the airs their balmiest. Our dear relatives visited with us and brought forth their best cheer, and took us abroad in their spring wagons and buggies to see other relatives. It was very enjoyable indeed. I remember one place we went to visit uncles, aunts and cousins, and we had not been there half an hour until I chanced to look out into the kitchen-yard, and there lay two monster shanghais that had just experienced the death of the guillotine. They lay side by side, as though they had loved in their lives and in their deaths were not divided. Great chickens saved for the occasion!

It was there that I learned how to make good gems of Graham flour. Mine were always flinty and not tender like those, but my gems will never be so any more, because I know how to make them now.

To one pint of sour milk take one egg, one spoonful of sugar, well beaten, and one teaspoonful of soda, and good, fresh Graham flour enough to make a stiff batter. To be baked in iron gem pans with a quick, hot fire. They are delicious, light, puffy, tender, and we all know wholesome, because Graham flour is the flour.

Since I wrote last for the magazine, we have been using freely of oatmeal and cracked wheat, and we do most heartily endorse them as wholesome food. I intend to experiment and see if there are not other ways of cooking them. At present we use the oatmeal made into mush or porridge, eaten either hot or cold, with butter and sugar, or with cream and sugar, if preferred. How to cook them? Well, I put a pint of oatmeal to soak in warm water a few hours before cooking it, just water enough to cover it, then pour this mixture into boiling water, a little at a time, with a good pinch of salt, and let it cook slowly the same as a cornmeal hasty pudding, for half an hour or longer. To make a pudding of it, take eggs, milk, sugar, raisins and cinnamon, the same as for other puddings. If a heartier dish is desired than either of the ways mentioned it can be made by cooking it with the water in which meat has been boiled, skimming off the fat, and thus adding the relish of the meat. Or, soup can be made by cooking meat until very tender, removing it from the bones and chopping it up finely and cooking it in with the oatmeal. Oatmeal is the prominent article of diet among the population of Scotland. The firm muscles, the agility, and the fine open countenances of the Scotch, are enough to convince one that when a nation subsists mainly on a single article, that such an article must contain the elements of nutrition in a remarkable combination. In oatmeal are found the materials for the growth of the muscles, the bones, and the sustenance of the brain and nerves. When eaten by the invalid, it is well to have it thin like gruel, served with sugar and milk, or cream if desirable.

Cracked wheat.—I cook it always one way. It is apt to burn, and for this reason I put it in a little tin pail, and set the pail into a kettle of boiling water; cover closely, and let it boil half or three-quarters of an hour. I soak it previously, the same as oatmeal, and stir the mixture into boiling water.

In a family of little children these two dishes are almost indispensable, and especially where the little ones, through inheritance, will be likely to lose their teeth while young. Sometimes the bony structure of children is little better than chalk. In this case, oatmeal and cracked wheat should be articles of daily food. They should learn to like them, if only from a sense of justice due their mortal frames.

I was mending the cellar-window a few weeks ago; it fell out in a storm, and dropped down the cellar-stairs, and was badly smashed up. My right hand was blistered before I had put in two panes. I know there must be a way of getting old dry putty off the sash without cutting it off with a knife, but I could not remember what it was, and I did not know what book I could refer to that would give me the desired information.

"Now, of course, one's preacher ought to know other things besides how to preach the gospel," I said to myself; and putting on my calash and overskirt—I've got to wearing overskirts, don't you think, girls!—I went down to Pottsville parsonage to ask Brother Burley.

He had on a very long face, and he showed me into his study, and peered over his glasses at me, as much as to say: "Wonder if the critter's going to find fault with my sermons!"

We talked about the weather, and threshing, and the late wind-storm; and when we got through I tipped back my calash, and said distinctly: "Brother Burley, do you know what's good to soften old putty?"

"Were you speaking to me, Sister Potts?" said he, raising his eyebrows, and showing a wonderful array of white in his staring orbs.

I repeated my question, and he told me very plainly that he was not a glazier, but a preacher, and he was sorry that he could not give me the desired information.

Then I laughed at him. I think he is one of the F. F. V.'s in Virginia, and I wanted to plague him, and let him see that here in Pottsville we esteem our pastor as "one of us."

When I started, he put on his hat and walked with me as far as the cabinet shop, and we went in, and I inquired of Mr. Weldon if he knew what would loosen old, dry, hard putty.

"No way only to cut it off with a knife," he said, bluntly, and he made the shavings roll up like little ringlets. "Leastways that's how I allus do it—never hearn tell of any other way."

I knew there was a better way, sure, for in this age of progression there is a handy, easy, labor-saving way of doing all kinds of work. But I came home and mended the cellar-window, and then one of the dining-room windows, and one up-stairs, and almost wore out my poor right hand.

I could not quit thinking about how old, hard putty could be softened; and to-day I found it; and though it may never be of any use to me, it may to others. Wet the dry putty with muriatic acid; that will soften it so it will come out easy. Don't forget it. The first time I go to the druggist's I will buy some, if I never use it.

I have a good many things that I must not forget when I go there; and if these necessary articles are good in Deacon Potts's family, I am sure they are in other families; so I will tell you, and the bill I make out for ourselves will answer for all of us. A bottle of arnica for bruises; a piece of No. 1 court plaster for cuts and abrasions; a pint of linseed oil, in which I will mix as much lime as it will cut—this for burns, the best cure known; a bottle of glycerine for chapped lips and hands, and to soften hard, horny hands; a pint of aqua ammonia, good to clean glass, wood-work, grease-spots on the floor, to dilute in water when washing your face and neck, and to keep one's head clean—good, in fact, for everything; a bar of soap made to scour with instead of sand; a box of initial paper and envelopes; a bottle of oxalic acid to remove stains and iron-rust; and some orris-root for the girls to nibble when they go to singing-school.

There! you buy them, too; all these things are indispensable in a well-brought-up family.

How slow some people are to learn! I am afraid that I have spoiled the costliest dress I ever had, a fine all-wool merino. How hard I worked for that dress, too—boarded a little popinjay of a school-master for three months. I pitted the fellow. I had long wanted a brown merino, and so I concluded to make the exchange—let three months' boarding pay for the pretty dress; that would help the boy and help me. The three months were very long and tedious. I used to grow tired of his stories, the burden of which was "my whiskers," "my curly beard," "when I was a shaving," "'bout the color of my beard," "a heavy beard like mine," and stories all of which brought up against the one theme—"my beard."

Surely, I never looked at the lustrous, heavy folds of that royal old-time merino, without thinking of a rosy, dapper little pedagogue, who sported a long, wavy, goldy-brown beard.

Though I was very careful of my costly dress, by some means I got an occasional drop of grease, or tar, or dinner on it in spite of myself. I didn't want people should know how very careful I was of it when I wore it away from home on special occasions. Last fall I washed it in clean soapsuds, and instead of holding it up to drain, and shaking it and trying to keep every crease out of it, I wrung it, fearlessly and honestly, as I would wring a table-cloth, and ever since then it is full of very decided wrinkles and creases. I ironed it on the wrong side while it was yet damp, but the mischief was done and I can never make it look well again. It has the appearance of having been slept in and broken and mussed up beyond all renovation whatever.

I tell this bit of experience that other women may profit by it.

I never knew just how to cleanse a new wooden pail until very lately. The new, woody taste is very unpleasant, but can be removed by filling the pail with boiling water, letting it remain in it until cold. Then empty it and dissolve some soda in lukewarm water, adding a little lime to it, and wash the inside well with this solution. After that, scald it with hot water and rinse well with cold.

Sometimes I do think women are angelic, then again, I use an adjective which implies the very opposite; but really there is something in the nature of a good woman that surpasses all other good things in the world. I cannot comprehend the beauty, and goodness, and excellence of many women. I am amazed when I endeavor to do so, and the tears rain down my cheeks for very gladness and gratitude that such truths really do exist. But when women step over all reasonable bounds in their very kindness of spirit and in their marvellous unselfishness, the thing positively becomes funny, and we laugh while we try to admire and—not emulate.

We hardly know what to think of the dear little wife of the Swedish farmer in the far West, who, when one of their horses died, and the team was broken and labor stopped, permitted her husband to hitch her up beside the remaining horse and drive her in the plough. He succeeded in ploughing the field, but—the woman, the poor, unselfish woman died.

A surgeon in a hospital once found a poor wife suffering most intensely from a purple bruise and a sharp pain in her side. She was doubled up and could scarcely speak. She would not tell how the hurt came; he insisted; she prevaricated; and when her suffering forced her to tell, she meekly said, in a soft voice: "A friend of mine kicked me!"

And that friend beloved, was her husband.

Now, I am quite sure that this same spirit is in the conduct of every kind woman. I did think that, perhaps, I had a little of it myself, but when I come to analyze, I shake my head and think I do not belong to that class. I always empty the sacks into the flour barrel in the pantry, and I say: "The poor men! it will save them a little;" but, really, after all, I believe I do it because I don't scatter the flour like they do and spill it over the sides of the barrel, and whiten the floor and walls, and disorder things generally. So there is no unselfishness in the deed at all.

I am frequently amazed and distressed when I see delicate, lovable women bearing the loads and burdens that rightfully belong to their sons and husbands, and they do it without any compulsion whatever. I have known women to pick berries out in the hot sunshine, and sell them for six cents a quart, and take the money to buy pantaloons for a great thick-lipped, broad-shouldered fellow she called her husband; women to pitch hay from the wagon into the mow to the hired man, while "he" lay snoozing in the noon-day heat; women to roll logs while "he" picked brush; the white-browed wife to go out in the equinoctial storm to milk and feed the stock while he trotted the baby, and piped shrilly the cradle-song: "Ding-dong-bell; all is well, all is well."

All these things are common among wives.

Does anybody presume that if I had married Deacon Skiles, I should have settled down into this precious sort of a wife, and have saved the dear old noodle and wore myself out in bondage? Never!

I used to laugh in my sleeve at the babyishness of the husband of my best beloved girl-friend, twenty-five years ago. Before she married him we were very intimate and very dear to each other, and one of the stipulations when I gave my consent to the nuptials was, that whenever I came to her house, or she to ours, we were to sleep together. He consented right rosiily. But whenever the time came and we two were anticipating a visit that would reach beyond the midnight hours, that fellow would begin to have pains in his head—shooting pains—and they increased as the hour of retiring drew nigh; and though she would wet his poor head in vinegar, and make him snuff camphor from the palm of her little hand, and rub his head gently, and rest it against her faithful breast, he would grow worse and worse and go off to his bed groaning with the most excruciating pains. Of course, she who had promised to cleave unto him until "death do us part," could not leave him to suffer alone all through the weary hours of a long night. But afterward her obtuse perceptions grew sharp, and the blessed, double-dealing woman, with a strategy that would have showered the laurels down upon the brow of a general, would let him toss and groan in pain and distress while we would lie and visit, with all the old-time zest of our girlhood, and when I would succumb to weariness and fall asleep, she would go and sleep with him the rest of the night.

I was never jealous of anything or any person except that man. I could have pinched him out of existence, as sportsmen do pigeons, if I had dared to do it; the will was in my heart; the delectable booby who could not gracefully and kindly allow me a little corner in the affections of his wife, a woman whose loving heart was large enough to take in and cherish a multitude of loves and friendships, and then leave him more than he could appreciate.

It's a little thing, but it troubles me, and I have no doubt but other women, mothers especially, have the same feelings that I do on the subject—that is, ruffles, and bias bands, and fluting, and headings, and so much trimmings.

I tell the girls often: "Now make this dress, or overskirt, or polonaise, quite plain; don't spend your time foolishly; let the same hours you would put upon it be spent in reading useful books, or in study, or even in walking out in the crisp, wholesome, pure air, and treating your lungs to some of the rare breezes on these rugged hill-tops."

They make good promises, and they are good girls, and mean what they say, but before they are aware of it some pretty device suggests itself, and the tempter whispers: "That would be in excellent taste, and not common, either;" and they conclude that, just this once, will not be time wasted unwisely, and they indulge, and time after time they are deluded into the same snare.

For the sake of the women of our land, I do wish this curse of dress could be ameliorated in some way, our growing girls lifted out wholly from its thralldom, and be made to feel and see the emptiness and the wickedness of this great national folly. It comes to the womanhood of to-day like a scourge; it is robbing them of their rightful dues; it is stealing from them that which is of more value than titles, and lands, and deeds, and gold, and jewels. Their precious time is being wasted; their years are dropping away from them and leaving no recompense. Their minds are learning to be content to loiter and doze in the dreamy valleys, instead of aspiring to climb the heights, and grow strong, and stand face to face with the stars, and rejoice in the boon of immortality and the glory and grandeur that circles like a halo a life true and brave and full of excellence and exaltation.

There is nothing that can so belittle our lives as a love of dress. I could cry out when I see poor girls toiling day after day at any kind of menial drudgery, only so it brings them money to expend for finery. That seems the height of their ambition; and they so enjoy devising how the trimming shall be put on, and whether it had better be this way or that.

How this great scourge called dress is to be brought under subjection, to be held in check, to be managed, no one knows. Women's conventions cannot reach it; the press cannot touch it; reason falls to the ground before its brazen stare of disdain, and argument cowers before its august presence. Where it will end no one knows; its pitiable results every right-thinking woman sees and laments; and its wide sweep all over the length and breadth of our doomed land every one feels and sorrows over.

How can our women become cultured when their thoughts are narrowed down within the small compass left to them? How can our capacity for enjoyment be made greater, when this most enervating toil of body and brain is binding us down so effectually? How can we grow wise, and good, and intellectual, and beautiful, in this narrow range we have chosen? God pity us all!

THE MEASURE OF A MAN.

BY REV. CHAUNCY GILES.

A DOCTRINE that is the measure of a man, must be a doctrine which will help him in his labor. It must be a doctrine which he can carry with him into the field and shop, into the store and office. Man must labor. His necessities require it; the constitution of his physical nature demands it; and his labor is often irksome, exhaustive and oppressive. If his doctrine teaches him that labor is a curse imposed upon him as a punishment, it takes away from him his highest motive, it takes his heart out of it, it paralyzes his arm, and dries up the fountain of his strength. It degrades him from a friend and co-worker with the Lord, going forth on an errand of love to his fellow-man, with a message of joy on his lips and help in his right hand, to a convict condemned to labor for a crime. It scourges him to his reluctant task with the whip of necessity. It degrades him from a free man to a slave. It makes labor disreputable. Hence men seek to avoid it for themselves and to force it upon others, and to accumulate the means of living without it. Hence the laborer is unfaithful; he cheats, he steals, he tries to get the most wages for the least service, just as his employer tries to get the most service for the least wages. This creates a perpetual war between capital and labor, and brings ruin and misery to all.

A true doctrine of man's nature, and of his relation to the Lord and his neighbor, would reverse all this. Labor, when rightly viewed, is not a curse, it is a blessing. It has its source in the divine nature, and its ordination in man's nature. It is a form of love; it is a means of transmitting the divine blessings from man to man. It is pleasing to the Lord. "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." It is following our Lord's example. It is helping Him to carry His purposes into effect. The path to Heaven lies through useful work, and the angels walk patiently and tenderly by the side of the honest and unselfish worker through all the dusty paths of life.

If a man's doctrines of Heaven and the Lord, and of his own spiritual nature, teach him that work is noble, and acceptable service and worship when engaged in from right motives, it will help him in every step of his duty. It will give him a new and heavenly motive for his work. It will put love in his heart, and strength in his arm. It will break off the chains of servitude, and make him the Lord's freeman. He will not go crouching and trembling in the presence of pampered idleness. This doctrine of the true and only nobility of use, is the Lord's arm under a man, it is the Lord's strength in him, and that arm will lift his burdens, and make his own hands strong and skilful in his work. That doctrine will be love in his heart, and he will carry its joy and peace into his work. That love will glorify it. He will see his neighbor's good in forge and furrow. Instead of standing alone, opposed by men and branded with the curse of God, he has all Heaven on his side. He is the Lord's ambassador. He puts his message into wood, and iron and stone. Like Moses, he has the rod of a divine power in his hand, with which he parts seas of difficulty for his fellows on their march from the bondage of Egypt to Canaan, brings water from the rock to quench their thirst, and works wonders for their help. The angels are on his side. The Lord is on his side. The prayer offered in useful deed from love to the neighbor, will be more acceptable to Him than incense swung in golden censurs, and all the pious formalities of a sanctimonious worship. The Lord Himself came down to the manger, and the workshop of the carpenter, to daily association with fishermen and tax-gatherers, to eating with publicans and sinners, and we want a doctrine of the Lord which will take us there, when duty calls, and which will ennoble all useful service for man, whether it is the work of the hand or the foot, the lip or the brain.

We want a doctrine that will measure our natural and sensuous delights, and teach us how to enjoy the comforts and blessings of this life. The Lord loves to see His children happy in this world, and He has made the most ample provision for our happiness. It is not His fault if we turn His blessings into a curse. The Lord does not seek "to take us out of the world, but to keep us from evil." No man can fully understand this world until he can see it from a spiritual point of view. Natural delights are not harmful in themselves. It is their abuse and not their proper use that is evil. When the Church teaches us to look upon them as sinful in themselves and displeasing to the Lord, it not only places them in a false light, but it cuts us off from their real use. We lay the foundation for the whole superstructure of our being through the endless future, in this world. Every spiritual faculty is based upon a natural one; the broader, truer and more systematical the natural, the better the foundation. We ought, therefore, to cultivate every faculty, and not suppress it. We ought to use the world, and not abuse it. A doctrine that teaches us to make a desert of this life, that we may gain a paradise above, prevents us from preparing the ground, and planting seeds at the only time when they can be planted, which are to blossom into beauty and bear fruit unto eternal life. Why should sorrow be any more pleasing to the Lord in this world than the other? In what a strange and perverted light does such a doctrine present the wisdom and goodness of the Lord? Does He plant desires in man which it displeases Him for man to gratify? Does He put the forbidden fruit to our lips, and then curse us if we taste it? That cannot be. There can be no better evidence that the Lord intended to have man enjoy his natural delights—the forms of beauty; the delights of the ear, and taste, and touch, than the fact that He has given us the capacities for such delights, and the means of gratifying them. It is the office of the Church to teach us their true value, and how to get it; how to get the best and the most good out of to-day, and at the same time make it an instrument and stepping-stone to a higher good to-morrow. John saw the Holy City, coming down from God out of Heaven. Our city must come down into external life; it must direct, control and use all our natural faculties, our physical strength, our natural science, our natural appetites and desires; our wealth of knowledge and money to the attainment of our highest present and eternal good.

A perfect doctrine must be the measure of man in his sorrow as well as in his joy. In the Holy City there is to be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain. Do you say that it could not be intended for man in this life then? Why not? The Lord did not form the nerves to be the instruments of torture; He created them to be the inlets of delight. He did not form the eye to be blinded with tears, but to be the light of the body, and to fill the mind with images of the beauty and glory of the material world. A true doctrine will teach us the cause of pain and sorrow; how to bear it when it comes and how to prevent its coming. It will divest life of all false and imaginary fears. It will reveal to us the true cause of all pain and sorrow. A false idea concerning the nature of the Lord, and His relations to men, has been one of the most fruitful sources of human sorrow. Men have been taught to regard the Lord as their enemy, burning with vengeance for a violated law; and that the great obstacle to salvation was the difficulty of gaining His favor. They have been taught that the Lord, who loves them with an infinite and unchanging love, hated them with a cruel hatred. That their best friend was their most cruel enemy. If you could be made to believe and know with infallible certainty that the Lord was on your side, that He looked upon you with infinite tenderness and mercy, and never failed to do all in His power for your highest good, would it not take the sharpest regret from disappointment, and the keenest pang from sorrow? The Lord loves me, you would say, and suffers no shadow of sorrow to come upon me, except for my good. He leads me according to an infinite wisdom, which sees the end from the beginning. How such a confidence would dry your tears, and assuage your pain! How it would help you to bear the burdens and meet the trials of life! There could be no grief beyond its power. Death itself would be robbed of its terrors! The death which is now the great terror of humanity, would be seen to be but an appearance. Regarded from a spiritual point of view, it would be found to be only a step in life.

How much we need such a doctrine. How many hearts are breaking with grief for the loss of loved ones, who have only gone from natural sight to come nearer to their true life! How many eyes are so dimmed with tears for the loss of some natural good, that they cannot see the brighter spiritual blessings the Lord offers them in its place. A doctrine that is the measure of a man must probe to its bottom every sorrow, and supply a balm for every wound.

Good works will never save you, but you can never be saved without them.

A MOTHER'S DISCIPLINE.

A SKETCH FROM THE BY-WAYS

BY L— P—.

ONE evening in March, at a late hour, I sat sorting, cutting and sewing a pile of unsightly carpet-rags. This was the last of many burdensome and tedious jobs I had stinted myself to finish during the winter, and here March was at hand, and this distasteful work just fairly commenced. I was weary in body, and worn in spirit, with my early and late toiling, but I resolved that spring should not far advance till my work—at least the heaviest part of it—was off my hands, according to my plans.

The next day, however, my rags were banished to an out-of-the-way place in a promiscuous heap, for Maddie, the oldest of my two little girls, was quite sick, and lay moaning in the arm-chair. My hired help just then got sick, too, and had returned to her home, and I was left alone to attend to my child, whose malady grew more serious hourly, and with a large washing on my hands, which had been put in soak over night.

None, save those who have passed through the ordeal, may know the heart-sinking, the weariness and dreariness of the days and nights that followed, as our little one grew steadily worse, until we thought she was going from us forever. Much sickness prevailing at that season in the community, my good, kind husband, unable to procure other help, took upon himself my care and work, that I might devote myself entirely to Maddie. Thus baby Amy was decoyed from the sick-room, where her prattle could not be endured, to see "pa, pa" peel potatoes, set table and prepare coffee.

But fainter and fainter grew my heart, as day and night our darling sufferer lay battling with the fierce disease, until her body could nowhere bear the softest handling without a cry of pain. I tried to pray, but I only repined. I could not even weep, though my heart seemed crushing beneath the stroke of her anguish. I thought since life was so fraught with sorrow and agony, I could not be thankful for my own, or for my children's; and I once cried: "Since she must suffer thus, oh, end this pain in death, and take my loved one away; but, oh, if possible, 'let this cup pass from me.'"

The disease had reached its climax now, and though I lay by her side trying to soothe her with pet names and endearing words, she heeded it not, for she was delirious, and called pitifully to me: "Mamma, Amy is out in the snow, I must go after her." "Mamma, I can't tie her shoe." "Amy has my dishes." "O mamma, take them away, she will break them!" "See, ma, the horses will kick her." "Do, mamma, give me my doll, Amy is spoiling her."

During these ravings she would frequently attempt to rise, and then fall back with a moan.

Then I remembered, in the heat and hurry of my work, the many burdens I had unconsciously placed upon my little six-years-old Maddie. This was present with her now; and the little incidents, at the time so trifling to me, so grievous to her, came back to me with many self-upbraidings, and her words were stinging arrows to my accusing conscience.

Truly, how many times her playthings had been devoted to the little destructive fingers of her baby sister, that I might, without interruption, compass my self-imposed tasks, and gratify my ambition to accomplish just so much. How many steps she had taken to save time for me and amuse Amy. Had they not both played in a cold room while I was too busy to note the fact, till they returned to me with blue hands and watery eyes, and I knew they were chilled through and through? Had they not, time and again, been turned off with a cold, unsatisfying lunch, instead of a carefully-prepared dinner for childhood's appreciative appetite, that I might gain more opportunity to exhaust my strength and patience over some tedious piece of tucking, ruffling or trimming to adorn their apparel, and make them still more attractive to the eye of pride?

All this, and much more, in that dark hour I saw as exceedingly wrong; and I saw myself, whom I had before thought a tender, loving mother, "weighed in the balance and found wanting." I was a negligent, undutiful mother, unmindful of my child's best interests; and now God, whom I had complained of as "encompassing Himself with a dark cloud, that our prayers should not pass through," seemed speaking to me through these circumstances of my life, and saying to me: "If I spare her, will you do your duty now?" I promised heartily, "I will, I will." More painful to me than the loss of the dear one was the thought of my neglect.

Slowly she began to recover; and the first time she was lifted without that heart-wringing cry, my heart overflowed with joy, my eyes with tears. The first time she knelt with us around the family altar, and the first time she sat in her usual place at the table, the smiles broke on my lips, while tears ran down my face. Oh, we were not sparing of pet names then; and Maddie learned at last how inexpressibly dear she was to us. I had time then to prepare dainty food for her returning appetite. Her toys were no longer subject to the imperious will of her baby sister. Indeed, in many things they seemed to change places; and we might have been in danger of overdoing, had not Amy seemed to realize the situation, and quite naturally fell into our habit of tender concern for "poor sister." I had time now with patience and gentleness to correct the naughty habits formed, to teach Maddie not only a form of prayer, but its meaning. I thought I was the happiest woman in the world when she assumed her usual plays, and the music of her childish glee was unchecked, for it did not jar on disordered nerves or a discordant spirit.

One time early in her sickness she seemed depressed, and I said: "O darling, mother would let you run and play all you wished if you were only well."

She seemed thoughtful, but very sober, and finally said, while every word was to me a wound long in healing: "I am afraid, ma, you will tell a lie."

"What!" said I, "ma tell a lie! Did my little girl ever know her ma to lie?"

She shook her head, but seemed unable to think I could allow her to run and play as she had often attempted to, noisily.

I was careful to see that my promise was fulfilled to the letter. But, oh, how many times during her sickness I feared I should never have cause to restrain those little feet, busy hands and that prattling tongue more.

Now, for the sake of my family's comfort and welfare, I live and labor; but not as before. While I have time for every duty, I have none for needless ornament, or unseasonable work at midnight hours or before the dawn of day. If friends come in and find me cutting paper cats, or helping dress the children's dolls, when buttons come off, and strings fail and knot, I am serene, though my morning's work is not yet all done. They are serene and happy, too. Why should they not be so, where loving, cheerful sacrifice is the order of the day, instead of driving care?

The Home Circle.

LICHEN'S NEW YEAR'S GREETING.

DEAR HOME CIRCLE: How glad I am to be back in my old corner amongst you, and to be able there to wish you a "Happy New Year!" Everything looks so home-like around me. It is so pleasant to see the familiar names of last year's writers, and think that so many of the same eyes will read the pages of the HOME MAGAZINE again. I wonder if all of you readers had a happy New Year, and if any new joys came with its entrance? I wonder how many of you placed wine upon your tables to offer the coming guest, tempting him to spoil the first day of his year with folly and weakness—repaying him for the good wishes he has brought you by an injury which perhaps can never be effaced? Or, how many have tried to use their influence by word or act, when it was practicable or fitting, to strengthen him against the fascinating temptation? Many girls think they have no influence at all, and therefore it is not worth while for them to try to exert any. But only the other day I heard a gentleman say: "The girls have more influence over young men with regard to drinking than any one else can have. If a girl would not go out to a place of entertainment with any young man who she knew had been drinking, nor countenance his taking wine at such places, nor dance with one whom she saw was under its influence, there would not be half so much intemperance as there is now."

It was a quiet, steady, married man who said this; so his words were not spoken out of mere gallantry or compliment to the sweet, timid-looking young girl who was present. It was what he seriously believed from his observation and knowledge of men. And I write it here in the hope that some will be stimulated by it to use whatever influence they may have in a gentle, womanly way upon those with whom they are associated. Who knows how much happier a year they may help to make for some one?

January, 1875! How queer it sounds before we have grown used to it! And what will this New Year be to us? we question eagerly. She holds her hands behind her—all but one—that we may not see what gifts she brings. Curiously we try to peep behind the curtain in which she envelopes them. Vainly we speculate upon the future, and lay plans, with sure confidence of their being carried out, which may fade into vapor at a breath of adverse wind. But fast as they die we make new ones—airy castles which many of us will never enter, but which delight our eyes and hearts in the contemplation.

No doubt this month will be keenly enjoyed by those who, with youth and health on their side, can don their skates, and skim over the smooth crystal surface of river or pond in that most exhilarating of amusements. Or, when the snow-carpet lies thick over the earth, go speeding over the country, warmly wrapped from the biting cold, in comfortable sleighs, to the music of merry bells and joyous voices. But we superannuated ones, who have colds or asthma, rheumatism or neuralgia—any of those disagreeable ills which degenerated flesh is heir to throughout the winter season—will just draw up around the fire, with shawls around our shoulders, put our feet out toward the pleasant warmth, settle ourselves back in comfortable arm-chairs and read, knit or crochet for our enjoyment. Or have the sofa wheeled up to the warm corner, and, tucked away in shawls, rest in its hospitable arms. When an opening door admits a sudden draught of cold air upon us, or an unusually loud blast whistles around the corner of the house, we draw our wraps closer around us with a shiver, and wish that wintry weather would soon be over.

Yet, it has some few beautiful pictures for us, too, and one of these I must describe. 'Tis something which I saw last January, but its impression can never fade from my memory. We had had a damp, cloudy day, and before dark a cold, drizzling rain fell, which gave place during the night to a sharp north wind. Next morning, when we lifted the curtains upon the outer world, a scene of bewildering beauty met the eye. Diamonds and pearls seemed showered over the earth. The trees, the shrubbery, fences, wood-piles, everything, was dressed in a thin covering of ice, which threw back the morning sunshine in dazzling glory. An uncultivated field near the house had grown up thickly in tall weeds, the previous summer, and the dead, branchy stalks were still standing. Every one of these little branches was now cased in crystal, and the whole was a smooth sea of glittering glass; and when the breeze shook and bent this strange foliage, it danced and sparkled, the most resplendent sight I ever looked upon.

Not far from a side window of my room stood a little gnarled peach-tree, so unsightly that it came near losing its claim on our indulgence the year before, and was only spared because of a few fine, luscious offerings of fruit, which it still bore on one branch. Now, all the little twigs were hung with ice pendants, and at certain points reflected the sun's rays in most brilliant rainbow colors. Nature, so loving unto the poorest and humblest of her children, had transformed the ugly little tree into a thing of beauty.

It was hard to withdraw my dazzled, half-blinded eyes from this splendid vision, which I knew would so soon fade away. Even by the noon of that short, bright winter day, it was fast melting into invisible moisture, and the rest of a lifetime may not enable me to witness just such another. I never dreamed of anything of the kind half so beautiful as this. It made me think of a story I read when a child, called "The Silver morning and the Golden day." I do not remember much of it distinctly, but the silver morning was something such a scene as this I have described would be before sunrise; and the sun coming out upon it later, made the golden day. The hero of the story was so impressed by the sight, that in after years, when grown to be an artist, he painted the two scenes as companion pictures. It was a pretty story for young folks. I do not know but that it was in the HOME MAGAZINE. If so, many of you may have read it. That was where I found many of the best and prettiest stories read in my early girlhood.

We took the "Home" during some of its first years, and I grew with its growth, and it helped to form my taste in reading—encouraging what was pure and good with true life lessons running through it; and teaching me to reject that which was sensational or that dressed-up vice and weakness under such a garb as to render them not unpleasant. In those times I lived, for awhile, in a little country village, where we were cut off from society and amusements, and where I often felt dissatisfied with my lot. The coming of the magazine each month, was therefore hailed with joy, and the beautiful little gems of thought and lessons of encouragement in meeting life's duties and trials, from the pen of Virginia F. Townsend, and others, were a source of help and strength to me. It is these things which have made me love the book so, and, in addition to its present worth, cause me to be so interested in its prosperity. May it see many more happy New Years, and go on doing good and giving pleasure and instruction to thousands in the rising generation, as well as those who now read its pages.

May I long be able to read, and also to write for it, adding my little mite, it may be, to the enjoyment of others who do not scorn to notice and love so lowly a thing as a

LICHEN.

MY WINDOWS.

THOUGH one of my names is "Daisy," I, too, am, and have been for nearly a decade, a "lichen."

Have the dear readers of the "Home" a place in their hearts for still another? I am sure they have, for hearts are not like houses; houses will hold no more than they can, while hearts know no limits, they can take in and take in, dear one after dear one, and yet always have room for one more! else I should not dare open "my windows" to look out upon you and your life and that you, also, may "look out upon life" through them, and sometimes, it may be, get a glimpse of the life within.

From one of my windows I look out upon a high mountain, with only the valley between; and just above its summit I see the clear, blue skies and floating clouds, beautiful fleecy clouds of purest white. Only a little while ago this mountain was covered with the royal robe, magnificent in its rare and gorgeous beauty, which October brings each year and, for very gladness, flings over all nature. Now, all is clothed in the sober garb of November; but "Behold all things are beautiful in their season." To-day, while lying back among my pillows looking from my window out upon the old mountain and the beautiful clouds above it, and watching the beechen-leaves, dry and brown, as they are taken up into the air and swept along by the wind, like flocks of frightened birds, I have been forcibly impressed with the truth of those words. The dense forests of bare, gray trees with which the hills are covered make an admirable background for the dark green of the fir-trees and hemlocks scattered here and there among them, and are not without a loveliness of their own, for the sunshine lies over mountain and glen, lighting up the sombre tints with a soft, silvery radiance beautiful to see. Ah, yes; there is a bright side to every picture, and even the life of us lichens is not without its hours of sunshine, and not without its usefulness, we trust. But "the flesh is weak," and, perhaps, to every "lichen" the dark hours come alike, when we are prone to cry out that "our burdens are greater than we can bear." Let us look up, and all the shadows will pass away; let us be "Assured that He whose presence fills

With light the spaces of these hills
No evil to his creatures wills."

"—That He
Will do, whatever that may be,
The best alike for man and tree."

Let us remember that

"In the darkness as in daylight,
On the water as on land,
God's eye is looking on us,
And beneath us is His hand!"

Oh, many and many a time have I been blessed by some golden word of WHITTIER'S! Dear poet! may blessings forever rest upon him and crown his life with peace and happiness for the beautiful words of truth, of comfort and cheer, which he has given to weary, trial-burdened hearts!

MY GIRLS AND I.

BY CHATTY BROOKS.

SECOND SERIES.—No. 1.

SEPTEMBER 1.—Nearly all my girls are back again to attend the fall term. Two or three of them are missing, but their places are filled by new ones. One of them, Elsie Mayland, is a shrewd Yankee girl from Massachusetts. She was left an orphan at an early age, and has had to depend on her own exertions to make a living. She has worked in a factory, and in a shoe manufactory, and at making matches, and bottoming chairs, and in a dairy, and is certainly one of the bravest, most energetic girls I ever met. I hope she will infuse some of her energy and enthusiasm into these quiet girls of mine, especially the doll-ones, and the "mamma-girls," and the cry-baby kind, for all of these are found in our Institute.

Professor McWilliams has two new assistants this term—a young man, Mr. Hardy, and a Miss Pendleton. So we expect affairs to move pleasantly and easily, and no one be overworked or bear too heavy a burden.

September 2.—I saw a little thing to-day that was new to me. Sylvia was making a new white skirt, and, as she has to economize, she made it to wear with her best alpaca dress with a train, or with her other ones that are shorter. It is done by running a cord in a shirr in the back part of it, so that it can be let down or drawn up to suit the kind of a dress. I thought it was very good economy. Sylvia says she always puts narrow linen braid round the wide hems of her skirts to prevent them from fraying about the edges, and wearing out soon. She says it will pay for the trouble, when one is repairing an old skirt, to put a new facing about the bottom and edge it with narrow, substantial braid.

Josephine laughed over this pretty bit of woman's ingenuity, and then she told about being at a wedding once where one of the girls was so unfortunate as to get a spatter of coffee on the end of the beautiful pink bow she wore at her neck. At night when they retired, and the hostess showed them to their room, she saw the damaged ribbon, and very kindly suggested an ingenious device for its removal. "Just fringe it out, dear," said she; "let the stained place come in the fringe, and nobody will ever dream that anything has befallen it." She did so, and it saved the ribbon.

One should never wear a ribbon after it begins to show soil or honest usage; they are not pretty after the lustre and the freshness of the fancy store have departed from them. I remember one time I told my George Nelson to call at our pastor's house and bring home my last magazine, if Mrs. Lee was done with it. Now, my dear dead husband was a man of very few words—pleasant, cheerful, but so modest and quiet that he rarely led in a conversation. He called for the magazine, and when he came into the house I observed that he was smiling. I said: "What now, Georgy?"

"O Chatty!" was his reply, "you will hardly believe me, but our minister's wife had on a really soiled, shabby bow of ribbon this morning!"

A large, elegant one in its day, but it had been worn at dinners, and suppers, and parties, until it had outlived its beauty and freshness, and yet she was wearing it right bravely.

"Don't you ever do such things, Chatty; it is so unwomanly, and in such bad taste. Why, I almost feel as though I would never like her so well again!"

September 5.—I was the last one in bed last night. I went up-stairs for a ball of yarn, and in passing through Tудie's room I stopped and sniffed, and found that the air was not as pure as it should be. There was a taint that was not good for the lungs, and on examination I found that the girl had left her stockings lying on the floor spread out. Her little room-mate, Lottie, had—neat little maiden that she was, or orderly, rather—rolled hers up snugly and stuck them into her gaiters. Now there is nothing more untidy than to leave one's hose in their sleeping-room, unless they are perfectly clean. Poor Tудie's feet perspired, and were nearly always cold and clammy, and she should have known enough to put on fresh, dry hose every other morning, at least. So I softly carried them outside the door and left them hanging there. Then I told her what to do the next morning. Wet the end of a crash towel in water in which ammonia had been put, say one teaspoonful of the spirits of ammonia in a quart of water, and with it rub her feet until they were all aglow. Do this morning and evening, and wash them frequently in soap-suds, rubbing the soles well.

The soles of our feet are sluice-ways to carry off the impurities of the system, and the hundreds of minute pores should be kept open and clean that they clog not and shut in this impurity, and thus endanger our health.

It is a careless trick to allow anything in our sleeping-apartments that can vitiate the air we breathe. I do not permit the girls to keep soiled clothing in their rooms, or ripe fruit, or flowers, or anything that can rob their lungs of pure air.

Now, last winter a lady boarded with me who had three large pots of chrysanthemums. She had brought them from the home of her childhood, and she loved them as though they had human sympathies and human feelings. The stifling odor almost made my home seem like a close sepulchre. I had the headache all the time, and a smothery pain in my breast, and, at last, I told her I could not endure it any longer. She very kindly consented to leave them in the wood-shed until the weather became too cold, and then we put them out in the garden.

It may seem like a whim, but, indeed, I have met with people who affect me similarly.

I remember one, a young man who came to learn a trade with my dear, dead husband. I was repelled at the very first sight of Columbus Guttery. His smile was vapid, and he bowed very often, and he stood before the mirror caressing the pinch of a moustache, and he wore great, flaming, gorgeous neck-ties, and the poor fellow tried to put on all the ways of a well-bred gentleman. He had a hard cough, and his health was not good; this should have appealed to my woman's heart, but it only made him all the more repulsive. I am ashamed to say it, but I grew so that I could not eat at the same table, and afterwhile I could not eat at all, and really my life was becoming a burden, and I found no pleasure in anything.

George Nelson pitied me, like a good husband would, and instead of upbraiding me, he began to lay some plan to get rid of Columbus. It chanced that his father died, very opportunely for us just then, and the young man was called home, and affairs were in such a condition that he could not come back again.

Now I really believe that there are phases in a woman's health and in her peculiar organism that would warrant a physician in saying that a case like this is real—nothing imaginary.

September 6.—Found out something new! Linda, one of the new girls, has a black calico dress like one I used to have, but mine's faded and worn out long ago, while hers is quite as good as new, and not at all faded. They were both bought at Lananhan's new store and are off the same web. But Linda's practical, careful mother knew how to prevent calico from fading, while I did not. She told me all about it, so I could tell the girl-readers of the HOME MAGAZINE.

She wore the dress until it was ready to wash, then dipped it into quite strong salt and water, wet it thoroughly, wrung it out and let it get perfectly dry. The next day it was washed the usual way, and it did not fade at all. This need only be done once before it is washed the first time. Care should be observed in washing all calicoes not to let them remain in the suds any longer than is positively necessary.

She showed me a very pretty purple and white lawn dress, not at all faded, although it had been washed several times. She joined with a couple of other girls in buying the whole web of lawn. They used no precaution whatever in washing, and their dresses faded so nearly white that they were dingy, and they were compelled to bleach them and make white dresses of them. She washed hers in salt and water and set the colors.

But I tell the girls it pays better to purchase the best of material in the first place, and then there is no doubt, or fear, or misgiving whatever. Better to have fewer dresses and let them be good and honest. It takes no longer to make up a number one fabric than it does a poor article, and then it can be depended on afterward. French calicoes, and lawns, and merinos are cheaper in the end. One so dislikes to spend the greater part of two days in making up a ninepence print and then see the colors run, or grow dim, or look tawdry and indicative of sham.

"And here is some more economy, auntie," said Linda, calling me back into her room and pointing to a heap of ruches that lay like a puff of milk-white foam. "Why, when my old grandmother died last spring, she said that I should take all her clothing and effects and use them as far as I could," said the girl, in a low, musical voice. "Now, there were a great many things that I could see no possible way of using, but ma said I could keep them, that sometime they might be an advantage to me, when I needed them most and could not afford to buy. These ruches were made out of a big piece of dotted bobinet that was meant to make grandma's caps. I cut it in strips, made a little hem and put on a narrow bit of edging, and you see they do up beautifully. This nice dolman cape was made of her well-preserved thibet shawl; I used the same fringe that was on the shawl, and to finish it off with a look of tolerable elegance, I put on this nice bow of rich black ribbon. I never aspired to a silk dress, and when I looked at grandma's, my ambition was not fired at all, but one day Lu Tillotson wore an old one of her mother's, just the plain skirt with a white shirt waist, and then I happened to think how nicely I could wear dear grandma's, and here it is, turned wrong side out, top to the bottom, cut gored and the pieces used to make two rows of trimming clear round the skirt. We turned her alpaca dress and made it over into one almost as good as new, although it had to be made very plain. Her black silk cape and apron made me two little jackets, nice enough to wear over dresses that are beginning to grow shabby about the waists and sleeves. A drab merino dress that was pretty well worn, when ripped apart, washed and pressed, made me this polonaise—all except the bands of trimming, buttons, cord and such fixings. Dear old lady! Sometimes I think I should never have had the opportunity of coming here to school had it not been for her generosity and forethought. She knew I had always desired to come to Millwood Institute, and to board here with you in this nice, cosy nest of a place."

My heart warmed toward the new girl, and I felt from that moment that I should love her. She is so singularly child-like in her pretty little confidences.

We have another dear little tot here who bids fair to crowd our pet, Midget, to one side; but Middy will not object; she knows our hearts are large enough to hold both of them. Her name is Katharine, but I tell the girls it would be a shame to give that royal, stately, queenly name to such a baby-girl; and we did not call her by any title except Sissy for some time. But her soft little cuddling, caressing ways made us all, as of one mind, call her Kitten; so Kitten Carnahan is the family baby for this term. She is only ten years old, and diminutive enough to be only seven. Her health is good, and her course of study will not be severe. I hesitated about taking the little thing when her father drove up that day and stopped, and the tiny creature came slipping out from the heap of yellow straw in the bottom of the wagon, looking like a roguish little mink, her eyes all a-sparkle, her golden curls half over her laughing face, the straw sticking all over her, and her blue-ribboned hat tipped to one side real rakishly. I thought of monkeys, and blue-jays, and everything but a winsome girl-baby destined to be a student.

"I was tryin' to go to sleep when the wagon was a bumpin' along, so I'd feel new when I got here," was her cheery salutation, as I reached up and helped the little creature to flutter out on the ground.

We concluded to take her. She seemed so like a ray of sunshine that we all loved her dearly from the first minute. But you will all become better acquainted with little Kitty before the year is out.

Evening.—We were discussing "when to make up the beds," this evening. That is a subject that has troubled more than one woman. Lottie says at her home they always make up the bed in the morning before they go down-stairs at all; Tudie says her mother does, too; Sylvia says they always open their beds when they leave them in the morning, throw back the covers, shake up the ticks, or uncover the mattresses, open the windows and lay the pillows in them to air, open the door and draw the bed out from the wall. Then immediately after breakfast they make them. Josephine does the same way, only they let them remain until nearly noon. Well, we discussed this subject freely, and we all agreed that if it were not for the untidy appearance, it would be well to let them be unmade all day. It would certainly be more in accordance with the rules of good health, but what woman would be content to let her rooms appear in such dire disorder all day. She could hardly stand it, if she was even certain that no eyes except her own would witness the confusion.

Now this was a sore subject, for me at least, and for the sake of the coming housekeepers who were inmates of my home, I put on a brave face and told them why I could not let my bed lie scattered about all day exposed to the free and healthful airs—and, perhaps, to somebody's eyes.

When I was a young woman of eighteen, the village physician, a very worthy young man, came to our house to get the size of the rooms, for his father, who was building a new house. Now, he had shown me very particular attention, and I had evidence that he esteemed me as a very worthy girl.

As soon as he made his errand known, my father asked if he wanted a plan of the whole house, or only certain rooms. My heart almost stood still, and the seconds that intervened before he answered, seemed to lengthen out into hours of suspense.

"Only the size of your largest bed-rooms," was his reply.

Now, sister and I occupied the largest and prettiest one in the house. It was very roomy and had three windows in it, well ventilated, and high, and meant to be healthy.

Without one word, father sprang to his feet with alacrity, and opened doors and bowed the young man through one room and on into ours. It was just as we had scratched out in a hurry in the early dawn and left it—a woman's private bed-room—not expecting that any eyes except our own would dare to invade its sacred precincts. He stooped down, took a long tape measure out of his pocket and measured the length, then he turned and measured across, and that measurement took him clear back under the fluffy bed, but he crept under right manfully, noted down the figures, giving the size, in his pass-book, thanked father and went home.

Sister and I both cried bitter tears. Little things like this mortify a woman more than matters of vast importance, sometimes, and I believe neither of us will ever be reconciled to the unfortunate occurrence.

Since then we throw open our windows and open our beds when we rise and let them lie only until the kitchen work is finished after breakfast. It is well to be on the safe side, for one does not know what minute sickness or accident may call into use the bed-room, and, say what you please about it, a woman is very sensitive about such things.

So we concluded, much as we would like to turn the inside of our sleeping apartments open to the healing, purifying rays of the sun, and the free, fresh airs of heaven, that perhaps it were better to leave them "all tossed up" only until after the breakfast work was done. This will answer very well if the beds are sunned out-doors once a week, and the room ventilated by open windows every day.

There is no room in a house that needs to be kept perfectly clean so scrupulously as one's sleeping-apartment. During sleep the body is throwing off, in insensible perspiration, all the time, that which is poisonous to the lungs, and which vitiates the air. Everything in the room absorbs this impurity, and we should keep no garments hanging on the walls, and if the room is carpeted, it should be cleaned frequently.

We sat and talked until the katydid-music was filling the air like tinkling little bells, and the owl that nightly hoots from the eaves of the wood-shed had taken up his doleful song. While we listened, the silver cornet band from the village halted in the street opposite our house, and the sweetly plaintive air of Pleyel's Hymn floated on the evening breeze and came to us like a blessing, soothing, and soft, and full of the spirit of melody.

NEW YEAR'S BELLS.

BY MRS. L. M. BLINN.

HEAR the story of the bells,
The New Year's bells!

Hark, how their music sways and swells
From out the old belfry, dark and high,
Now down through the valley, now up to the sky,
Swinging and climbing,
And ringing and chiming;
And this is the story their melody tells,
In quaintest, softest rhyming.

"Listen, children to our chimes,
Our merry chimes!

We will ring in your ears some pleasant rhymes,
Of a New Year fresh from the land of light,
Laden with treasures rich and bright,
Winning and willing,
And singing and smiling,
And scattering his gifts for the coming times,
With looks of arch beguiling!"

Listen, children, to his song,
His merry song!

"Have good cheer, friends, it will not be long Ere the sleet and the ice and the shrouding snow,
Will melt in the spring-time warmth and glow;
And winging and springing,
And singing and clinging,
The roses, and birds, and streamlets flow
Your New Year's joys are bringing!

Evenings with the Poets.

WELL AGAIN.

BY ELIZABETH AKERS ALLEN.

THE child lay sick on her tiresome bed;
Her face was whitened and drawn with pain—
And her mother sorrowed, and sadly said,
While tears fell fast on the golden head:
“Ah, me, will she ever be well again?”

The bird outside on the window-sill
Sung loud a joyful and merry strain;
He pecked at the glass with his yellow bill—
He danced and warbled with glad good will,
“Come out of doors and be well again!”

The bee plunged in at the open door,
And bumped his forehead against the pane—
Bright were the golden rings he wore—
He buzzed on the ceiling, the wall, the floor,
And said, “Come out and be well again!”

The breeze came in at the lifted sash,
Full of the strength of the sweet salt main;
It told of the brook's soft purl and plash,
Of new-fledged birds in the roadside ash,
And whispered, “Come and be well again!”

The flowers leaned from their crystal vase,
They were brought by her mates from dell and plain;
They kissed and fondled her fevered face,
They beckoned and nodded with wooing grace,
And said, “Arise, and be well again!”

The rain came out of its cloud, and beat
With dripping fingers against the pane;
And “Come!” it gurgled, “the air is sweet,
There are grassy pools for your burning feet—
Come out of doors and be well again!”

She writhed and moaned in her fever-toss,
And mocking visions beset her brain;
She dreamed of showers, and cool moist moss,
Of clear waves, foaming the ledge across,
To turn the mill-wheel with might and main.

“Give me your bloom, O flowers, said she;
“Give me your fresh, sweet breath, O rain;
Give me your vigor, O tireless bee;
Give me your life, O wind of the sea,
That I may be strong and well again!”

And long ere the forest nuts were browned,
When fields were rich with the rustling grain,
And early apples grew red and round,
Out with the reapers, alert and sound,
The little maiden was well again!

SOAQUIN MILLER IN “THE OVERLAND.”

BETTER it were to sit still by the sea,
Loving somebody and satisfied—
Better it were to grow babes on the knee,
To anchor you down for all your days—
Than wander and wander in all these ways,
Land forgotten and love denied.

Better sit still where born, I say,
Wed one sweet woman and love her well,
Laugh with your neighbors, live in their way,
Be it never so simple. The humbler the home,
The nobler, indeed, to bear your part,
Love and be loved, with all your heart,

Drink sweet waters and dream in a spell,
Share your delights and divide your tears;
Love and be loved in the old east way,
Ere men new madness and came to roam
From the west to the east, and the whole world wide;
When they lived where their fathers lived and died—
Lived and so loved for a thousand years.

Better it were for the world, I say—
Better, indeed, for a man's own good—
That he should sit down where he was born;
Be it land of sands or of oil and corn,
Valley of poppies or bleak northland,
White sea border or great black wood,
Or bleak white winter or bland sweet May,
Or city of smoke or plain of the sun—
Than wander the world as I have done,
Breaking the heart into bits of clay,
And leaving it scattered on every hand.

OH, PLEDGE ME NOT WITH WINE!

OH, pledge me not with wine, dear love!
I shrink from its ruddy glow;
And white and cold a deathly fear
Drops into my heart like snow.

Oh, pledge me not with wine, dear love!
Through its mist of rosy foam
I count the beats of a breaking heart;
I see a desolate home.

Oh, pledge me not with wine, dear love!
I shiver with icy dread;
Each drop to me is a tear of blood
That sorrowful eyes have shed.

Oh, pledge me not! though the wine is bright
As the crystal light that flows
Through the sunset's cloudy gates of fire,
Or the morning's veins of rose.

Put down the cup! it is brimmed with blood
Crushed throbbing from hearts like mine!
For hope, for peace, for dear love's sake,
Oh, pledge me not with wine!

“IN DUE SEASON.”

YE who sow with anxious yearning
Till the tiny leaflets peep,
Waiting, watching, patience learning,
“If ye faint not, ye shall reap.”

Though the harvest long delaying
Cause you, sorrowing, to weep,
Still believe this faithful saying—
“If ye faint not, ye shall reap.”

Ground now dead and barren seeming,
Blooming shall awake from sleep,
For the promise rises beaming—
“If he faint not, ye shall reap.”

Seeds of truth around you flinging,
On fair mead and rugged steep,
In your ears one truth be ringing—
“If ye faint not, ye shall reap.”

Fearless tread the path of duty,
Joy shall cause your hearts to leap,
When from fields of Golden beauty,
“If ye faint not, ye shall reap.”

EDITOR HOME MAGAZINE:—Will you permit me to say a few words to Pipesey. I am one of your subscribers, and like the magazine very much.

DEAR PIPESEY! although I am a stranger to you, you are not to me, for you visit me every month. You tell us so many things that are good that I would like to return the compliment; so I will tell you my way of washing flannel. I have been a housekeeper over twenty years, and washing flannel so that it would not shrink has been one of the most difficult things I had to manage. After trying a great many ways, I think the following the best. Take soft water, just warm enough to be pleasant to the hand; put in soap quite liberally, enough to make a stiff suds so the dirt will not kill the foam; then wet the goods, piece by piece, as you want to wash them, using only the hands, and wash them by pulling and squeezing—never rub them. After washing them enough, take water the same warmth as the suds and use one or two, as needed, to rinse them in. I have tried this three winters and am satisfied it will not fall if tried according to directions.

That you may still visit us is the wish of PANSY.

RECIPES.

PORTSLADE APPLE PUDDING.—Pare and core half a dozen good apples, and boil them in as little water as will cook them; reduce the fruit to a pulp, add the juice of one lemon and about a quarter of its grated rind, and half a teaspoonful of fresh powdered ginger. Next, make a mixture of four well-beaten eggs with a quarter of a pound of butter, warmed to fluidity, and six ounces of bread-crumbs; moist sugar to taste—say four ounces—and a good dash of nutmeg. Lastly, blend all together, and put into a dish which has been buttered, and spread over with bread crumbs; then bake for one hour. To serve, turn out of the dish and dust with white sugar.

EGGS DRESSED SPANISH FASHION.—In a frying-pan toss a slice of rich bacon for the sake of the fat it will render; take away the bacon; mix a teaspoonful of honey with the bacon fat; break into it a dozen new-laid eggs, and do them slowly; take them up with a skimmer, place them in a dish, and almost musk them with pickled red and green capsicums, sliced.

APPLE MARMALADE.—Peel, core and boil the apples—Spitzenbergs are the best—with only sufficient water to keep them from burning; beat them to a pulp; to every pound allow three-quarters of a pound of lump sugar; dip the lumps into water, put these into a saucepan and boil until the syrup is thick and can be well skimmed; add this syrup to the apple, with half a teaspoonful of minced lemon-peel to each pound, and stir over a quick fire till the apple ceases to stick to the bottom of the pan. Dip jelly moulds into water, and lay in the bottoms, as they are inverted, a few strips of citron and some blanched almonds; then pour in the marmalade, and when cold it will turn out easily.

TO BONE A TURKEY OR FOWL WITHOUT OPENING IT.—After the fowl has been drawn and singed, wipe it inside and out with a clean cloth, but do not wash it. Take off the head, cut through the skin all round the first joint of the legs, and pull them from the fowl, to draw out the large tendons. Raise the flesh first from the lower part of the backbone, and a little also from the end of the breastbone, if necessary; work the knife gradually to the socket of the thigh; with the point of the knife detach the joint from it, take the end of the bone firmly in the fingers, and cut the flesh clean from it down to the next joint, round which pass the point of the knife carefully, and when the skin is loosened from it in every part, cut round the next bone, keeping the edge of the knife close to it, until the whole of the leg is done. Remove the bones of the other leg in the same manner; then detach the flesh from the back and breastbone sufficiently to enable you to reach the upper joints of the wings; proceed with these as with the legs, but be especially careful not to pierce the skin of the second joint: it is usual to leave the pinions unboned, in order to give more easily its natural form to the fowl when it is dressed. The merrythought and neckbones may now easily be cut away, the back and side-bones taken out without being divided, and the breastbone separated carefully from the flesh (which, as the work progresses, must be turned back from the bones upon the fowl, until it is completely inside out.) After the one remaining bone is removed, draw the wings and legs back to their proper form, and turn the fowl right side outwards.

A turkey is boned exactly in the same manner; but as it requires a very large proportion of forcemeat to fill it entirely, the legs and wings are sometimes drawn into the body, to diminish the expense of this. If very securely trussed, and sewn, the bird may be either boiled, or stewed in rich gravy, as well as roasted, after being boned and forced; but it must be most gently cooled, or it may burst.

Fashion Department.

FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

IT is fairly decided that felt is to be the most fashionable, or, at least, the most commonly-worn material for bonnets and hats this winter. These felt hats will, in fact, work an entire revolution in millinery. The only wonder is that, cheap, comfortable and pretty as they undoubtedly are, they have not been thought of and adopted long ago. They are of all shapes and styles, though the prevailing modes are soft, with high crowns with tolerably broad brims, which, being without wire, are turned up or turned down, as the caprice of the wearer dictates, and fastened with bows of ribbon, or velvet, or aligrettes of feathers and jet, or by a bright-colored bird's wing.

Flowers are not so much seen this season, as they do not seem to go well with felt, but plumes of any description and color are worn. These hats are bound around the edge with velvet, and have bias folds of velvet around the crown.

There is great variety in the styles of wearing the hair. Ladies with abundance of hair discard false braids entirely, and gather all the hair, save a single tress on each side of the forehead, into a mass, fastened together low behind, where it is tied in a short, thick loop. For the street this loop is braided, as the loose hair would soon be disheveled if worn in the open air. The tresses in front are brought in large, soft waves across the forehead, and fastened behind by a short strap made of the ends of the tress. This style is most becoming for ladies who have the low, broad, Greek forehead.

Ladies who have not much hair of their own retain high coiffures. Finger-puffs are massed over the top and back of the head, and soft loops are added behind, so that while the coiffure towers high above the head, it is also low behind.

Ladies whose hair grows thickly about the ear and neck, display its luxuriance by combing it straight upward to a mass of soft puffs or crown braids, over which droop two small, short, feathery curls.

The headdress, whether it be a cluster of flowers or downy marabout feathers with a heron's feather wigrette in the centre, is now set directly on top, on the left side, or quite in front, but not low behind.

The chataleine braid and the low plaited Catogan loop are worn in the street. A crown braid is worn with the chataleine, a bow of ribbon or of twilled bias silk ties the Catogan. A fillet of black velvet studded with jet beads is a simple and pretty ornament when worn around massive braids.

There is about to be a change in collars. The day of the ruff is fast going by, and the plain standing collar is about to be installed in its place. These collars are of various styles. Some of them are straight, stiff bands. Then there is the standing collar with points turned over in front, and the standing, flaring collar, running down to a point in front. Then there is the collar so rounded that it flares at the back, turned in front with two long, narrow revers, and a collar presenting a similar appearance on the bosom, but plaited instead of flared at the back.

Of jackets, the cuirass is the most in favor. It is a round basque, fitting the figure as closely as it can without straining, and coming smoothly over the hips a quarter of a yard. A cord or piping edges it, and when ball fringe is placed on the skirt it is added to the cuirass.

Cloaks of heavy, rich material, such as beaver cloth and imitation seal-skin, will be cut this winter in the shape of long, loose sacques, single-breasted, closing snugly up to the throat, and shaped but slightly, or not at all, to the figure at the back. The richer cloaks of metalasé silk and velvet will be trimmed with velvet or fur. Cloth garments will be heavily braided and beaded, or bordered with narrow bands of fur.

New Publications.

The Mistress of the Manse. By J. G. Holland. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. A new poem by the author of "Bitter Sweet" is sure to find a large and appreciative audience among the refined and cultivated. This one is a love-romance, in which the author shadows forth his idea of the true relation of married partners. It contains many passages of exquisite beauty, in which he touches the springs of human feeling, and reveals his loving sympathy with nature.

For Better or Worse. A Book for some Men and all Women. By Jennie Cunningham Croly (Jennie June.) Boston: Lee & Shepard. A good book, and one that, if read carefully by young men and women before marriage, would save many from unhappy unions. Mrs. Croly writes sensibly, and evidently from wide observation and careful thought. Her book is full of wise suggestions and admonitions; and is especially to be commended to those who are not harmonious in their wedded lives. Not a few of these might be helped to a knowledge of the difficulties in their special cases, and be enabled to see how they were to be lessened, or removed altogether. We make a single extract.

"There is another temptation which this age opposes to the duty of the wife, and which is even more dangerous than prosperity, because subtler, and presented under a variety of seducing and attractive forms, and that is INDIVIDUALISM. To women it puts on the guise of an angel unlocking the gates of Paradise, and is the herald of a gospel so sweet and entrancing, that they yield without opposition to its fascinations, until they find themselves sailing out of the smooth waters into a troubled sea, full of difficulties and conflicts, and hiding beneath its treacherous surface a still deeper blackness and darkness.

"It sets itself from the beginning in active opposition to all unity and harmony between husband and wife, to all subordination of individual desire to the interests of the family. It says to the wife: Why should you be the mere echo of your husband? Why should your gifts and graces be absorbed in the drudgery of the household and the care of children? Your first duty and last duty is to yourself, and no other has any right to interfere with it; if you feel that this is your highest, and truest, and best representative work, why then do it; but if you feel that you can do something else better, why then, in God's name, do that.

"Does it not sound plausible? Would it not be likely to lead, I will not say mislead, any young and inexperienced woman, conscious of some power, but ignorant of the laws which govern her own being and control her relations with the world about her?

"By the estimate which the world puts upon that which is known and recognized, is she not justified in seeking personal fame, personal honor, personal recognition? Is she not justified in sacrificing to these, if it is necessary, family ties, family affections and family interests? She has not yet learned the very unsatisfactory nature of public reputation, and how utterly worthless it becomes when obtained at the sacrifice of known duty.

"I do not blame women for desiring personal reputation; I would certainly not prevent, but would rather help them to achieve it; but I would have them put it upon higher ground than the low one of self, that of duty to the family, or to humanity; and they will soon discover that we give to the world the best that is in us, by doing the duty that lies nearest to us, and that it is best to do it because it is duty, and not because it will bring us fame, or honor, or even honest recognition.

"It is not the mere ambitious desire for personal reputation, however, which presents individualism in its worst aspect; it is the baleful influence, the pernicious tendency of the doctrines, and the destructive moral and social ideas to which it leads. In spirit it is directly opposed to our highest moral conceptions—that of subordination of the individual will to the general good.

"It puts self, and the lowest instincts, before the convictions of honor and duty. It tramples upon whatever stands in the way of personal gratification, and, in fine, makes of the individual a new golden calf, which it sets upon a pedestal, and calls upon woman to fall down and worship it.

"Why should not they do so, they already ask, as well as men? I answer, because if they are the real possessors of the moral power attributed to them by men, of that fine and subtle moral and spiritual force which it is the dream of all good men and women will sometime be formulated into an active and all-pervading agency, and brought to bear upon the selfish and brutalizing tendencies of every-day life, then they ought to be superior to selfish and merely personal considerations. They should be able to say to men: It is not out of your selfishness, your individualism, your political preferment—always built upon the bodies of prostrate rivals—or your personal successes, at the expense of costly tears, that you get your chief pleasure and satisfaction; it is in your homes, your families, your children; in something which you have done to mitigate pain, to create new sources of enjoyments, and add to the real wealth and happiness of the world—it is these that you prefer to think of, and to rest upon, as the material for a desirable and hopeful immortality.

"It is, therefore, in these acts of beneficence, not in those of selfishness, that we wish to imitate you, and not so much imitate as work with you. We do not wish to make another great, assertive, belligerent I in the world, to oppose itself to your I, but we ask, for the good of the world at large, that the office of the woman may be respected as well as that of the man, and that the bombastic I may be resolved into an harmonious We."

The Medical Use of Alcohol; and Stimulants for Women. By James Edmunds, M. D. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House. This little volume contains the three addresses delivered in New York City by Dr. James Edmunds, the eminent English physician, on "The Medical Use of Alcohol," on "Stimulants for Women," and on "The Dietetic Use of Alcohol." The clear, practical, common sense way in which these subjects are treated, give to the utterances of Dr. Edmunds great force and value. The book should be widely circulated and carefully read. From the lecture on "Stimulants for Women," we take the following startling and important declarations. The doctor said:

"A very large majority of the ladies of my own acquaintance on the other side, who are fair samples perhaps of the ladies living in London society, have acquired the habit of using wine, table-beer, stout, and frequently whisky and brandy, to a large extent, I think, owing to the mistakes on the part of my own profession, in the advice which they have given. The result is that the babies of the present generation are never sober from the earliest period of their existence until they have been weaned! This is a shocking statement for me to make, but I should not be doing my duty here unless I were to make it as broadly and strongly as that. It is a simple fact. The mother's blood, practically, is entirely in common with that of the child. You know perfectly that, if a mother takes even an ordinary dose of castor-oil, it will very often affect the baby more than it does the mother; that one has to be exceedingly careful in prescribing for mothers simply on this ground. Now, what does that simple fact with which all you mothers are familiar show? Why, it shows this—that the soothed condition of the body, after the mother has taken half a pint of beer, is really the first stage of drunkenness in that child! When I hear a mother telling me that whenever she takes a little whisky and water or brandy and water because the child is fractious, and she finds that her milk agrees with it better, I am obliged to ask her if she knows what she is doing? If she knows that she is simply making herself the medium of distilling into her babe's system almost the whole of that spirit which she takes into her own, and whether she is aware that that soothed condition of the child is really the first stage of drunkenness? The fact is, the baby is only the infinitely more sensitive extension of the mother's system; and it is more likely than any other part of the mother's system to receive the things which are injurious that are taken through the medium of the mother's diet. Bear that in mind when you are told to take wine, or beer, or brandy; understand that you are merely distilling that wine, spirit and beer into your child's frame; that the very mould which that child is to preserve for the rest of its life is being constructed out of blood that is alcoholized—out of a condition of the system in which intoxication is the real substantial element for the first twelve months of its growth!"

One is surprised by a statement like this. Whether or not the effect of stimulants on the nursing child be as great as here represented, any one can see that it must be very serious, and tend to the production in after-life of that craving for intoxicants which is the curse of our people in all conditions of society. Doubtless many a mother has, in the way here shown, foredoomed her child to drunkenness.

Homes, and How to Make Them. By E. C. Gardener. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. We all have to live in houses, and may of us try to build them. Yet the ignorance which is prevalent on the important subject of architecture is attested to by the numerous abortions found the length and breadth of our country, and called houses. The style in which this book is written is a little tedious, it being in the form of a correspondence, and much matter irrelevant to the subject is consequently brought in; but the hints and directions it gives are practical and wise. Every one who contemplates building a house will do well to give this volume a careful reading.

Strength and Beauty. Discussions for Young Men. By Mark Hopkins, D.D. New York: Dodd & Mead. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co. This volume contains a series of lectures on important religious topics. These lectures are deep and earnest in their thought, and vigorous in their expression, and will attract the attention of many readers.

Camilla: A Tale of a Violin. Being the artist life of Camilla Ureo. By Charles Barnard. Boston: Loring. For sale in Philadelphia by Porter & Coates. Every one in the least interested in the struggles and successes of genius, will read this book with ardent attention. It is a touching story, and reads more like a romance than like a history of a veritable life.

The Mysterious Island. By Jules Verne. New York: Scribner & Co. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co. This is a genuine romance, full of the most intense interest, which every one who ever reads fiction at all, will delight in. Jules Verne stands at the very head of his school as a writer of probable impossibilities. The story is handsomely illustrated by numerous engravings.

What Might have been Expected. By Frank R. Stockton, author of "Roundabout Rambles," etc. New York: Dodd & Mead. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co. This is a lively story for boys and girls, written in an entertaining style, profusely illustrated and handsomely bound.

Brave and Bold; or, The Story of a Factory Boy. By Horatio Alger. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is one of those juvenile books, which, at the same time they interest their boyish readers, encourage them in noble and brave actions. This book will undoubtedly have a great success.

The Puddleford Papers; or, Humors of the West. By H. H. Riley. Boston: Lee & Shepard, Publishers. Books descriptive of western life are now quite common, and always meet popular approval. This book is full of life and fun, its descriptions of people and events a little overdrawn, perhaps, yet with a certain crude likeness to the reality. While it will obtain no lasting place in American literature, it will probably attract a wide circle of readers.

The Child of the Tide. By Mrs. Ednah D. Chinee, author of "Sally Wilburns, the Mountain Girl," etc. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is a pleasant story, by an author who has already attained considerable reputation as a writer of semi-juvenile books; it is liberally illustrated and handsomely bound, and is in every way a beautiful and appropriate book for the holidays.

The Life Cruise of Captain Bess Adams. A Temperance Tale. By Julia McNair Wright. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House. For sale in Philadelphia by Garrigues Bros., 608 Arch Street.

Esther Maxwell's Mistake. A Story founded on Fact. By the author of "Andrew Douglas," etc. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House. For sale in Philadelphia by Garrigues Bros.

These are two excellent temperance stories written by well-known authors. They should be extensively circulated, and we recommend them especially to the consideration of those who are purposing buying books during the holidays.

Portrait Authors. Worcester, Mass.: West & Lee. This is a new and very entertaining game, which combines instruction with amusement. Price 50 cents.

The Game of American History; or, Portraits of the Revolution. Springfield, Mass.: Milton, Bradley & Co.

Figuro. Springfield, Mass.: Milton, Bradley & Co.

Corona; or, the Game of the Banner and Crown. Springfield, Mass.: Milton, Bradley & Co.

We have here a very fine collection of games for the amusement of young people and social gatherings generally. They are, comparatively speaking, new, and not only their novelty, but their excellence, will please those for whom they are intended.

Scribner's Monthly. An Illustrated Magazine for the People. Conducted by J. G. Holland. New York: Scribner & Co. We have been favored by the publishers with the two handsomely-bound volumes of this admirable magazine, the popularity of which has been steadily increasing for years. Dr. Holland gives to its conduct the best efforts of a mind rich in culture, observation and experience, and his fine taste and discrimination are seen everywhere in its pages. Its high moral tone, its fearless condemnation of social wrongs and its sympathy with all that is pure and good in humanity should give it the widest circulation among the people.

St. Nicholas. Scribner's Illustrated Magazine for Boys and Girls. Conducted by Mary Mapes Dodge. Vol. I. New York: Scribner & Co. The first volume of St. Nicholas, rich in its external beauties of red and gold, and running over with good things from author and artist, is the largest and most attractive gift book of the season for our young folks. Speaking of this elegant volume, Charles Dudley Warner, the author of "My Summer in a Garden," says: "I have watched the magazine every month of its existence, and have seen its beauties of pen and pencil unfold, and I am surprised now that it becomes a book—and as handsome a book as St. Nicholas himself can hope to find on Christmas—by the variety and wealth of its contents. Never before, I think, has so much literary and artistic talent co-operated in the service of children, and I will not resist the impulse to say that it is the best magazine for children of all ages I have ever seen; it is even more entertaining for grown people than some of the quarterlies."

All of which is true to the letter. If you want to give your children a real pleasure get this first volume of St. Nicholas.

Editor's Department.

The Home Magazine for 1875.

IN this, the opening number for the new year, we can do little more than refer to our Prospectus, in which will be found an announcement of the various literary attractions that are to give value and interest to the HOME MAGAZINE. Its growing popularity, and the high regard in which it is held everywhere in families of taste and intelligence, is not only deeply gratifying, but acts as a natural stimulus to new efforts in order to make it still more acceptable. As will be seen, our programme for the coming year is rich with a promise of good things; and we need hardly refer to the past as an assurance that all we have here promised will be more than fulfilled.

This Number

IS crowded with articles of rare interest; but even replete with excellence as it is, we have had to omit several Departments for lack of space, and to pass over to future numbers many attractive papers designed for this. But all in good time. The number is so rich and enjoyable, that readers will have the double satisfaction of delight in the present, and a sure anticipation of as good, if not better things to come.

We refer with pride and pleasure to the high artistic character of the illustrations with which we open the year. In this we now stand side by side with the best illustrated magazines of the country.

The Drinking Usages of Society.

THE Portland Transcript has some sound and sober remarks on the duties of good citizenship in regard to the evil of intemperance. We give them below, and commend them earnestly to the consideration of all who have not yet made up their minds to stand squarely on temperance principles. The lines are being more and more clearly drawn every day, and public sentiment is fast taking shape on this momentous question. Good citizens cannot encourage an evil which, more than all others, is, at this day, working disaster to modern society; and those who so encourage drinking must take their places on the wrong side, and share in the disgrace that surely attaches to people who do not care who is hurt so they enjoy themselves:

"Every friend of his kind and lover of good order and morality, must rejoice that the temperance movement in this city has reached the drinking classes, and that many are nightly seen signing the pledge and resolving, with God's help, to live hereafter sober lives. The ravages of intemperance, spite of all laws and moral influences, are so great and so fearful in their character that it is the highest interest of the whole community to encourage and promote every effort looking toward the saving of the inebriate and the abolition of the drinking customs of society.

"Every man owes the temperance movement at least the benefit of his own example. When earnest men and women are laboring to banish this great scourge from among us, a decent regard for propriety, as well as for the good of society, demands that the social glass should be banished from both public and private entertainments. It may not be too much to say that the fountain head of the stream of intemperance which desolates all classes is found in the drinking customs of the higher orders of society. The wine-glass is the forerunner of the rum-jug. That which is fashionable in good society will be imitated by the lower classes. Wine-drinking in high life sustains and sanctions rum-drinking in low life. A heavy responsibility therefore rests upon those who place intoxicating liquors on their tables or introduce them at public entertainments. Scenes like those witnessed at a recent supper given to citizens from abroad are deplorable in every aspect, and call for the severe condemnation of the public.

"A prolific source of intemperance, growing out of these drinking customs of society, is the habit of 'treating,' or inviting friends and acquaintances to drink intoxicating liquors at all hours, without rhyme or reason. Of all senseless customs which have obtained a foothold in civilized society, this is the most indefensible and absurd. Friend meets friend, and immediately there is an invitation to drink, not because either party is thirsty, or has any real desire for beverage at that particular time, but because it is the custom, the thing to do. Why not, every time you meet a friend, treat him to a new hat or a pair of boots? It would be a much more sensible custom, for the articles given might be turned to use, while the glass of liquor is not only useless but absolutely injurious. Neither civility nor friendship demands that any one should endanger health, and run the risk of contracting a habit fatal alike to body and soul. Every man who respects himself, and has the good of society at heart, will discountenance the senseless habit of stand-up drinks by refraining from treating and declining to be treated."

Picturesque Glimpses of Philadelphia.

A CENTURY After; or, Picturesque Glimpses of Philadelphia and its Surroundings," is the title of an elegantly illustrated work now in preparation, and soon to be issued in numbers. It is under the artistic supervision of Mr. J. W. Lauderbach, whose exquisite skill in wood-cutting has placed him at the head of his profession. The first numbers will appear sometime next spring. Size, quarto, on heavy, tinted paper. Each number will contain fifteen or more engravings, many of them full-page. The pictures will all be new, and illustrate in a style never surpassed, if equalled, objects of interest in and around the city. They will be from the pencils of Thomas Moran, I. D. Woodward, James Hamilton, E. B. Bessel, F. B. Schell and W. L. Sheppard. Some of the best examples of Pennsylvania scenery will also be included. It is designed to make this the most elegant work ever issued from the press of Philadelphia, and one in which every Philadelphian must feel an especial pride. It will be included in fifteen numbers, at fifty cents each, and be published by Messrs. Allen, Lane & Scott, of this city.

"Stepping-Stones."

OUR frontispiece this month is from a fine picture by William Frederick Yeames, a Russian by birth, but identified through long residence and education with English art, and an associate of the Royal Academy. Among his pictures which have attracted marked attention are, "The Meeting of Sir Thomas More with his Daughter, after his Sentence of Death;" "Queen Elizabeth Receiving the French Ambassadors after the News of Massacre of St. Bartholomew;" "The Sonetto;" "The Toilette;" "Love's Young Dream;" "The Path of Roses;" "The Alarming Footsteps," etc., etc. Of the "Stepping-Stones," the London Art Journal says:

"In 1865, he sent to the French Gallery, Pall Mall, the 'Stepping-Stones.' The subject is as humorous as it is original. A lady of mediæval times is crossing a narrow stream carefully and adroitly, on some large blocks of stone, which serve as a kind of bridge connecting a mansion with the town; in her hand she carries a pet lap-dog in somewhat awkward fashion, and the little animal turns up its eyes to her in a most ludicrous way, as if praying to be released. The maiden's train is daintily upheld by a rather ancient serving-man, who performs the duty with a serio-comic expression both of face and figure. The scene is of Flemish character, and the two personages are admirably drawn; while the picture, viewed simply as an example of painting, shows many excellent qualities."

"Rachel Dilloway's Son."

MRS. DORR'S fine story, the interest of which deepens with every chapter, runs over into this year, and will be continued for several months. New subscribers who begin with January can, if they desire it, obtain the preceding portion of the story at a trifling cost, as we shall print separately the first fourteen chapters, in order to supply those who may wish to have this serial from the commencement. On receipt of fifteen cents, that portion of the story running from July to December, neatly printed and stitched in a cover, will be sent my mail.

Publishers' Department.

NEW AND LARGER-FACED TYPE.

In order to meet the expressed wish of a large number of our readers, we print the HOME MAGAZINE on a bolder-faced type, which will be found much pleasanter to the eye. We are able to do this without any material reduction of the reading matter.

WHAT IS SAID OF THE HOME MAGAZINE.

If we were to publish a tithe of the warmly-expressed letters of commendation that flow in upon us, we could fill pages of our magazine. They come from all parts of the country, and are filled with the heartiest expressions of delight and approval. The press, too, has laid us under countless obligations for its strong words of approval. We will be pardoned for copying from a paper in Tennessee, the Manchester Democrat, the following testimony to the value of our periodical as a magazine for the people. Our warmest thanks are due the editor:

"ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE.—Having received the November number of this excellent magazine, we are reminded of a purpose we have had in view for some time to notice it more fully, and we do so the more freely inasmuch as we do not receive the magazine in exchange, but have taken it and read it for years at the regular subscription price. Our better half, whom we consider a good judge, says it is the best magazine published in the United States of which she has any knowledge. In our humble judgment, the encomium, in one respect, is fully merited, for, during the twenty years we have been reading it (we began with its first number), we have never noticed a single sentence that did not breathe the spirit of the purest Christian morality. Its defense of the temperance cause alone has endeared it to many a heart suffering from the evils of intemperance.

"We advise every lady reader of the Democrat, if she wants good and pure and wholesome reading matter for the long winter nights, to become a subscriber. She may be sure she will get something worth the money she expends, and something worth more than money in the shape of encouragement, instruction and pleasure from its pages. We shall soon be renewing our subscription for the coming year, and will gladly add new names for the list at Manchester. Every subscriber gets a premium of a fine picture with the magazine; but the beautiful pictures wrought for the eye of mind and heart within its pages are premiums which we value much more highly, albeit the first are always acceptable. We cannot too highly commend the HOME MAGAZINE to a reading public, and especially to the mothers of our land."

THE MAGAZINE OF THE PEOPLE.

THE HOME MAGAZINE is not the rival or the competitor of any other magazine, but stands alone in its peculiar sphere, character and work, and addresses itself to men and women of taste, culture and common-sense; to those who have true and right purposes in life, and some interest in humanity; to those who read for mental gain and recreation rather than for mere amusement. It goes into homes of the people as a companion and friend, interested in all that interest them, and ready to help, comfort, amuse, cheer, instruct or delight every one from the youngest to the oldest.

It is the great "HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE OF THE PEOPLE," so recognized and acknowledged all over the land; and to bring it up more and more perfectly to this ideal will be the untiring effort of its publishers and editors.

Attention to these small details will save time in the reception of patterns ordered, and a great deal of trouble to us.

CERTIFICATES.

The following, from among a host of similar Testimonials of the extraordinary virtues of GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP, are selected for their brevity.

Cure of Salt-Rheum.

Dr. GOURAUD:—Dear Sir,—I was for several weeks sorely afflicted with Salt-Rheum on my hands and fingers. Your Medicated Soap was recommended to me. I bought a cake, wetted it, and rubbed it on my hands several times a day, and before the cake was used up my hands were free from any disfigurements, and the cuticle all smooth and white. I had tried several remedies previously. You are welcome to print this testimonial to the worth of your Soap.

Yours, respectfully, HENRY BARTON,
84 Nassau Street.

PITTSBURGH, March 7, 1872.

Dr. FELIX GOURAUD:—Dear Sir,—I received your highly Medicated Soap, and have used it one week. During the time I used the first cake my face changed every day, until I was entirely free of pimples, and to-day I can say I possess a clear complexion. SOLELY FROM THE USE of your Soap. I wish you to forward me at your earliest moment half a dozen of your Italian Medicated Soap.

Wishing you success and a long life, I remain your friend,

J. C. STROUP,
No. 65 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. Stroup is a highly respected and well-known citizen of Pittsburgh, and trustworthy.

Dr. GOURAUD'S SOAP is also a sovereign remedy for SCALD HEADS, SCALP DISEASES, MOTH PATCHES, SALT-RHEUM, RINGWORM, WORMS IN THE SKIN, and all SKIN BLEMISHES. Warranted, or no pay taken. 50 cents a cake. Found at Dr. GOURAUD'S Old Established Depot, 48 BOND STREET, New York, and Drugists. Beware of imitations.

Gouraud's Soap.

We observe that Carleton & Hovey, of this City, (Lowell, Mass.,) advertise Gouraud's Italian Medicated Soap. It is long since we have seen the article, and do not refer to it in reference to the purpose to which it is said to be more particularly applied. But we can say, from some experience years back, that it is by far the best article to be used in shaving that was ever manufactured. It costs even a little more than the best shaving soap, but there is nothing in the market that can compare with it in this regard. We can truly recommend it to every man who shaves himself and uses soap for that purpose, instead of any of its substitutes.

Mr. Crampton, proprietor of the Golden Rule, Lowell, says, while his son was in the country he was terribly burned. Gouraud's Italian Medicated Soap instantly cured him.

Ask the following well-known persons in the Nation; Major-General SANDFORD; Colonel DU SOLLE, Editor; Capt. RYDNER, Ex-U. S. Marshal; FRANK QUEEN, Editor; RICHARD GRANT WHITE; R. S. MCKENZIE, Editor; and a host of other celebrities.

PREPARED BY DR. T. FELIX GOURAUD, 48 BOND STREET, New York, formerly of Walker Street, and late of 458 Broadway. Established 31 years.

DR. T. F. GOURAUD'S ORIENTAL CREAM, or MAGICAL BEAUTIFIER needs no advertising; the demand for this admirable Cosmetic exceeds the Doctor's ability to supply promptly his customers.

Dr. GOURAUD is constantly receiving orders from all parts of the Union for one and two cakes of soap, requesting to forward by mail, forgetting that all mail matter must be prepaid. The postage on the Soap is 25 cents.

TEMPLE OF ISIS, POMPEII.

POMPEII.

BY MARION KNIGHT.

THERE is no historic record of any eruption of Vesuvius before the Christian era. Yet the myths of the ancients bore testimony to its activity at some remote date. The shores of the Bay of Naples were called the Phlegra or Phlegreæ Campi (Burnt Fields), from the traces of igneous action everywhere visible. The earth was riven and scorched, and bore traces of volcanic action. Here was located the famous battle between the giants and the gods, assisted by Hercules, in which the former were cast down and destroyed by the thunderbolts of Jupiter. And these scorching thunderbolts had burnt and blackened the earth, and left their traces in molten stone, lava and ashes.

In this neighborhood was Avernus, the mouth of Hell, over which no bird could complete its flight, but dropped into its depths, overcome by the sulphurous exhalations. Avernus is the Greek form of the name, signifying birdless, and referring to the same supposed deadly character, while its dreary and terror-striking appearance was certainly suggestive of the idea that it might be the opening to the nether world. The superstition of the middle ages transferred the mouth of hell from Avernus to the crater of Vesuvius, and numerous are the stories which are recorded by eye-witness to the descent of the wicked dead to the infernal regions through this yawning pit, in support of the idea.

Strabo, who wrote some part of his work, at least, in the reign of Tiberius, about the commencement of our era, thus describes the Phlegrean Fields:

"After doubling Midenum, next comes a lake, (now Mau Morto,) beyond which the coast falls back in a deep bay, where stands Bais and its warm baths, useful both for purposes of pleasure and for the cure of diseases. The Lucrine Lake borders upon Baïæ; within it is Lake Avernus. Here our ancestors placed the scene of Homer's Neknia; and here, they say, was an oracle, where answers were returned by the dead, to which Ulysses came. Avernus is a deep hollow, with a narrow entrance, in size and shape well suited for a harbor, but incapacitated for that purpose by the shallow Lucrine Lake, which lies before it. It is enclosed by steep ridges, which overhang it everywhere, except at the entrance, now highly cultivated, but formerly enclosed by a savage, trackless forest of large trees, which threw a superstitious gloom over the hollow. The inhabitants further fabled that the birds which flew over it fell down into the water, destroyed by the rising exhalations, as in other places of this sort, which the Greeks call Plutonia, or places sacred to Pluto; and imagined that Avernus was a Plutonian, and the abode where the Cimmerians were said to dwell. Here is a fountain of fresh water by the sea; but all persons abstain from it, believing it to be the Styx; and somewhere near was the oracle. Here, also, as they thought was Pyriphlegethon (Pyriphlegethon, burning with fire; one of the three rivers which encompassed hell), judging from the hot springs near Lake Acherusia. The Lucrine Lake in breadth reaches to Baïæ, being separated from the sea by a mound, about a mile long, and wide enough for a broad carriage road, said to have been made by Hercules as he was driving Geryon's oxen. Next to Baïæ come the shores and city of Dichæarchia, formerly a part of the Cumæans, placed on a hill. Next to Dichæarchia is Neapolis; next to Neapolis, Herculaneum, standing on a promontory remarkably open to the south-west wind, which makes it unusually healthy. This city, and its next neighbor, Pompeii, on the River Sarnus, were originally held by the Oscî, then by the Tyrrhenians and Pelasgians, then by the Samnites who, in their turn, were expelled by the Romans. Above these places rises Vesuvius, well cultivated and inhabited all round, except its top, which is for the most part level, and entirely barren, ashy to the view, displaying cavernous hollows in cinereous rocks, which look as if they had been eaten in the fire, so that we may suppose this spot to have been a volcano formerly, with burning craters, now extinguished for want of fuel."

Thus it will be seen that eighteen hundred years ago Pompeii sat in calm security before the sea at the foot of Vesuvius, a burned out volcano, whose sides were covered with vines and trees. No one remembered when this volcano had been in activity; no one ever expected to see it rouse to action.

Pompeii was not a large city, as it had only about thirty thousand inhabitants; but it was a favorite residence of many wealthy Romans, and was a busy, bustling town, with shops, manufactories, public baths, temples and theatres. Cicero speaks of his country property at Pompeii. Its houses were not magnificent in size, but many of them were beautiful with inlaid floors, marble columns, and with walls painted in brilliant colors. These houses were ornamented with pictures, statuary, beautiful vases and many curious and costly things, showing their inmates to have been people of wealth and cultivated taste.

The streets of the city were very narrow, with pavements raised high above the roadway, which in a rain-storm must have become a foaming torrent of water. That this was the fact is testified to by the stepping-stones, placed on a level with the pavement, which cross the streets in some places. These streets were roughly formed, some of them too narrow for any vehicle whatever; others bear the traces of the heavy wheels of the clumsy ox-carts which the farmers used. Over the broader roadways, probably, dashed the gay chariots of the wealthy.

There had been a high wall about Pompeii to protect it from invading armies, but the wall was already crumbling into ruins, and the principal use it was then put to was that of a public promenade, while its eight or nine gates were no longer closed.

Away from the city stretched a pleasant country, made beautiful by green orchards and vineyards. To the west rolled the waters of the beautiful bay, now known as the Bay of Naples, embraced by the nearly surrounding land.

Thus the people of Pompeii lived happily and quietly in their beautiful city, buying and selling, going to the temples and the theatres, and holding elections, very much as we do now.

More than one hundred years before the time of which I write, there had been an earthquake, which had overthrown many of the public buildings, and greatly frightened the people. Several of the temples had toppled down; so also had the colonnade of the Forum, the great Basilica and the theatres, and many houses and trucks. Nearly every family fled from the place, taking with them their furniture and their statuary; and it was some time before the Senate decided that the city might with safety be re-peopled and rebuilt. But no further subterranean disturbances occurring, the people gradually returned, and the injured or demolished buildings were restored or rebuilt. This earthquake was a serious injury to the city in an architectural point of view, for many of the restorations were cheap and in bad taste. The injured columns were plastered up with stucco, and Ionic shafts received Corinthian capitals.

On the evening of the 23d of August, in the year 79, while many Pompeians were attending one of the theatres, and the rest engaged in their usual business, Vesuvius suddenly sent forth a volume of fire and smoke. The ground shook, and strange noises were heard in it, while peal on peal of thunder crashed down. The air grew thick with dust. It came down like rain, rushing, spinning, whirling, and blinding all in the streets. It was evening, and when the wind lifted the cloud of dust for a moment, then the bright flames of the burning mountain would kindle the darkness. The people in the theatre were filled with consternation. They rushed out and sought their homes to find shelter from the storm of dust and ashes. Vain hope! Next came mingling with the ashes a shower of light stones all ablaze—a snow of fire, which kept falling, falling, all the miserable night through. The houses blazed, the burning sheet of flame blocked up the streets, the air was heavy and hot with ashes, smoke and burning cinders. The people rushed hither and thither for safety. Those in the city ran wildly toward the country to escape from the burning buildings, only to meet the country people pressing toward the city, hoping to find shelter and protection from the perils of the night. Some stopped to seize their jewels and money; others gathered together their families; while still others thought only of their own safety.

Dion Cassius, who wrote a century after the event, thus describes it:

"Thus day was turned into night, and light into darkness, and some thought the giants were rising again (for many phantoms of them were seen in the smoke, and a blast, as if of trumpets, was heard), while others believed that the earth was to tinguished, to the earth, the earth to rise to the sky."

Pliny, the younger, describes at length the terrible scenes. Though the event seems to have come upon the city with terrible suddenness after nightfall, yet from his account it seems that Vesuvius gave warnings of the approaching catastrophe earlier in the day. Pliny writes to Tacitus:

"On the 24th of August, about one in the afternoon, my mother desired him (his uncle) to observe a cloud which appeared of a very unusual size and shape. It was not at that distance discernable from what mountain this cloud issued, but it was found afterward to ascend from Mount Vesuvius. I cannot give a more exact description of its figure than by resembling it to that of a pine-tree, for it shot up a great height in the form of a trunk, which extended itself at the top into a sort of return to chaos, or to be consumed by fire. Therefore men fled, some from the houses out into the ways, others that were without, into their houses; some quitted the land for the sea, some the sea for the land, being confounded in mind, and thinking every place at a distance safer than where they were. Meanwhile, an inexpressible quantity of dust was blown out, and filled land, sea and air; which did much other mischief to men, fields and cattle, and destroyed all the birds and fishes, and, besides, buried two entire cities, Herculaneum and Pompeii, while the population was sitting in the theatre. For this dust was so abundant that it reached Africa, Syria and Egypt, and filled the air above Rome, and overclouded the sun, which caused much fear for many days, men neither knowing nor being able to conjecture what had happened. But they thought that everything was to be thrown into confusion, the sun to fall, ex-branches, occasioned, I imagine, either by a sudden gust of air, that impelled it, the force of which decreased as it advanced upward, or the cloud itself being pressed back again by its own weight expanded in this manner; it appeared sometimes bright and sometimes dark and spotted, as it was more or less impregnated with earth and cinders."

Again he says, describing subsequent events: "The chariots which we had ordered to be drawn out, were so agitated backward and forward, though upon the most level ground, that we could not keep them steady, even by supporting them with large stones. The sea seemed to roll back upon itself, and to be driven from its banks by the convulsive motion of the earth; it is certain, at least, the shore was considerably enlarged, and several sea animals were left upon it. On the other side a black and dreadful cloud, bursting with an igneous serpentine vapor, darted out a long train of fire, resembling flashes of lightning, but much larger."

The following is an extract from his description of the flight of himself and his mother:

"The ashes now began to fall upon us, though in no great quantity. I turned my head, and observed behind us a thick smoke, which came rolling after us like a torrent. I proposed, while we had yet any light, to turn out of the high road, lest she should be pressed to death in the dark by the crowd that followed us. We had scarce stepped out of the path, when darkness overspread us, not like that of a cloudy night, or when there is no moon, but of a room when it is shut up and all the lights extinct. Nothing then was to be heard but the shrieks of women, the screams of children and the cries of men; some calling for their children, others for their parents, others for their husbands, and only distinguishing each other by their voices. One lamenting his own fate, another that of his family; some wishing to die from the very fear of dying; some lifting their hands to the gods; but the greater part imagining that the last and eternal night was come, which was to destroy the gods and the world together."

No doubt many escaped out of the reach of the volcano, but how many perished will never be known. Death overtook some in their dwellings, and they died clasping those whom they best loved. Others died on the streets, beaten down and smothered by the constant and terrible rain of ashes and cinders. Some were crushed beneath falling roofs, while some were suffocated in the very act of trying to gather together their valuables. Oh, it was a terrible hour! No wonder they thought the end of the world had come!

They could scarcely tell when morning dawned, for black darkness filled the air. The crowds were still pressing in the street. Men, women and children shrieked and screamed, and called upon one another in their terror and agony. Still the ashes kept falling, until the ground was covered as with a deep snow, and the weak were crushed and buried beneath them. The sea rose, and then rushed back from the shore, and was violently agitated. Vesuvius kept pouring forth its column of flame and smoke, until the light could be seen far away, and smoke and ashes obscured the daylight at Rome, and even drifted to the shores of Africa.

The buildings were consumed by the flames, and their roofs and walls crumbled, and the ashes and cinders descended upon them, and sifted into all the rooms and crevices, and wrapped themselves about every article of furniture, and rose higher and higher, until everything was covered. The narrow streets were filled, and all the shrieking, terror-stricken, rushing, running, writhing crowd became silent and motionless, and wrapped in a gray-white pall. Still the ashes came down. They filled the rooms of the houses to the very highest point, and then joined with the ashes which filled the streets, and everything was covered over. No trace of houses remained, not even a dome or a spire, or the unfallen fragment of a wall. The city was dead and buried, and grayish-white ashes spread in an unbroken surface over its tomb—dead and buried, and its grave only to tell where it once was.

But as we sometimes see a grave in an old churchyard sink down to a level with the rest of the ground, the stone which marked it crumbled away, the grass and weeds grow over it, and at last all traces of it disappear, so gradually the gray-white ground began to grow green with grass. Trees sprang up over it, their seeds probably borne thither by the winds. Then, as the years passed away, and the terrible horror of the first remembrance of the occurrence was beginning to be somewhat lessened, the peasants planted vineyards and fig and olive orchards above the place where the old city once stood.

Still, time passed on. Mount Vesuvius again and again sent forth fire and smoke from her new crater within her old one; more ashes sifted through the air, and descended upon the surrounding plains, and streams of melted lava poured down the mountain sides. The whole face of the country became changed, and men gradually forgot the spot where Pompeii had once stood. After more than sixteen hundred years, when the people of the world had forgotten everything about Pompeii except its name and its destruction, some vine-dressers, while working in a vineyard, struck their spades upon some old walls, and, their curiosity excited, they kept on digging until they had unearthed some statues. This clearing was made in 1748, and since then there has been nearly constant work in digging out the ruins of the buried city. It is not, however, until within the last fifteen years that the labor has been pursued with system and energy. Now about one-third of it is cleared of rubbish, and the traveller who visits the spot may walk the streets of Pompeii, treading the very pavement the Pompeians did. He may enter their homes, which are more or less injured by the fires which burned their roofs and doors; but he may see the pictures upon the walls, and he will be shown, if not at Pompeii itself, then at the Pompeian museum at Naples, vases, cups, candlesticks, statuary, jewelry, and many other things which have been discovered buried in ashes.

The mode by which the present excavations of Pompeii are conducted is thus described by an eye-witness:

"The ground being bought, and the vegetation removed, the work begins. The earth at the summit of the hill is taken off and carried away on a railroad, which descends from the middle of Pompeii by a slope that saves all expense of machinery and fuel, to a considerable distance beyond the amphitheatre and the city. In this way the most serious question of all, to wit, that of clearing away the dirt, is solved. Formerly the ruins were covered in with it, and subsequently it was heaped up in a huge hillock, but now it helps to construct the very railroad that carries it away, and will, one day, tip it into the sea. Nothing can present a livelier scene than the excavation of these ruins. Men diligently dig away at the earth, and beves of young girls run to and fro without cessation, with baskets in their hands, filling their baskets with soil, ashes and lapillo, hoisting them on their heads, by the help of the men, with a single, quick, sharp motion, and thereupon setting off again, in groups that incessantly replace each other, toward the railway, passing and repassing their returning companions. Very picturesque in their ragged gowns of brilliant colors, they walk swiftly with lengthy strides, their long skirts defining the movements of their naked limbs, and fluttering in the wind behind them, while their arms, with gestures like those of classic urn bearers, sustain the heavy load that rests upon their heads without making them even stoop."

In the cleared portion of the city is the triangular Forum. Eight Ionic columns adorned its entrance, and sustained a portico of the purest elegance, from which ran two long, slender colonnades widening apart from each other, and forming an acute angle. They are still surmounted with their doubt that of Venus, as Venus was the patroness of Pompeii. The ruins of this temple are very fine. There is a spacious enclosure, or peribolus, framing a portico of forty-eight columns—of which many are still standing—surrounding the podium where rose the temple. In front of the entrance, at the foot of the steps that ascend to the podium, rises the altar, seemingly destined for simple offerings of fruit, cakes and incense, which were consecrated to Venus. The steps that scaled the basement story were thirteen—an odd number—so that in ascending the first step with the right foot the level of the sanctuary was also reached with the right foot. The temple was entirely surrounded with open columns with Corinthian capitals. The portico opened broadly, and a mosaic of marbles, pleasingly adjusted, formed the pavement of the goddess' retreat, of which the architrave, which they lightly supported. The Temple of Esculapius, besides its altar, has retained a very odd capital, Corinthian if you will, but on which cabbage-leaves, instead of the acanthus, are seen enveloping a head of Neptune. The Temple of Fortune is greatly dilapidated. The Temple of Isis, still standing, is more curious than handsome. It shows that the Egyptian goddess was venerated at Pompeii, but it tells us nothing about antique art. It is entered at the side, by a sort of corridor leading into the sacred enclosure. The temple is on the right; the columns enclose it; a vaulted niche is hollowed out beneath the altar, where it served as a hiding-place for the priests—at least so say the romance writers. On an altar in this temple were found some remnant of sacrifices, showing that Isis was the only divinity invoked at the moment of the eruption.

The most important temple in Pompeii was no paints walls represented simple panels, separated here and there by plain pilasters.

There was a larger and a lesser theatre in Pompeii. These have been more or less cleared of their rubbish, and the stages, the places for the orchestra, and the seats for the audience, are found more or less intact. The latter are divided by railings into three compartments. The first of these, being nearest the stage, and containing all the best seats, was reserved for the magistrates and other eminent persons. The second division was for quiet, respectable private citizens. The last and highest—the remotest from the stage—was for the rabble and—women!

The private dwellings display much magnificence. They not infrequently include two open courts, around which the various apartments were placed. These courts were frequently paved with a kind of cement, in which were ranged small cubes of marble, of glass, of calcareous stone and of colored enamel, forming squares or stripes, or tracing regular designs, meandering lines and arabesques, until the divided pebbles at length completely covered the reddish basis, and became mosaics. The house of the Faun at Pompeii, which is the most richly paved of all, was a museum of mosaics. "The ancients put their feet where we put our hands," says an Englishman, who writes but the simple truth. The finest tables in the palaces at Naples were cut from the pavements in the houses at Pompeii.

A bakery has been unearthed in Pompeii where the whole process of bread-making is discovered. There are the rude mills, made of an upper and a nether stone, once put together in the shape of an hour-glass. In an adjoining room—most probably a stable—was found the bones of the mule who turned these stones. There were the troughs which served for the manipulation of the bread, and the oven, the arch of which is intact, with the cavity that retained the ashes, and other paraphernalia of the baking-house. In an oven, so hermetically sealed that there was not a particle of ashes in it, there were found eighty-one loaves, a little over-done, to be sure, as cannot be wondered at, considering the severe baking they had, but whole, and bearing their original shape—a shape still seen in Sicily.

The most curious and the saddest sight of all, is that of the statues which have been made by pouring plaster into the moulds found in the ashes where human beings had once been, but of whom nothing now remained but skeletons. The ashes, drifting and sifting around the lifeless bodies while they were still perfect, and hardening in that shape, furnish perfect casts, which, filled with plaster, produce the exact likeness of those who perished so fearfully long ago—their faces and attitudes, the clothes they had on, and the jewels they wore. Some of these figures appear stretched out in the calm of resignation; others are fearfully contorted in the agony of pain; still others are in the act of searching for their jewels, or of clasping to them their dearest ones.

A visit to this buried city must be one full of sad interest. The visitor is carried back eighteen hundred years, and finds the people and their belongings just as they existed then. He may even read upon the walls the names of the different candidates for office to be voted for at a coming election.

The work of digging and clearing out this buried city is still going on. Curious as it may seem, after remaining perfect under their covering of ashes for so many years, many of the articles, upon being brought to the light and air, soon crumble away and perish, and the pictures upon the walls lose their bright colors, and fade into dimness.

THE best way to keep out wicked thoughts, is always to be employed in good ones; let your thoughts be where your happiness is; and let your heart be where your thoughts are; so, though your habitation is on earth, your conversation will be in Heaven.

THE DRACHENFELS.

THE Drachenfels, or "Dragon Rock," which overlooks the little village of Koeingswinter on the Rhine, is a spur of the Siebengebirge, or "Seven Mountains," which were the scene of the Nibelungenlied, the Iliad and Odyssey of Germany. It takes its name from an old Pagan legend, which relates that it was once the abode of a horrible dragon, breathing fire and smoke, to whom the people offered human victims. It came to pass that a young girl, who had been taken captive, was offered to the dragon. Now it happened that Christianity was beginning to gain ground among the people, and that this maiden was a convert. So, when the dragon rushed at her, she held up a crucifix, which so surprised and terrified the beast that he threw himself over the precipice and was drowned in the river. Præd has given us this legend in his easy and graceful verse. We copy it entire.

THE LEGEND OF THE DRACHENFELS.

BY WINTHBOP MACKWORTH PRÆD.

"Death be her doom! we must not spare,
Though the voice be sweet, though the face be fair,
When the looks deride and the lips blaspheme
The Serpent-God of our hallowed stream.

"Death be her doom! that the fearful King
May joy in the gift his votaries bring;
And smile on the valley, and smile on the rock,
To freshen the vine, and to fatten the flock.

"Death be her doom! ere the pitiless One
Leap from his rest at set of sun;
Seek from his crag his wonted prey,
And punish in wrath our long delay!"

It was a gray-haired Chief that said
The words of fate, the words of fear;
A battered casque was on his head,
And in his grasp a broken spear:
It was a captive maid that met,
Sedate, serene, the stern command.
Around her neck her beads were set,
An Ivory cross was in her hand.

"Lead me away! I am weak and young,
Captive the fierce and the proud among;
But I will pray an humble prayer,
That the feeble to strike may be firm to bear.

"Lead me away! the voice may fall,
And the lips grow white, and the cheeks turn pale;
Yet will ye know that naught but sin
Chafes or changes the soul within.

"Lead me away! oh, dear to mine eyes
Are the flowery fields, and the sunny skies;
But I cannot turn from the Cross divine
To bend my knee at an idol's shrine."

They clothe her in such rich array
As a bride prepares for her bridal day;
Around her forehead, that shines so bright,
They wreath a wreath of roses white,
And set on her neck a golden chain—
Spoil of her sire in combat slain.

Over her head her doom is said;
And with folded arms, and measured tread,
In long procession, dark and slow,
Up the terrible hill they go,
Hymning their hymn, and crying their cry
To him, their Demon Deity.—

Mary, Mother! sain and save!
The maiden kneels at the Dragon's cave!

Alas! 'tis frightful to behold
 That thing of Nature's softest mould,
 In whose slight shape and delicate hue
 Life's loveliness beams fresh and new,
 Bound on the bleak hill's topmost height,
 To die, and by such death, to-night!
 But yester-eve, when the red sun
 His race of grateful toil had run,
 And over earth the moon's soft rays
 Lit up the hour of prayer and praise,
 She bowed within the pleasant shade
 By her own fragrant jasmine made;
 And while her clear and thrilling tone
 Asked blessing from her Maker's throne,
 Heard the notes echoed to her ear
 From lips that were to her most dear.
 Her sire, her kindred, round her knelt;
 And the young Priestess knew and felt
 That deeper love than that of men
 Was in their natural temple then.
 That love—is now its radiance chill?
 Fear not; it guides, it guards her still!

The crowd departed; and alone
 She kneeled upon the rugged stone.
 Alas! it was a dismal pause,
 When the wild rabble's fierce applause
 Died slowly on the answering air;
 And, in the still and mute profound,
 She started even at the sound
 Of the half-thought, half-spoken prayer
 Her heart and lip had scarcely power
 To feel or frame in that dark hour.
 Fearful, yet blameless—for her birth
 Had been of Nature's common earth,
 And she was nursed, in happier hours,
 By Nature's common suns and showers:
 And when one moment whirls away
 What'e'r we know or trust to-day,
 And opens that eternal book
 On which we long, and dread to look,
 In that quick change of sphere and scope—
 That rushing of the spirit's wings,
 From all we have to all we hope,
 From mortal to immortal things—

THE DRACHENFELS.

The temper of our stoutest mail
 In battle's fiery shock may fail;
 The trustiest anchor may betray
 Our vessel in the treacherous spray;
 The dearest friend we ever knew
 In our worst need may prove untrue:
 But come what may of doubt or dread
 About our lonely path or bed,
 On tented field, or stormy wave,
 In dungeon-cell, or mountain cave,
 In want, in pain, in death—where'er
 One meek heart prays, God's love is there!

The crowd departed: her wandering eye
 Followed their steps, as they left her to die.
 Down the steep and stern descent,
 Strangely mingled, the Heathen went—
 Palstied dotard, and beardless boy,
 Sharers to-night in their savage joy—
 Hoary priest, and warrior grim,
 Shaking the lance, and chanting the hymn;
 And ever and anxiously looking back,
 To watch if yet, on his slimy track
 He rolled him forth, that ghastly guest,
 To taste of the banquet he loved the best.

Though madly on the giddy brink
 Despair may jest, and Guilt dissemble—
 White Innocence awhile will shrink,
 And Piety be proud to tremble!

But quickly from her brow and cheek
 The flush of human terror faded,
 And she aroused, the maiden meek,
 Her fainting spirit, self-upbraided,
 And felt her secret soul renewed
 In that her solemn solitude.
 Unwonted strength to her was given
 To bear the rod and drink the cup;
 Her pulse beat calmer, and to Heaven
 Her voice in firmer tone went up:
 And as upon her gentle heart
 The dew of holy peace descended,
 She saw her last sunlight depart
 With awe and hope so sweetly blended
 Into a deep and tranquil sense
 Of unpresuming confidence,
 That if the blinded tribes, whose breath
 Had doomed her to such dole and death,
 Could but have caught one bright brief glance
 Of that ungrrieving countenance,

And marked the light of glory shed
Already o'er her sinless head,
The tears with which her eyes were full—
Tears not of anguish—and the smile
Of new-born rapture, which the while
As with a lustrous veil arrayed
Her brow, her cheek, her lip, and made
Her beauty more than beautiful—
Oh, would they not have longed to share
Her torture—yea! her transport, there?

"Father, my sins are very great;
Thou readest them, whate'er they be:
But penitence is all too late;
And unprepared I come to Thee,
Uncleansed, unblest, unshriven!

"Yet Thou, in whose all-searching sight
No human thing is undetected—
Thou, who art merciful in might,
Father, Thou wilt forgive Thy child—
Father, Thou hast forgiven!

"Thy will, not hers, be done to-day!
If in this hour, and on this spot,
Her soul indeed must pass away
Among fierce men who know Thee not—Thine is the breath Thou gavest!

"Or if Thou wilt put forth Thine hand
And shield her from the jaws of flame,
That she may live to teach the land
Whose people hath not heard Thy name—
Thine be the life Thou savest!"

So spoke the blessed maid; and now
Crossing her hands upon her breast,
With quiet eye, and placid brow,
Awaited the destroying pest;
Not like a thing of sense and life
Soul-harassed in such bitter strife,
But tranquil, as a shape of stone,
Upraised in ages long bygone,
To mark where, closed her toilsome race,
Some sainted sister sleeps in grace.
Such might she seem: about her grew
Sweet wild-flowers, sweet of scent and hue;
And she had placed, with pious care,
Her Crucifix before her there,
That her last look and thought might be
Of Christ, and of the Holy Tree.

And now, methinks, at what my lay
Of this poor maid hath yet to say,
Will Wit assume a scornful look,
And Wisdom con a grave rebuke.
I heed them not; full oft their lies
In such time-honored histories,
Hived through long ages in the store
Of the rude peasant's nursery lore,
A pathos of a deeper ruth,
A moral of a purer truth,
Than aught we study in the page
Of lofty bard or learned sage;
Therefore, my gentle Muse, prolong
In faith thy legendary song.

The day was gone, but it was not night:—
Whither so suddenly fled the light?
Nature seemed sick with a sore disease;
Over her hills and streams and trees
Unnatural darkness fell;
The earth and the heaven, the river and shore,
In the lurid mist were seen no more;
And the voice of the mountain monster rose
As he lifted him up from his noontide repose,
First in a hiss, and then in a cry,
And then in a yell that shook the sky:—
The eagle from high fell down to die

At the sound of that mighty yell:—
From his wide jaws broke, as in wrath he woke,
Scalding torrents of sulphurous smoke;
And crackling coals, in mad ascent,

As from a red volcano went,
And flames, like the flames of hell!
But his scream of fury waxed more shrill,
When, on the peak of the blasted Hill,
He saw his victim bound.
Forth the Devourer, scale by scale,
Unveiled the folds of his steel-proof mail,
Stretching his throat, and stretching his tail,
And hither and thither rolling him o'er,
Till he covered fourscore feet and four
Of the wearied and wailing ground:
And at last he raised from his stony bed
The horrors of his speckled head;
Up like a comet the meteor went,
And seemed to shake the firmament,
And batter heaven's own walls!
For many a long mile, well I ween,
The fires that shot from those eyes were seen;
The Burschen of Bonn, if Bonn had been,
Would have shuddered in their halls.
Woe for the Virgin!—bootless here
Were glistening shield and whistling spear
Such battle to abide;
The mightiest engines that ever the trade
Of human homicide hath made,
Warwolf, ballist, and catapult,
Would like a strippling's wand insult
That adamant hide.

Woe for the Virgin!—
Lo! what spell
Hath scattered the darkness, and silenced the yell,
And quenched those fiery showers?—
Why turns the serpent from his prey?
The Cross hath barred his terrible way,
The Cross among the flowers.
As an eagle pierced on his cloudy throne,
As a column sent from its base of stone,
Backward the stricken monster dropped;
Never he stayed, and never he stopped,
Till deep in the gushing tide he sank,
And buried lay beneath the stream,
Passing away like a loathsome dream.
Well may you guess how either bank
As with an earthquake shook;
The mountains rocked from brow to base;
The river boiled with a hideous din
As the burning mass fell heavily in;
And the wide, wide Rhine, for a moment's space,
Was scorched into a brook.

Night passed, ere the multitude dared to creep,
Huddled together, up the steep;
They came to the stone; in speechless awe
They fell on their face at the sight they saw:
The maiden was free from hurt or harm,
But the iron had passed from her neck and arm,
And the glittering links of the broken chain
Lay scattered about like drops of rain.

And deem ye that the rescued child
To her father-land would come—
That the remnant of her kindred smiled
Around her in her home,
And that she lived in love of earth,
Among earth's hopes and fears,
And gave God thanks for the daily birth
Of blessings in after-years?
Holy and happy, she turned not away
From the task her Saviour set that day;
What was her kindred, her home, to her?
She had been Heaven's own messenger!

Short time went by from that dread hour
Of manifested wrath and power,
Ere from the cliff a rising shrine
Looked down upon the rolling Rhine.
Duly the virgin Priestess there
Led day by day the hymn and prayer;
And the dark Heathen round her pressed
To know their Maker, and be blessed.

THE LOVE-LETTER.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

A LL blue and pearl are summer skies;
 With gentle breathings moves the air;
 On meadows green the sunlight lies;
 Ah, all the world is wondrous fair!
 Aye, earth with Heaven seems to blend;
 All charms to such a day belong;
 The flowers their tints and fragrance lend,
 And sweet birds lend their gushing song.

Thus softly glide these golden hours,
 While Katy reads her open book,
 And decks her flowing locks with flowers,

When Mary comes with roguish look,
 Her hand behind her held, and cries,
 "Come, guess what I have brought you, dear."
 Kate's eyes light up with pleased surprise,
 She might but will not guess, I fear.

Behold, a letter, dainty, small!
 The blushes spring to Katy's cheek;
 That blush to Mary tells it all;
 She smiles, but does not pause to speak.
 Ah, Kate, you thought the day was fair;
 But such a glow now flashes o'er
 The earth and sky, and fills the air,
 It must have been most dark before!

THE BRIDAL VEIL.

BY ELLEN BERTHA BRADLEY.

I HAD come, at the request of my friend Marion Dawson, to spend with her the month preceding her marriage, and during my stay the house had been in a constant commotion with the wedding preparations. Dress, in its various forms, had been the main theme of conversation, and to a looker-on it would have seemed that the chief importance of the event lay in the grand pageant by which it was to be celebrated. But sometimes I could see that Marion was wearied by it, and I suspected that she would have preferred being married in the quiet fashion of forty years ago. But, however that might have been, she had made up her mind to the display that her parents and sisters wished, and submitted, with little remonstrance, to the purchasing of white satin and Brussels lace, and the issuing of six hundred invitations.

The week before the wedding there was a lull in the preparations. All was done that could be until the last day or two, and comparative quiet descended upon the family. As the cards were out, Marion could not show herself in public; and so it happened that one evening her mother and sisters were away, and she and I were left in quiet possession of the library. We had enjoyed for an hour a chat like those of former days, when the door-bell rang, and some one inquired for Marion. She went to see what was wanted, and in a few minutes returned, saying: "The veil has been sent home. Let us go up-stairs and look at it before the girls come."

I followed her willingly, and watched her as she arranged it in graceful folds over the gleaming satin. She had objected to buying it, preferring simple tulle to this costly film of mist, but she could not repress an exclamation of admiration as she saw its beauty.

"Cousin Annie must come and see it," she said, darting from the room; and in a moment I heard the wheels of the invalid's chair as Marion rolled it quickly through the hall.

Ten years before, Annie Dawson had been one of the gayest and brightest of girls, but a fall upon a slippery side-walk had crippled her for life, and now she only left her rolling-chair to be lifted to and from the bed, or, on rare occasions, to be carried down-stairs in the stalwart arms of Marion's brother. But her room was the brightest in the house, with the windows filled with tropical plants, the piano strewn with music, and the table covered with books and periodicals. And the sunshine that came in at the south windows was not as bright as that which shone from her happy, contented face. All the family went to her for counsel and comfort, and her room was regarded almost as a sanctuary, across the threshold of which no unkind thought or evil feeling might be carried. It was natural that Marion should hasten to bring her to join in our admiration of the beautiful veil; and as she lifted it in her thin fingers, and talked of its fineness and delicacy, there was no shadow upon her brow to show that she remembered the day, nine years before, when she slipped a sparkling ring from her finger and returned it to the giver, with a message releasing him from any obligation to fulfill to the helpless invalid the troth he had plighted to the blooming, healthy girl.

"Annie," said Marion presently, "I wonder if you cannot tell us something about this lace before the others come? I have heard so much nonsense lately that a little sense would be a pleasant relief. You know, Susie, that Annie is a sort of walking encyclopædia for the family. We go to her for instruction on all sorts of topics."

"A rolling encyclopædia, you mean," said Annie, smiling. "They all come to me, Miss Susie, to ask about anything that interests them, because if I do not know about it I have plenty of leisure to study up the subject for them. Yes, Marion, I can tell you something about your veil, for as soon as I heard that you had decided to have it, I began reading everything I could find about lace, both for my own instruction and yours, for I was sure some of you would ask me about it. Isn't it odd that these old patterns are still retained in lace-making?"

"Is this old?" asked Marion.

"Certainly," replied her cousin. "The makers say that they have tried in vain to alter the old designs, or substitute new ones, for the antique figures sell the best. Probably some of those that we see now were practised near the end of the fourteenth or the beginning of the fifteenth century by the nuns in making genuine old point lace."

"What had the nuns to do with such vanities?" said I.

"A great deal," she replied. "When the monks were beguiling their idle hours by illuminating manuscripts, and carving elaborate designs in wood, stone and metal, the nuns were amusing themselves with the no less artistic work of manufacturing point lace. The taste and skill that they showed in forming and working out their designs were surprising. They did not attempt to imitate natural objects, but threw out free and graceful forms, guided only by their own fancy; and, as I said, their old patterns are still preserved in spite of modern efforts. The figures were cut in linen, over which a fairy-like web was woven with the needle, so skilfully as to entirely conceal the foundation. They were then joined by threads worked over very fine yarn."

"Is that the way that lace is made now?" asked Marion.

"Somewhat," she replied. "I do not know whether the figures are still cut out of linen, but in the finest varieties they are made separately. There is as much division of labor in making lace as silk or calico. First, there is the spinning of the thread, a work too delicate to be trusted to machinery. The very finest is made in Brussels, in underground cellars, because the light and dryness of the air above the surface would make it brittle. The work is unhealthy, for it confines the spinner to a dark, damp room, and requires great care and attention, and consequently it commands high prices. The thread is carefully watched as it comes from the distaff, being held against a dark blue background, that any unevenness may be the more readily noticed. At every imperfection it is broken, the fragments being saved for other uses. The regular list of the Brabant spinners contains thread valued according to its fineness at from sixty to fifteen hundred francs per pound; but a pound of spun flax has been known to bring ten thousand francs."

"Two thousand dollars!" I cried.

"It seems almost incredible," she went on; "but it is the worth of the labor, not of the material. You know that iron may be made more valuable than gold, weight for weight."

"I should not think that a fabric made of such delicate threads would be durable," said Marion.

"Nor should I," replied Annie; "but there are still to be found, in choice collections, specimens of that made by the nuns nearly, or quite, four hundred years ago. It cannot be of more recent date, for the art of making genuine old point was lost about the beginning of the sixteenth century, and has never been recovered. That made since then is cheaper and less artistic, the designs being mainly copies of those of the older period."

"Do you know who invented lace?" I asked. "Did it originate with the nuns of the Middle Ages?"

"No," she answered; "it did not; but no one knows who invented it. The garments of the women of ancient Greece are represented as trimmed with something of the kind; and it seems to have been known to the Romans, for the name comes from a Latin word, meaning hem or fringe. It is said to have been introduced into France by one of her queens from Venice, where the art of making it had long been practised. Ten years before the discovery of America, an act of the British Parliament forbade the importing of thread, silk or gold lace, showing that the native manufacture of it was then of sufficient importance for it to be thought best to protect it from foreign competition."

"The people of the Low Countries have always been the most successful in making it, haven't they?" said I.

"Yes," she answered. "It may be called the national occupation of the women, and that is, probably, the reason why special branches of it are so localized. The women carry on the work at their homes, in the intervals of their household cares, many of them living and dying in the houses where they were born, and teaching the designs with which they are familiar to their children and grandchildren. Thus particular stitches become peculiar to certain places and take their names from them. Thus we hear of point de Malines or Mechlin lace, of point de Valenciennes or Valenciennes lace and point de Bruxelles or Brussels lace, like this veil of yours."

"But why point?" said Marion. "I cannot understand why that name is applied to so many varieties of lace. I do not see its appropriateness."

"Don't you?" said Annie. "Then I must try to show it to you. The word 'point' in the phraseology of needlework means simply stitch, so when we speak of point de Malines or de Bruxelles we mean simply lace worked with the stitch peculiar to Mechlin or Brussels. However, in England, the term 'point' is applied especially to a rich old lace formerly much worn, but now reserved almost exclusively for court costumes."

"I suppose," said Marion, "that the makers of one kind of lace do not understand the manufacture of others?"

"Not generally," replied Annie. "Indeed, in the most elaborate varieties the different parts are assigned to workers each of whom understands only her own portion. There must have been at least four or five sets of needlewomen engaged upon this veil of yours."

"What was the first step after the spinning of the thread?" asked Marion.

"The making of the flowers or ground, either might have been done first or they might have been done at the same time."

"I don't see any flowers," said I.

"It is the name by which these figures are called, although they certainly bear little resemblance to the blossoms of any plant known to us. The technical terms used in lace-making, as in many other arts, would fill a small dictionary. In the Low Countries they were, of course, originally Flemish, but as French is now much spoken there they have been translated in that language. The workers of the figures or flowers are called Platteuses, and those who make the ground Drocheleuses. The Striguses attach the flowers to the ground and the Faiseuses de point à l'aiguille work them together."

"I should think," said I, "that such delicate work would be so confining as to be very unhealthy."

"It is not," she answered. "Comparatively few of the workers devote their whole time to it, and they often sit in the doorways and gardens, for, as they have only their pillows and thread to carry, they can easily move from place to place. In most of the towns where lace-making is largely carried on there are particular localities where the workers centre. In these spots there is generally a wide street or open square where they bring their chairs and pillows, enjoy the air and sunshine and visit together while they weave their threads to and fro forming the meshes of their bone-lace."

"There is another term I do not understand," said Marion. "Why do they call it bone-lace?"

"Probably because when the pillows were first introduced pieces of bone were used, instead of brass pins, in fastening the threads."

"Then pillows have not always been used in the manufacture?" said I.

"No. They were first employed in Saxony about the middle of the sixteenth century. Probably their origin was gradual. Most likely some one discovered that the figures which had been worked separately could be more smoothly fastened together if tightly pinned to some firm substance. Then the threads would naturally be twisted around the pins when not in use, to prevent their ravelling, and then was, probably, discovered the mesh now made in such enormous quantities by machinery, and called bobbin-net."

"Has not the making of lace by machinery seriously injured the hand-trade?" I asked.

"In some places," was the reply. "In England it has greatly. In most of that made there the ground, at least, is woven by machinery, but among the wealthy classes all over the world hand lace retains its precedence. Admirable as are the French imitations, the difference in price between them and the real article is seventy-five per cent. From Saxony two hundred and fifty thousand dollars worth of the handmade is exported yearly. In France the manufacture is carried on with great rapidity, mostly at Chantilly, Bayeau and Caen. At the last two places over fifty thousand women are thus employed. All the French hand lace is made with bobbins except that manufactured at Alençon, where the needle is used. Have you seen any notice of the lace dress ordered by the Empress Eugénie that was at the Vienna Exposition?"

"No," said Marion. "What of it?"

tion's veil, and our chat upon lace was ended, although it was plain that Cousin Annie knew much more than she had told.

POTTERY IN SYRIA AND PALESTINE.

BY MARY ELIZA ROGERS. (LONDON ART JOURNAL.)

AT an early hour on the morning of May the 29th, 1867, during my last visit to Beirût, I started from the new and comfortable Greek hotel, which is close to the seashore at the western extremity of the town, to walk to the potteries. Hassan, my brother's faithful Kurdish kawass, led the way along the tortuous and uneven road at the edge of the low cliff. Just below us on the right, wherever the sandy earth had drifted into the fissures and hollows of the rocks, saffron and other amphibious flowers flourished,

Fig. 1.—THE WORKSHOP.

"It seems that the art of making the real, antique point de Venise had been lost, and four years before the fall of the empire, the empress gave the Compagnie des Indes carte blanche to make her a dress in this mesh. They spared no pains to reproduce it, and succeeded in making the most beautiful specimen of the kind of lace that had been manufactured in a century. But when it was finished, Eugénie was an exile in England and Paris was in the hands of the Germans. She wrote to them that she would still take the dress if they would lose by keeping it, but they would not consent to her doing so, and sent it to the Vienna Exhibition."

"There come the girls!" cried Marion, and as she spoke we heard merry voices and laughter in the hall below, and in a moment they came hurrying into the room, eager to see and admire Ma-while over the lower rocks, which were black and slippery with seaweed, the bright blue sea, fringed with foam, splashed gently.

The rude path became more indirect and irregular as we advanced, sometimes leading us over steep places and then sinking abruptly almost to the level of the sea. Hassan, wishing to find an easier and shorter route to the potteries, guided me to a mulberry-orchard; then we waded through drifting mounds of red sand till we came to an orange-garden, with clusters of fig-trees and a few palm-trees near. Thence we made our way through sandy lanes hedged with prickly pear (the Cactus Opuntia). We had wandered far from the shore and had quite lost our way, when some women who were gleaned in a field directed us to the potteries; but they marvelled greatly at my desire to visit such a place, and they said, "Whence do you come?" When I told them that I came from England, they were still more astonished, and one old woman who walked with me across the stubble-field said, "Did you come all the way from your country to see our potters make clay-pots, which are sold for a few paras, and broken daily?" I think that her idea of my extraordinary want of sense was confirmed when she saw me pick up, as treasures, a few pieces of iridescent glass and some fragments of very hard ancient pottery, with turquoise-colored blue glaze on it, which is not now produced in Syria. Presently we approached the shore again, and soon came in sight of the potteries—a group of houses and furnaces at the extremity of a rocky and sandy headland. Mounds of sand and finely sifted gray earth stood outside the houses, and excavations were made in the rocks for the clay pits. The furnaces were almost concealed by large stacks of fragrant pine branches, the chief fuel used in the ovens of Beirût and its suburbs.

A little boy who, at my request, brought me a clay-cup full of sweet water, told me that he would show me where the best water-jars were made. He led me to the workshop of his father. It was formed of roughly hewn stone, built up without mortar or plaster of any kind; the interstices were filled up with small stones. The roof was made of pine-planks and beams, supported by the stems of pine-trees. The planks over the wide doorway were upheld in the middle by a pine-post, with a block of stone for a capital. The floor was of red sand, mixed with clay. A man was at work at a wooden bench, and my little guide approached him, saying, "Oh, my father, a lady from England has come to see the work of your hands!" The potter did not speak or look up from his work until he had completed the jar which he was making, then he welcomed me courteously, and quickly resumed his work.

He was seated on a narrow, rudely-fixed tilted plank, and he pressed his right foot firmly on a foot-rest, while by a regular backward movement of his left foot he turned a wheel, which set in motion a smaller wheel above. On the bench before him there were many masses of measured clay; these, one after the other, he quickly transformed into jars. He threw the clay on to the revolving disc, drew it up rapidly in spiral form, then compressed it, hollowing it out with his fist, and gradually drew it up smoothly in the required form; then he finished off the bottom of the jar, which was uppermost.

Boys were bringing fresh supplies of clay, and carrying the newly-made jars to the shadiest corner of the shop. Jars which had been made many hours earlier were standing outside the door and along the edge of the cliff, drying in the sun. A low platform in the middle of the shop was covered with small jars, to which the necks had been recently added.

I seated myself on a wooden bench to rest and to sketch the pleasant scene (Fig. 1). I wish that I could reproduce it here in its true colors, with the bright blue of the sea and of the sky, and the gray, purple-shadowed mountains of the Kesrouan, on the opposite side of the beautiful Bay of Beirût, appearing through the wide open doors and windows. The pleasant shade of the workshop, "with its clay population all in rows" upon the light red floor, the faded indigo-blue gown of the potter, his red leather girdle and red tarbush with its purple tassel, produced altogether a most effective picture; and my young guide unconsciously made a good foreground to it, by bringing several jars of various forms and placing them upon the bench before me, to show me what his father could do. The jar with the twisted handles was made in imitation of Smyrna pottery; the other jars are especially characteristic of Beirût work. The engraved lines on the mouldings of these are precisely similar to the marks on some of the ancient pottery exhumed at the Troad by Dr. Schleimann, and which were mistaken at first for cuniform characters. Figs. 2 and 3 represent the most usual form of the water-jars made at Ras Beirût. I visited one of the furnaces and a shop built on the western side of the cliff, where an artist was engraving the jars. We returned to the hotel by a direct route through lanes and stubble-fields, guided by boys who were leading donkeys laden with water-jars.

There is, in the thirty-eighth chapter of Ecclesiasticus, such an excellent description of a Syrian potter, that I venture to insert it here, with the introduction to it, as the Apocrypha is not always easily accessible.

"The wisdom of a learned man cometh by opportunity of leisure. How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plough? He giveth his mind to make furrows. So every carpenter and work master that laboreth night and day: and they that cut and grave seals and are diligent to make great variety, and give themselves to counterfeit imagery and watch to finish a work. The smith also sitting by the anvil and considering the iron work, the vapor of the fire wasteth his flesh and he fighteth with the heat of the furnace: the noise of the anvil and the hammer is ever in his ears, and his eyes look still upon the pattern of the thing that he maketh; he setteth his mind to finish his work and watcheth to polish it perfectly.

"30. So doth the potter sitting at his work, and turning the wheel about with his feet, who is always carefully set at his work: and maketh all his work by number.

"31. He fashioneth the clay with his arm and boweth down his strength before his feet; he applieth himself to lead it over; and he is diligent to make clean the furnace.

Fig. 6.—THE AITHÉ PUZZLE-JAR.

"All these trust to their hands, and every one is wise in his work. Without these cannot a city be inhabited, and they shall not dwell where they will, nor go up and down. They shall not sit on the judge's seat; but they will maintain the state of the world—their desire is in the work of their craft."

The reference to the glazed surface of pottery, produced by the application of lead, is especially interesting, as lead and silice are still the chief ingredients universally used for coating pottery. Unfortunately the art of glazing pottery is declining in Syria, and in some of the potteries it is quite abandoned. At Latakia it is, however, practised very successfully. I never visited the potteries there, but I have seen many excellent specimens of the skill of the potters of that district—the ancient Laodicea. (Figs. 4 and 5.)

At the village of Aithé, in the Lebanon, exactly half way between Damascus and Deir el Kamar, in a direct line, there is a pottery of very early origin, and here also the art of glazing survives.

Fig. 7.—SECTION OF PUZZLE-JAR.

All the potters of Aithé are Christians. I have seen many examples of their work, both glazed and unglazed; but the most curious specimen was a green glazed puzzle-jar, which Mohammed, my brother's Indian kawass, one day brought in triumph to the consulate to show to me. I very gladly made two careful drawings of it, which I showed to Mohammed when I returned the jar to him. These drawings pleased him so much that he insisted on my keeping the jar, and it is before me now (see Fig. 6). It is exactly twelve inches in height, and is ornamented with rings of clay, several of which are movable: they are threaded on loops of clay, five being fixed round the neck and five on the body of the jar, which is encircled by small protuberances of clay. The green glaze on this jar is very irregularly distributed; in several places it does not hide the red clay of which the jar is composed, and over some parts it has been allowed to flow so thickly that the green tint is exceedingly dark, almost black in patches, and very iridescent. Where the coat of glaze is thin the color is pale green; but these accidents produce an excellent effect.

To show the peculiar construction of this jar, I have drawn an imaginary section of it (see Fig. 7). The diaphragm at the base of the neck is not pierced, and what appears to be the spout has no opening into the body of the jar, which must be filled from the bottom. The easiest way to do this is to dip it, to the depth of not less than seven inches, into water, which will then rise up the central tube and overflow into the body of the jar. It is poured out from the short tube projecting from the clumsy-looking hollow handle.

Jars which are intended to contain only dry stores, such as wheat, rice, beans, onions, etc., are made in every district; and although they are always of good design, they are rudely wrought of clay mixed with chopped straw, and sometimes only baked by the heat of the sun.

Jars intended to hold oil, butter, wine, etc., are made of hard pottery, and are always carefully glazed inside, and sometimes outside also.

The large jars in the store-room of my brother's house at Damascus used always to remind me of "Ali Babi and the Forty Thieves." Many of them were more than four feet in height, and made of red clay splashed with red, brown and yellow glaze outside, but uniformly glazed within. Some of these jars had four handles, others only two. The smaller jars were of a yellowish gray color, and well glazed inside.

One of the most carefully-made Syrian water-coolers I ever saw was given to me a short time ago by a Greek merchant who had received it from northern Syria, but he could not tell me at what pottery it was made. It is of quite modern workmanship. It is eleven inches in height. The clay is of a pale gray tint, and the surface, which is very smooth, is ornamented with a fanciful tracery in dark chocolate color. Solomon's seal appears upon it in eighteen places, and an Arabic love-song encircles it (see Fig. 8). The quatrain is the bitter complaint of a lover who has been encouraged to boldness, and then suddenly repulsed. With the assistance of a Syrian friend I have made a free translation of this thoroughly Oriental composition, which reminds me of some of the verses in the Song of Solomon:

"A gentle gazelle offered drink unto me from its lips, a sweet juice, a sweet wine, that made sweet unto me all the bitters of life: Enticingly turning it offered the chalice which urged me to seek for the wine that is lawful.

"By Zemzem the cup brimming over with nectarous lip-juice for me, banished fears, lured me on till I closely approached; then to my grief it upstart—and stood—in watchful, resentful, defiance."

TRAJAN'S COLUMN.

TRAJAN'S COLUMN was erected at Rome in the middle of the forum named after the same emperor; but the other buildings of this forum—the palace, gymnasium, library, temples, arches, porticoes, statues, etc.—have all been thrown down, leaving the column alone standing in its original position. It was erected by the Senate and people of Rome in commemoration of the victories obtained by the Emperor Trajan in his two expeditions against the Dacians; in the first of which he compelled them to sue for peace, and in the second conquered them entirely.

There does not, probably, exist any monument in the world more precious or more exquisite in its proportions than Trajan's Column, nor one that has rendered more capital service. It is of pure Carrara marble. The shaft is about ninety-seven English feet, by twelve diameter at the base, and ten below the capital, which, like the shaft, is Doric, and composed of a single block of stone. The statue is composed of thirty-three enormous blocks of marble, of which eight compose the base, twenty-three the shaft, one the capital, and one the pedestal supporting the [statue]. Every stone is hollowed in the middle, so as to consist, in fact, of a mere ring; and a central vertical aperture is thus formed, which is occupied by a spiral staircase from the bottom to the top. The column was anciently surmounted by a statue of the emperor, and later by a figure of the apostle St. Paul. The head of the original figure supported a golden ball, which is now preserved in the capital, and which is said to have contained the ashes of the emperor.

A very remarkable feature in this column is the mode in which it is decorated. There is a series of bas-reliefs running round the column in an ascending spiral ribbon, which makes twenty revolutions or turns of the spiral before reaching the top. On this is represented the chief incidents in the Dacian victories of Trajan, together with the two triumphal processions by which they were celebrated. The bas-reliefs represent the arms, the accoutrements, the engines of war, the dwellings of the barbarians; we discern the breed of the warriors and their horses; we look upon the ships of the time, canoes and quinqueremes; women of all ranks, priests of all theologies, sieges and assaults. Such are the merits of this sculptured host, that Polydore of Caravaggio, Gulio Romano, Michael Angelo and all the artists of the Renaissance have drawn thence models of style and picturesque strategy. The figures are not fewer than between two and three thousand,

PALERMO, AND THE CAVE OF SANTA ROSALIA.

PALERMO is the capital of Sicily, which is the largest island in the Mediterranean, and was annexed to the kingdom of Italy after the victories of Garibaldi had liberated it from the the figure of Trajan himself occurring as many as fifty times. In the lower part of the shaft the figures are each about two feet in height; but as they ascend, and are farther removed from the eye, their dimensions are enlarged, and they are more deeply worked, till at the top they become nearly double the size of those below.

tyranny of the Bourbons, in 1861. Palermo is a fortified city, built in the form of an amphitheatre, and facing the sea. It is defended by the strong fort of Castellamare. In ancient times it was a place of considerable importance, and was taken by the Romans two hundred and fifty years B. C. Since which time it has been ruled by the Saracens, the Normans and the court of Naples. The city has many beautiful fountains, and its handsome edifices are numerous and ornamental. A cathedral, which was built in the tenth century, contains many fine monuments in porphyry. Here are magnificent churches, and a royal palace. The university has a library of forty thousand volumes. The botanic garden is extensive and valuable, and there are many learned societies and benevolent institutions.

On the west of Palermo, near the summit of Monte Pellegrino, there is a natural grotto of considerable extent, which is dear and sacred to all the inhabitants of the island. This cave is called Santa Rosalia; it has been enclosed by a curious church, and crossing which, a low, narrow vault is entered under the rocks—cold and gloomy, where silence is never broken except by the low whisperings of the devotees, or the echoes of the service in the church. Nearly at the extremity of the cavern there is a statue of a beautiful young girl in a reclining posture, with her half-closed eyes fixed on a cross, which is dimly seen by the light of some small silver lamps. The delicate beauty and youth of the countenance with its expression of simplicity, resignation and devotion, are quite captivating, and almost excuse the idolatry of which the statue is the object. The head and hands are of the finest Parian marble; the rest of the figure is of bronze gilt, appearing as if covered with a robe of gold. The devotion of many successive ages has adorned it with many valuable jewels. This statue represents Santa Rosalia, the patroness saint of Palermo, who is believed to have lived and died in this place.

According to the legend, this beautiful virgin was niece to King William the Good, a Norman prince, who reigned in Sicily, and who was succeeded by his son, William the Bad, under whose rule the island became the scene of civil wars and all kinds of iniquities. From her infancy, the young princess had been religious, and when she was sixteen, seeing the wickedness of the world, she retired to the solitary mountains. It was in 1159, when she disappeared, and the people thought she had been taken up to heaven, thinking her soul too pure, and her body too beautiful, to remain in this world. Nothing more was heard of her till her bones were found, nearly five hundred years after, on the spot where the statue now reposes. A miracle was, of course, connected with their discovery. In 1624, Palermo was visited by a dreadful plague, which no human means could moderate; when a holy man had a vision, and told the people, that the saint's bones were lying unhonored in a cave near the top of Monte Pellegrino, that if they were taken up with due reverence, and carried in procession round the walls of the city three times, the plague would immediately cease. This was done as the priest directed, and the people were cured. Then the fair Rosalia was made tutelar saint of Palermo. The bones, preserved in a silver box, curiously made and enriched with jewels, were deposited in the ancient cathedral of the city. A fine road was made to the holy grotto, terraces rising above each other, over the rugged heights and precipices of the mountain.

The church was built, and a house for a few priests, who are obliged to be constantly on the spot to celebrate mass, show the cave and receive the offerings of pilgrims. The view from the church is extensive, diversified, sublime and beautiful.

CHARLES READE.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

WHATEVER may be thought of the genius of the author whose name heads this article, there can be no question as to the freshness and vigor of his style, and his success in a certain field of fiction that might aptly be termed "blue-book light literature." "It is Never Too Late to Mend," "Hard Cash," and "Put Yourself in His Place," will illustrate what we mean. All three books have for their main purpose the discussion of social and legal grievances, and yet so deftly are the dry facts and tedious details interwoven with the story that we are carried along by the charm of its narration and swallow, unwittingly, the bitter dose concealed by the honey.

Mr. Reade himself frankly, and perhaps a little ostentatiously, explains his method of work to us in the last sentence of "Put Yourself in His Place." "I have taken a few undeniable truths out of many, and have labored to make my readers realize those appalling facts of the day which most men know, but not one in a thousand comprehends, and not one in a hundred thousand realizes, until fiction—which, whatever you may have been told to the contrary, is the highest, widest, noblest and greatest of all the arts—comes to his aid, studies, penetrates, digests the hard facts of chronicles and blue-books, and makes their dry bones live."

Now, although there is a touch of Mr. Reade's inordinate self-conceit in this, it is nevertheless true that he has converted what, in other hands, would have been but a string of dry tracts or sermons, into novels that fairly glow with power and passion. There is seldom a dull page in his books, and so rapidly are the scenes shifted and the incidents piled one upon another, that once commenced the reader is sure to finish them. With the true instinct of the story-teller, everything is subordinated to the interest of the plot, even the purpose that underlies it, a purpose that has always been good and true to our thinking, notwithstanding "Griffith Gaunt" and "A Terrible Temptation." So exuberant, however, is Mr. Reade's invention, and so startling and dramatic the effects he produces, that nothing save the vitality breathing through his works and animating their most trivial characters and incidents, redeems them from the charge of sensationalism. Both his admirers and detractors are agreed that he frequently violates the rules of art and introduces glaring improbabilities, but the former contend that his grand and realistic powers of description make what would seem absurd in the hands of a less skilful narrator natural and lifelike in his. For he knows just what words to use to bring the thing itself before you, whether it be a storm at sea or a lady's dress, and thus it is that his pictures, however highly colored, attract and hold the attention where others, whose tints and contrasts they resemble, simply disgust.

His last story, "A Simpleton," is a striking instance, both of his peculiar style and method, and the effective way in which he accumulates and gives an air of reality to the most surprising incidents and situations. The heroine, whom all of his readers will recognize at once, is pretty and impulsive, artful and inconsistent, as usual, the prototype of "Grace" and "Helen" and numberless others, though she is known this time as "Rosa" and the "Simpleton." She is true to his ideal of woman, an ideal invested with certain feline characteristics, with little understanding but great capacity for affection, charming and lovable, yet at the same time false and treacherous. The "giddy brain," "narrow mind" and "trivial heart," are brought into the foreground a little more prominently than those of the heroines who preceded her, but they are still the same, only intensified, and one may well wonder whether Mr. Reade has never met a truthful, guileless, high-souled woman, that he finds it so impossible to conceive one. His estimate is as unjust as it is degrading, and what makes his portraits the more vexatious is, that they possess a certain truth and fidelity to nature, and show up in a strong light various foibles and frailties, distinctively feminine. Of these he has been a close observer, and doubtless records faithfully what he has himself seen and experienced; but there are depths in the feminine soul that he has not sounded, and reserves of power that would overthrow all his previous theories, if once understood.

How he can write that woman is incapable of long-sustained effort, or continuous labor, is a mystery, with the example of Mrs. Lewes before him in his own special field of work, whose brain products are as superior to his as his to those of the merest literary tyro. It is true, as he says, that the world has never had a "Bacon," a "Newton" or a "Handella," but in lieu thereof might we not cite Rosa Bonheur, Harriet Hosmer, Maria Mitchell, Mrs. Somerville and hosts of others, who have won distinction in pursuits that are popularly regarded as needing not only masculine strength of intellect, but lifelong patience and perseverance? Whatever Mr. Reade may think to the contrary, a "long, steady struggle" is no more impossible to a woman than to a man, given the same motives to spur her on and the same end to be attained. To talk of rivalry between the sexes, however, is absurd, for they are as different in mental as in physical characteristics, and whether or not this very difference does not promote the growth of distinctive virtues and vices is a subject that will bear investigation. Mr. Reade touches upon it incidentally, but nowhere in the true spirit of inquiry, and glaring as is his misconception of woman's intellectual strength, it is more than equalled by the injustice he does her morally when he brings forward as his highest type of womanly goodness, innocence and purity, such a creation as Rosa Staines.

But what would you have? cries one; Rosa Staines is real flesh and blood, and in spite of her frivolity and affectation, amuses us more than a grand, heroic, impossible ideal. All the same, your liking for her is mingled with a sort of contempt, and should you analyze her character the feeling awakened would be one of pity rather than admiration. To be sure, suffering develops her into something nobler than an empty-headed doll, but she still retains those distinctive traits that in Mr. Reade's eyes are essentially feminine, and though piquant and lovable, is as far as ever from being the real honest, open-hearted, straightforward and truthful wife that Christopher deserves.

But, says another, Rosa Staines was only drawn as the type of a class, and was never meant to represent Mr. Reade's ideal of perfect womanhood. Perhaps not, yet her resemblance to his other heroines is remarkable, and it is certainly evident that he considers truth and simplicity almost, if not quite, feminine impossibilities.

With the development of Rosa's character, however, he has taken more pains than is usual, even with him, and the course adopted is at once novel and alarming. She is first cured by the hero (who, as usual, possesses wonderful scientific knowledge,) of consumption, brought on by tight lacing, and then marries him. Their means are limited, and she immediately enters upon a general course of deceit and falsehood to conceal her wasteful style of housekeeping and extravagance in dress, until her husband is so greatly in debt as to be compelled to eke out his professional income (he is a physician,) by driving a cab at night. This latter employment he keeps a secret from her, but is finally recognized while engaged in it, notwithstanding a partial disguise, by her dearest friend. Then comes an explanation, and Rosa is enlightened as to the cause of those mysterious absences that had so excited her jealousy. But, unfortunately, the friend expatiates too warmly on the merits of Rosa's husband, and her jealousy, allayed in one direction, is aroused in another, and she suspects the friend herself of disloyalty.

In the meantime, the hero saves the lives of two patients by most remarkable remedies, applied in a most remarkable way, and then, not finding his practice sufficiently lucrative, concludes to accompany a third on a sea-voyage. Nothing happens to him afterward except that he falls overboard and is reported in England as drowned; is rescued by means of a raft, manned by a corpse, from whose body he takes a belt containing precious stones and annexes it to his own; comes as near starving as he did drowning; and when finally picked up loses his mind and memory and all recollection of his wife. But, to counterbalance this misfortune, he falls into the hands of one of the patients spoken of before whose life he had so miraculously saved, and is nursed back to health, if not to reason, by the patient's sister. As time passes on he recalls various portions of the past, but not his matrimonial experiences, and finally becomes sane enough to make quite a fortune in the diamond fields of Australia. Then the mists clear away from his brain altogether, he remembers wife, home and England, and entrusts a letter for Rosa and a diamond of immense size and value to his mining partner. Now this partner is Rosa's rejected suitor, but the poor hero is ignorant of that fact until informed of it by the traitor's wife. Both then make the horrifying discovery that the villain has embarked for England with the jewel and letter. How they follow, and arrive just in time to prevent the marriage of Rosa to the villain; how the villain is thrown out of the window by the enraged hero and maimed for life; and how Rosa's "giddy brain" is "enlightened," her "narrow mind widened," and her "trivial heart improved" by these various trials and incidents, we leave the reader to find out for himself. It is certainly alarming, as we said at first, if a "simpleton" can only be developed into a "helpmeet" by such processes as these. For surely not every husband would be willing to be nearly drowned and starved, and then lose his senses for over a year, just to finish his wife's education.

Mr. Reade, in a preface to the work, makes known to us the sources from whence it was derived, and ends with a hope that his aim is "too clear to need explanation." We are therefore either forced to confess ourselves ignorant as to what that aim can be beyond amusement, or else conclude that it is to teach us the only true method of woman's development. Jestings aside, however, the ingenuity with which he has worked up his materials is truly admirable, and the story, though inferior in our estimation to some of his others, is remarkably entertaining. It is not so good as "Christie Johnstone," or either of his "blue-book" novels (we wish Mr. Reade would confine himself more exclusively to that branch of fiction, for he has written nothing since "Put Yourself in His Place" that would compare with it), but is marked, nevertheless, by the same breezy freshness and absence of cant that distinguish its predecessors. If only Mr. Reade were not quite so conscious of the good points he makes, and would be a little less sparing of capitals, and italics, and exclamation points, we should be grateful, and the typography would certainly present as fair an appearance. We should like it, too, if he would occasionally give us a new character, for we are thoroughly well acquainted with the old set—the stock hero and heroine; their kind-hearted but rough and eccentric friend, known sometimes as Dr. Sampson, again as Dr. Amboyne, or Uncle Philip; the uneducated but muscular and affectionate specimen of womanhood, called Phebe in his last work, and something else in his others; the white-livered sneak that plays the rôle of villain, etc., etc. To be sure, we don't remember having met Lady Cecilia before; yet really she seems more of a caricature than anything else, and notwithstanding her good heart, fails to touch our sympathies.

Mr. Reade wields a vigorous pen, and portrays faithfully certain phases of life and human nature, but he lacks imagination, and that penetrative insight into the springs of thought and action, as necessary to a novelist as a poet. He has not given us a single figure destined to be immortal; yet no one can tell a story better, or group incidents and situations more effectively. Some of his paragraphs are like pictures; others again are epigrammatic and full of shrewd sense; a few are overstrained and charged with egotism. He delights in casting his ideas into an original and somewhat eccentric mould, and excites our amusement by the skill and deliberation with which he disentangles the narrative from a perfect labyrinth of plots and mysteries. But the "great novelist," Mr. Whipple tells us, must be a "poet, philosopher and man of the world, fused into one." He must "understand man as well as men, the elements of human nature as well as the laws of their combinations;" must possess the "most extensive practical knowledge of society, the most universal sympathies with his kind, and a nature at once shrewd and impassioned, observant and creative." That Mr. Reade lacks most, if not all, these essentials, we think is apparent; but nevertheless, as the result of thought and observation, his works rank high above the ephemeral trash of the day, and deserve a niche by themselves.

FIFTY YEARS AGO;

OR, THE CABINS OF THE WEST.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

No. 2.

I WAS hundreds of miles away from home, and very, very lonely. I hardly hoped to ever look upon the dear faces of my family again. Thinking and fearing this, I often put my veil over my head and walked off briskly in any direction that my aimless steps led me. There was one lonely, dreamy, quiet place that I often frequented—a grassy lane past a farm-house; on either side was a tumble-down stone fence, ivies and wild morning-glories and sweet briars twined in and out and over the picturesque walls of gray and mossy stone. Across the stone fences were old orchards, full of thickly-set trees, some straight as pines, and others bent over and grown crooked and knobby and full of great protuberances that looked like huge joints. I used to wander through those orchards, and watch the robins in their clumsy nests, listen to the trill of the orioles, and rejoice in the placid beauty of the pairs of doves whose nests were in the peach-trees and on the apricot trained against the wall. Then I used to drink from the wayside well, whose old-time sweep was fastened at one corner of the low-roofed stoop in front of the kitchen.

I smile now, after the lapse of years, and think that I loved to loiter about the wayside well and quaff its crystal water, only because of the pastoral poetry of that pretty place. The old oaken bucket was a poem itself, as it came dripping and overflowing its brim from among the green, plump ferns and the feathery maiden's hair that were swept aside in the upward passage.

At length I became acquainted with the inmates of that cosy country home, and I often sat on the cool, vine-covered porch, and talked with Aunt Mary while she plied her knitting-needles. Aunt Mary was the grandmother, and she lived with her son Levi and his wife Patience—or rather they lived with her, for she was a widow, and the old farm was hers—the farm on which she was born, and, as the only child, inherited from her father.

Everybody knew the "old Pettingill farm," as it was called.

One day, the old lady came out into the orchard, with a little pail on her arm, in search of "cookin' apples," and she came suddenly upon me and found me sitting down in a secluded corner with some letters in my lap, crying. I was troubled and sorrowing and, added to this, were all the pains of home-sickness. As soon as I saw her, I cried aloud; I could afford to do it, for was she not a woman, with a woman's tender, sympathizing heart?

"Laws, child, don't take on so! that's a dear, now—so there now—there now!" said she, dropping her pail and bending over me with every token of the kindest, motherly affection.

"But my troubles are more than I can bear," I cried, reaching up my hands pitifully.

"Oh, no! oh, no! don't say so, child; the Lord gives us strength to bear all our sorrows, if we only have faith and trust Him."

With a gentle, caressing touch she smoothed my hair softly, all the while saying those little snatches of comfort that grandmotherly women know so well how to say.

"Did you ever have any trouble?" I said, in a low voice, as I leaned forward, soothed by her sweet ministration.

"Trouble, child!" said she; "the Lord knows that my troubles have been given me in full measure, shook down, and heaped up, and runnin' over; poured out as with a hand that spared not, nor gave grudgingly. And here; right there, where you see yon heap of old hath-stones with the nettles growin' in among 'em so viciously, there was where I lived when my sorrows wrapped me about so powerfully. Troubles! Lord have mercy! I should think I had seen 'em, child! W'y, I've laid all night on the hard puncheon floor and rassed with my grief, and cried aloud, and begged o' the Lord to deliver me from them! I used to wish that I could only die and take my little nursin' baby 'long with me to that rest that comes with death and the grave."

"Tell me all," said I, "maybe it will do me good and help me to be patient and hopeful."

We sat in the old orchard while she told the story. I shall never forget that day. The song of the harvester among the ripened grain came to us from the field beyond the farm-house. The bees hummed and droned among the flowers; the butterflies flitted on gay wings; the swallows darted in and out from under the dusty eaves and from the holes in the peaked gables of the old barn under the giant maples; the doves sang mournfully from the apple-trees, and the robins trilled and warbled from the top of an old drooping elm that stood a-near the site of the cabin home of long ago. A tangled mesh of the brier-rose lay in a fragrant heap where once had been the garden; a thistle stood all a-bristle where once had bloomed a thrifty lilac, and the old-time path that had led to the spring was marked now only by a border of that noisome plant of vigorous growth that the children of now-a-days call "butter and eggs." How mournful to witness all this defacement and cruel obliteration of what was once beautiful and attractive! And this was the story, this the sorrow that life had held for Mary Pettingill:

She married Henry Pettingill when she was barely sixteen years of age. He was very kind and affectionate, and never a cloud came into her sky until her baby, Levi, was three years old. About that time a very beautiful young widow, sparkling with attractions, came to live with her sister, who was a near neighbor of the Pettingills. In those days quilting-bees, and pumpkin-parings, and log-rollings, and raisings, and corn-huskings, and dancing frolics were in vogue. Not a week passed, even in those sparse settlements, in which some of these social gatherings were not held. They made friends where else people would have remained strangers; they brought together neighbors in one common interest, and often cemented bonds that remained unbroken through all time.

One day, there was a quilting-bee at Jonas Hoskins's house. Now the Hoskins were near neighbors of the Pettingills, they lived over beyond the big woods about three miles east, on the hill above the Tilton still-house.

All the women in the neighborhood were invited to come in the morning and stay all day, while the men were to come in the afternoon and roll logs on the five-acre lot back of the house. Among the women invited was the young widow, Salome Chester. Oh, she was a beauty! Small, and spry, and quick-witted, with the strangest, prettiest black eyes and abundant, wavy black hair, rosy cheeks that were dotted with winsome dimples whenever she laughed, teeth as white as pearls, and a step as springy as a kitten's. Her clothes, too, were finer than any of the poor, toiling women in that new settlement could afford. They wore dresses of yellow and white check linen. That they spun and wove themselves, with the exception of a calico dress that they had brought with them to the "new country."

That evening, when the men came in to supper, they, good souls, were quite captivated by the little witch in fluttering ribbons. She knew just what to do, and it seemed that she could be in half a dozen places at one time. She could pass the big dish of wild honey, fill cups with the delicious rye coffee, "cheep!" to the toddling babies, and fry buckwheat cakes on two hot griddles, and keep the supply ahead for the long table full of hungry men, while the other women were slipping around slicing venison, carving wild turkeys, and seeing that the "other potatoes" were cooking. Wonderful how easy it came to Mrs. Salome Chester to do whatever work came to her hands. Old Mr. Camden said she "took to work as naterally as a duck took to water." That night, the little widow eclipsed all the other women in the dance. In the Virginia reel she seemed more like a winged fairy than a poor, dependent, young widow.

There was Bacon, whose wife was called a good dancer, but he had no inclination to dance with his wife for a partner, that evening, no one would do but Salome Chester. Bacon was from Virginia, and wore a long hunting-shirt of linsey, with a collar cut so that the points came down on to his shoulders. There were slits in the sides of the shirt, and it was trimmed all around with narrow, green, woollen fringe. None of the other men wore quite such a finished or fanciful garment; they wore roundabouts, or the loose, roomy, comfortable wamus made of linsey, a home-spun material of cotton warp and woollen filling, or wool.

It was long after midnight before the frolic was over, the tallow-dips extinguished, the embers buried, and the little, disordered cabin dark and quiet.

And so for months and months were like scenes of gayety enacted.

In those days it was common for the mother to make a kettle of meal mush and stand it in a warm corner, put a crock of milk on the table, with tin cups and pewter spoons, for the children's suppers, give them their orders about behaving themselves, about burying the fire in the ashes, and then mount on an old horse behind her husband, and start off on a brisk gallop through the woods, five or seven miles away, to a dance.

What finely-developed, rosy, buxom, healthy wives our grandmothers were! And no wonder.

After awhile it was whispered that the young widow was not a safe woman, that the new neighborhood in the West were better without her. But then when traced back, the insinuation came from Susie Marshall, and they all knew that Susie always was jealous of every woman that Tom Marshall ever smiled upon, and so they laughed at her weakness, and only pitied her.

Henry Pettingill always spoke in praise of that "smart little creetur," and his wife sanctioned every word that he said. Salome came and visited Mary frequently, and she was always welcome, and Mary was always learning something new. Salome told her how to fix crabapples to keep all winter; how to preserve wild plums and wild cherries in honey; how to color black, and brown, and yellow, a new and an easier way; how to fix stalks of the golden rod, so that she would have something ornamental to stand beside the little mirror all through the gloomy days of winter; and how to make pantalettes the way they did in York State; and she initiated her into the mysteries of the oak-leaf pattern, and the pretty new kind of netting to put around stand-cloths and bureau-spreads. Why, such an ingenious little woman was worth her weight in gold in any new neighborhood. All the babies loved her, and two of the babies' mothers had named her little ones after her.

One day Mary Pettingill was taken suddenly ill—stricken down with pleurisy—and some one had to care for the duties of the household. Who shall we get? was a question easily answered, for in less than two hours' time the bay mare stood tied to the rail fence, her flanks flecked with foam; and inside the little cabin home the quick step of Salome Chester flitted hither and thither, while her soft touch and her gentle voice brought ease from pain and a sense of contentment to the invalid on the low bed back in the recess. But while she lay there her eyes were opened, and the newness of sight alarmed and saddened her almost beyond the utterance of speech. At first she thought what she saw was only the effects of a disordered imagination. She asked herself if it were jealousy that filled her breast, when one day, as the wind blew back the strip of curtain that hung beside her bed, she saw her husband dallying with one of Salome's curls—saw the lustrous, heavy curl lying in his broad palm, and, while he bent over it admiringly, touched it to his lips? Why did she shrink, unless the fires of jealousy were burning in her bosom? she asked herself. Oh, of all women she would dread most to be like Tom Marshall's wife—the fun and jeer of the whole settlement. Wasn't her Henry faithful, and kind, and loving? And wasn't he the father of her babe, the choice of her girlhood, and the pride of her heart? Couldn't a man touch to his lips a shining curl of hair just as purely and rightfully as he'd touch a velvet rose to his cheek? Shouldn't her husband, Henry Pettingill, have the same privilege of loving and admiring all beautiful things the same as she had? Of course. And turning her face to the wall, she closed her eyes, and counted all the precious blessings that were hers in this life.

The next evening there was to be preaching at Simpkins's School-house. It was rarely that a Methodist itinerant preacher came that way, but when one did he always stopped at Brother Simpkins's, and he sent his boys around among the neighbors to inform them that there would be preaching at his house, or sometimes at the log school-house at the forks of the Vernon Road.

Mary saw that Salome would like to go to hear the new preacher; and Henry remarked that he did wish Mary was well, he would hitch up the oxen and they would drive over. She said it seemed a pity, just because she was sick, they should both be debarred the pleasure of going to meeting, and that if they fixed everything comfortable and safe, she could stay alone with baby Levi that length of time.

They both mounted the little bay and rode off. How long the time did seem till nine o'clock! The fire in the wide fireplace burned briskly, and threw dancing shadows all around. She lay and watched the drooping feathers and the asparagus that airily surrounded the broad, white face of the little old buckeye clock high up on the wall. Then she watched the long, tedious swing, swing, back and forth, of the pendulum, until, in a feverish nightmare, the heavy gray weights looked in the dimness like two big, dull eyes watching her unblinkingly. She looked away; and again and again she counted the shells of the bird-eggs that were strung on a thread and drawn across the top of the little mirror—one blue, one white, one blue, one white; then she looked at the snow-white little towel of fine huck-a-buck that was starched stiffly, ironed into diamond checks, and tacked on the wall under the mirror.

The clock struck nine—ten—eleven—the baby slept soundly, and his fat little arms lay outside the blue and green coverlet. He was the very picture of rosy health and beauty—his cheeks were a-bloom with the roses of sweet babyhood—but, oh, those two heavy, leaden weights, how they stared at her from the wall! how like devilish eyes they were! how they frightened and chilled her! and that old pendulum, how it did measure off the moments—moments of time that were passing away forever and forever! How strange a thing time did seem just then! How like an ocean with a wide, wide expanse stretching away far around her, and she, like a lone little atom, seemed to be drifting on the broad bosom of that immense ocean, alone, not even her baby was with her.

The fire grew dim, the white ashes crept over the red coals, the face of the clock looked in the gray dimness like a leering, staring white face up on the cabin wall—it struck twelve—the moments went on—the white clock face looked now like the face of one dead, one who had died a violent and a horrible death. She screamed, the baby woke and clutched tightly his mother's neck; in her moment of frightful delirium she thought the fearful face on the wall belonged to a stalwart form, and that it had come down and was clutching its talony fingers tightly around her throat. She knew no more. When she woke to consciousness, the sun was shining into the cabin—the long rays streamed in from the eastern hills and fell across her bed. Some of her neighbors were ministering to her. Levi sat on his father's knee, and Salome Chester was arranging some wild-wood flowers in a little jar that stood on a shelf under the long, narrow window. Mary rubbed her eyes and marvelled at the strangeness of everything that surrounded her. She thought she was aroused from a terrible dream. A suspicion of the truth lingered with her, but she forbore to ask any questions. Salome stayed two weeks longer, and then Mary, in a feeble way, resumed her usual duties. If she had any remote thought of her husband's unfaithfulness, she banished it as unbecoming a wife and mother.

About this time an itinerant preacher called there for dinner. He was a godly man, and he improved the opportunity of speaking to his entertainers on the subject of their soul's salvation. Mary had given this solemn and important theme but little earnest thought. From this time she was thoroughly awakened to a sense of her duty and her need. Henry gave but little heed to the kindly-spoken words of the earnest wayfaring man of God.

After this, Mary found a delight in reading and meditating—she was never lonely, never afraid or weak and cowardly. Henry would be absent half the night at a dance in the settlement, while his wife remained at home from choice.

One night, as she sat reading, there was a shuffling step at the door, then a gentle rap.

"Who is there?" she spoke, kindly.

"Only Johnny," was the laughing reply, as the door opened and Johnny Appleseed entered with a sack on his back.

Everybody in the West knew and welcomed to their homes, at any hour of the day or night, Uncle Johnny, as he was familiarly called. His right name was John Chapman, but he was better known as Johnny Applesseed. He was an eccentric old man, but very kind, and tender-hearted, and good. He always carried in his bosom a well-worn testament and a book or two setting forth the principles of the beautiful religion that he daily lived.

Mary welcomed the poor old man, and gave him something to eat, then he read to her and talked until bed-time. He called her Mary, even as a tender father would address his daughter. When the hour for retiring came, she asked him to occupy the spare bed in the low loft, but he said, "My habits are not changed; you know I always sleep on the floor." Then he laid the sack of dry apple-seeds down beside the wide stone jamb, flattened it out smoothly and made a little hollow in it for his head, spread down beside it a ragged old coat to make a resting-place for his shoulders, and with a pleasant chuckle of satisfaction he lay down and soon slept the sleep of the weary good man, at peace with all the world, and cherishing only good will toward all of God's creatures.

Johnny Chapman was the pioneer nurseryman of the West. Much of the good he did lives after him. From my window I can count no less than six, and almost seven, orchards that were in good bearing condition fifty and fifty-five years ago. Only for the unselfish sacrifices made by this old man in those early days did this valuable heritage come down to ours and us. He frequently travelled fifty miles on foot with a sack of seeds on his shoulder.

In the morning, after Johnny left their cabin, Henry took his axe and went out to the clearing. He was dull-eyed and not refreshed after the rude gayety of the previous night. He had only gone as far as the spring, when he returned and said he believed he would leave his flannel wamus and let her sew on a couple of buttons and mend the ripped lining in the sleeve—that every time he put it on, his fingers were quite sure to catch in the rip.

Mary set back the little wheel against the wall, and went to the dresser and took down a box that contained the buttons. Henry put on an old roundabout, and started again to the clearing.

She sewed on the missing buttons, turned the sleeve, and mended the rip in the lining, and daigned a tear in the edge of the facing, all the time humming the same hymn that the Methodist preacher had sung the day that he tarried with them. Then she held up the renovated garment and saw no other need of repairs.

"Ah, the pockets," said she, to herself; "it is strange if there are no rips or no holes in them," and she thrust her hand first into one, then into the other, finding no mending to be done; then she remembered the little side-pocket on the left, inside, the one meant to carry his handkerchief in. Thrusting her hand into it, she drew out the gay, nine-pence, red-and-yellow cotton, and with it came a small, folded note, directed in a neat, feminine hand.

Without a second thought, she opened it. It was signed "S. C.," and bore no date. Was it jealousy that swept over her, like an overwhelming tide, then? What was it that made her eyes gleam and glow, and her breath like a suffocating, choking blast from a furnace? What made her heart stand still, and her red lips part as though she would fain cry for help but that the power of speech had deserted her?

From that note she learned that her husband was no more the faithful husband that he had been; that a guilty love existed between himself and the little widow, Salome Chester; that they met frequently, and delighted in each other's society; that their stolen interviews were unknown to any living person, and that they did not intend any ostacle should stand between them.

This was a severe blow for the poor wife. She rose, staggering, and, like a dazed creature, groped blindly for the ladder that stood in the corner. Wearily she climbed up its few rounds, and crawled into the low, dark loft overhead. Then she felt secure. She lay down and clasped her hands, and called upon God to have mercy on her in her hour of midnight darkness. In her agony she thought of suicide; she thought of the rosy baby asleep in his rude cradle below; she clenched her little brown hands until the print of the nails indented the flesh—and, oh, how she did despise the craven creature who had stolen away the love of her young husband! She thought of the pleasant home that had been theirs before this dazzling enchantress had come between her and the choice of her girlhood. She cried out aloud the dear names of father and mother, but only two heaped-up graves in the village burying-ground remained to tell of them—they were gone beyond the agonized cry of distress that came from the breaking heart of their beloved daughter. Then she remembered that other wives had borne the same sorrow, and had grown nobler and truer, and had been lifted up to beautiful heights through this fiery trial, this sore discipline. How her arms outreached in sympathy toward all wives ruthlessly robbed of their one treasure!

I think there is no sorrow that can come to a wife so bitter, so poignant as this. My tenderest sympathy reaches out most lovingly to those who bear this cross. I believe that hundreds of agonizing wives commit suicide under similar circumstances, and the friends, through the ever-ready press, herald the calamity as "aberration of mind."

Mary grew passive, but under the apparent calm of her strange white face wild schemes warred with each other. "She has robbed me of the love of my husband," she said, with shut teeth and gleaming eyes. One hour she would resolve to go to Salome and appeal to her with all a woman's trust and faith, ask her to go away where he would never look upon her fair, fascinating face again; then she would wish, with the fierceness of a lioness robbed of her one whelp, that she could take her false life; then again she would lie down with her tear-wet face on the hard, rough, puncheon floor, or with her pallid cheek pressed roughly upon the stony ground, and weep as though the hard floor or cold earth was the tender, restful bosom of the sainted mother gone. How often the little baby would peep up playfully, but with a mystified expression, into her dewy eyes, and say: "Oo cry! oo cry! No-no!" and then try to gather up the scant corner of his little bib apron to wipe away the tears. How he would kiss and kiss his mother, and try to make her laugh. This was the one sole comfort left to the stricken wife.

How beautiful and how precious is the love of a sinless little child! How it comforts and blesses a mother bowed down with a burden of sorrow!

But the end was nigh—nearer than she dreamed. One morning when she woke, the pillow beside her was undented by the touch of a sleeper. Her husband had gone to see a neighbor the day before, and had not expected to arrive at home before midnight. When she opened the door in the morning, a slip of paper was fastened to the latch-string. In a few words he told her the story of his shame and of her desertion; said he had made a mistake when he married her; that since then he had met the only one he ever loved. He said that pursuit was useless, and when a sufficient length of time had expired, he would marry Salome Chester; and he advised Mary to marry another whenever she was convinced that a new affection had taken possession of her heart.

Mary wept and wailed as she read this; but what was it when compared with the postscript in the hurried scrawl. His love for another she could tolerate, and, if it was conducive to his future happiness, could forgive; but the heartlessness of that postscript—which was, that his baby-boy, Levi, should be given to Mr. Simpkins, and should be the adopted son of that worthy man.

Perhaps it was well for Mary that this postscript was a part of the letter, because it counteracted the effects of her desertion and of the alienation of her husband's affection.

What unmitigated cruelty! How base the heart of the misguided man who could tear this last solace from the closest twining tendrils of a devoted mother-love!

"Let any demon dare to snatch my darling from me!" said the mother, flying to the bedside, and hugging to her bosom the sleeping child.

She neither fainted nor fell; nor did she wail out in bitterness, as she had before. That cruel postscript acted like a bracing tonic. The husband was henceforth dead; all love for him had fallen to the ground; like an idol made of crumbling clay was the idol she had worshipped, but would worship no more forever. One thought and one burning desire took possession of her heart, and that was to stand face to face before the guilty pair, and denounce them with a scathing denunciation.

Neighbors and friends gathered around Mary, and not one kept back the meed of sympathy that filled their hearts to the utmost. Men clenched their brawny hands into fists that suggested knot-mauls, and they gesticulated freely with them. Kind women buried their crying faces in their linen aprons and wept aloud, while they clung to the lone wife and proffered aid, and condolence, and friendship. Mr. Simpkins said, "Let us pray," and the noisy group knelt beside the four rude chairs, and the handy little benches, and the bedside, and the "chist," while the good man prayed as fervently as though he were in the centre of a glorious love-feast. Strong men shouted amen vociferously when Brother Simpkins besought that the direct vengeance of the Almighty might follow the guilty pair who had laid waste and desecrated this once pleasant home. He prayed that no hour of peace should ever come a-nigh them, and that the ghost of the deserted wife and babe might haunt the pillow of the unfeeling father even all the way down to the grave. Mr. Simpkins was as indignant over the last will and testament of Henry Pettingill as was the injured wife and mother. He said he would watch over them like an elder brother, and that they could always depend on his strong arm for protection.

And now comes in a strange part of the story. We wish this feature were not in it, but we want to tell it as it really is. Women do get queer ideas into their heads, sometimes, and Mary had one, and it was the overwhelming desire to stand face to face with Henry Pettingill and Salome Chester. She told her secret to no one—she would not have dared to betray these wild fancies of hers. They might have deemed her demented and have dealt with her accordingly.

It was the opinion of all that the young widow had probably returned to the home of her former wedded life and would pretend that she was married in the West, or, probably she was. Mary decided on her strange plan, which was to rent her farm, leave her child in good hands and start off on foot and alone to the State of New York, see them, and then return the same way she went.

This was a perilous undertaking fifty years ago. Now, a ten-years-old girl can go a journey of three or four hundred miles with safety, but in those early days it was full of privation and danger, and the way was hedged in by perils.

A woman, too! But Mary had calculated all this in the wakeful hours of the long, lonely nights, in which no slumberous touch pressed on her eyelids—in vigilant nights had she planned with all the shrewdness and strategy of a keen, clear-headed, cool general. The way seemed so open, the long stretch of miles, and miles, were nothing; her sharp perceptions took in and measured all things: trials she knew she must encounter; dangers she must face; privations she must endure; jeers and rebuffs, and mayhap violence, would meet her where she expected and hoped for the very reverse.

But she felt as though her will could overcome any obstacle, that nothing would be too great for her to bear, if the precious recompense could only be hers. If she could only stand before that man who had so cruelly wronged her, and who would, in heaping up the full measure of his iniquities, have added the last bitterness, that of wrenching from her arms and from her lacerated heart her darling, her only solace, her sweetest treasure! If she could be permitted to look into his eyes and the eyes of his partner in guilt, and talk to them out of the fullness and the bitterness of her soul, she could then, though broken-down, and foot-sore, and weary, most cheerfully retrace her steps homeward to such peace and happiness as this world would give her.

Her decision was taken, and the day fixed upon, and her arrangements nearly completed. Her farm was leased; her baby left, as though for a little visit, with the Simpkins family, and her attire was ready to be donned.

It was no travelling suit of linen, or poplin, or of serge with the comfortable and pretty accompaniments of now-a-days, but instead it was a man's clumsily-made coat, and trousers, and vest, of common gray jeans, and a slouch white-wool hat and hickory cane. She sighed as she put it on, one early morning, and fitted the hat on over her short, brown hair. The little mirror gave back the face and form of a fair young man of about twenty-eight or thirty years of age, one who looked unsophisticated and unused to the ways of the busy world. But there must have been a determined expression in that steel-gray eye. I thought so, at least, as I gazed into it that long-ago summer day as I sat before Mary Pettingill beside the old stone wall in the orchard.

That long journey, nearly all the way on foot, was a wearisome, tedious, tiresome work, although she averaged ten miles a day. People, generally, were kind to her. Sometimes a man would overtake her, riding along in a wagon, and would hail out: "Jump in 'n' ride, comrade;" and often, in a jolly, clever way, some generous-hearted fellow slap her on the shoulder after the hail-fellow-well-met style, but she never so far forgot her purpose as to let any trepidation betray her secret.

One time, as she sat in a bar-room, she overheard two men talking about "that youngster" as being "kind o' softly-like."

When she arrived at her destination in New York, she met with the one disappointment that she feared might be hers—Salome had lived there once, it was there her husband, Chester, had died, but after she left for the West, they had known no more about her. All inquiry and search were unavailing, all her great efforts were fruitless, and she had nothing to do but to return as she had come.

This was almost more than she could bear. How earnestly she had longed for this one object; how fervently she had hoped to enjoy this revenge; how she would have esteemed this most satisfactory result, but what more could she do now?

So, with a heavy heart she retraced her steps homeward, and on her return she averaged twelve miles a day. The longing desire to see her baby quickened her steps, and the old sadness lost its sting and the old sorrow its bitterness in the sweet thought of folding to her bosom her treasure. All the lost love for a recreant husband came back to her tripled and quadrupled into a love for her boy, the babe who would grow up to a beautiful and noble manhood, and on whose strong arm she would lean—her comfort, and blessing, and protector.

So she slipped back again into the old groove. Times in the new settlement were marked by progress; a church was built, a school-house, neighbors lived nearer to each other; afterwards they came to have, through the exertions of good Brother Simpkins, regular preaching, and soon a respectable membership, and finally an organized church.

Mary heard the "old, old story," it sank into her heart, and she felt that of all women she most needed the Friend who is above all others, whose love is more than the love of husband, or father, or son. Her boy grew, and was full of the sweetest promise. He was kind, obedient, upright and consistent in all his conduct. He regarded his mother as but little lower than the angels.

The beautiful years went on. They were marked by no sorrows or disasters, and marred by no signs of displeasure. The little log-cabin gave way, and for many years stood back, draped by interlacing grape-vines, while a more comfortable and pretentious dwelling stood in front, surrounded by a neat fence. Johnny Appleseed gave the lad free permission to go to his nearest nursery, in the edge of a bloomy bit of prairie a few miles distant, and select all the young trees he wanted. Johnny generally took a man's note when he was not able to pay down, but he took no note from the lad or his mother. Perhaps the reason was, once when the chill November winds were blowing pitilessly, Johnny came to Mary Pettingill's clad very scantily, and, without a word, she had brought forth the wedding-coat of her amply dead husband, and made him put it on and wear it and keep it. This may have been the reason. But before the shortest days of the following February came round, Johnny had met with a fellow traveller in greater need than himself, and had most cheerfully re-given away the coat. That was the way he always did.

The beautiful years went on. The boy Levi grew up into a handsome youth. None of the evil ways of the world touched him, or, if they did, they sullied not the beauty and integrity of his excellent character.

One day, when Levi was about twenty years of age, a gossip old man, a neighbor, who had always known the Pettingills, told the boy the whole story of his father's shame, not omitting any of the painful particulars—told him even of his father desiring Brother Simpkins to take him, the baby, from the arms of his mother, and adopt him as his own son.

The young man was indignant beyond utterance, and hastened to his mother with the intelligence.

When she told him gently that this was true, he made no reply for a moment, the muscles in his face worked, his lips were white and compressed, and when he spoke, the few words he said were: "Mother, I wish I could do something that would be returning good for evil—do him a great kindness that he would never cease to feel, and never forget all through the rest of his life—do it to that man who is my father." He leaned his head on his hand, and the dripping tears fell through his fingers.

She caught her breath. She had never thought of this man who had so darkened her young married life—never thought of him in such a kindly way as had her son.

"I do forgive him, child," she said; "but, oh! I never could treat him kindly; the very thought of his touch repulses me, the thought of his voice chills instead of thrilling me with pleasure. Yet I am glad that you can feel charitably toward him, even though he did desert you, and seek by his latest word to tear you from me."

And there they sat, the mother and the son, in the flickering light of the wood-fire, and talked freely on this hitherto silent subject. He asked many questions, and she answered promptly and truly. Their intercourse was very pleasant, indeed it was more like the sweet friendship existing between a sister and brother, than like the tie that is between a mother and her son.

Circumstances all seemed to combine together to bring about the half-reconciliation that the young man proposed when he first heard of the fate of his father. It seemed that he was to be submitted to the test. An old man from the State of New York came to visit a family who lived near the Pettingills. He had known people of the same name years before in his own neighborhood; the man had lost one arm, and had been otherwise unfortunate; his wife was queer, and kind of crazy, and none of their children were sound in mind or body.

Not a word was said, but the mother and son exchanged quick glances that meant as much as though they were clothed in speech.

After that, in a careless, chatty way, one time when they were alone with the elderly visitor, they inquired more particularly about the Pettingills in the State of New York. The age of the man and woman seemed to be about the same as of those in whom they were so peculiarly interested.

In the following autumn, Levi started off one day in a little, light, one-horse wagon. When he parted with his mother, he said: "Now, mother, are you perfectly willing that I should do this to gratify my curiosity? I feel as if I would like to look upon my father's face."

"Very willing," was her reply. "But come back to me soon, my child, and let us both keep this matter entirely between ourselves."

A little box of provision was in under the seat, and the back part of the wagon was covered with hay, under which was feed for the horse.

Levi jogged along slowly on his journey that he might look at the country leisurely. When he came into that part of the State of New York in which his informant resided, he inquired for the name of Pettingill. No one knew of that name. At last an old lady from a village five miles distant, said there was a very poor, distressed family named Pettingill who once lived over on the hill road, eight or ten miles from them.

Without manifesting any unusual interest, Levi drove down into the old lady's neighborhood the next day, and there, after much inquiry, learned that the family had been taken to the almshouse about two years previous.

Was it possible that this could be his father and his family! At any rate, he would visit the poor-house under pretence of wishing to adopt a boy ten or twelve years old. What mingled feelings and emotions thronged his mind as he hitched his horse at the bars before the dilapidated and for-bidding county almshouse.

Levi was a man of fine personal appearance, and looked like the gentleman that he was.

The urbane proprietor escorted him through the different departments. Alas, alas! it seemed that the fervent, earnest, angry prayer of Brother Simpkins, in the deserted household, long years before, on that well-remembered occasion, was fulfilled to the very letter!

In a cell, behind cold iron grating, was the wreck of the wily widow, Salome Chester. She was haggard beyond description. Her hair was cut short and stood bristling all over her head. Her hands were like talons. One loose garment, the hem of which was frayed and fringed into hanging tatters, half covered her emaciated form. Her teeth were few and jagged; her eyes, wild, and dark, and devilish, glared out from cavernous sockets. She sat on the ground eating wheaten grits, from an old tin pan, with her skinny fingers; a tin cup half full of buttermilk stood beside her.

She had inherited insanity from her mother, and would never recover. Near her, in another cell, was her son, a youth of twenty or twenty-five years of age. He had been an inmate of the almshouse for more than a dozen years. He was harmless, generally, but when the fits of frenzy or madness came upon him, he was dangerous, and for this reason they kept him confined all the time. He had some pieces of old cloth, and was busy cutting out and making what he called mittens, although they bore no resemblance to mittens, whatever. The thumbs were cut out and sewed on, and some of them were half as large as the mittens themselves.

"Well, Henry, you are still busy, I see," said the proprietor, in a cheerful voice.

"Yaas," was the drawling reply. "I'm allus to work; I'm never glum. I want to git my stent done afore dark."

"Henry!" That was the name of the father—Levi's father—and he shrank back as he thought of it, and knew that the same blood, the blood of the Pettingills, was alike flowing in their veins. And this sprawling idiot, who had reached the full stature of manhood, was his brother—the son of the same father! But while he was repelled, he pitied.

A large, sleepy-eyed girl lay on a cot-bed playing with a button and a string. Her laugh was frequent, and no more like real human laughter than the braying of an ass. She could not talk, instead she made a noise: "Jubba-jubba-jah! jubba-jubba-jah!" and seemed to need nothing else to amuse her. She was a pitiable object. Her hair was cut short, her mouth large, nose flat, and her narrow forehead receding painfully.

Another girl was intelligent enough to assist in the almshouse kitchen, if some one kept strict watch over her.

At last they entered the large room set apart for the old, and crippled, and invalids.

An old man with rather good features and with long, white hair hanging down to his neck, sat in a rickety chair with his feet laid up on a stool. He had only one arm. Rheumatism had drawn his limbs until they were twisted out of every degree of shapeliness. He had long been a sufferer from chronic rheumatism. He looked up an instant and then looked down again at the cloths which wrapped his limbs.

Levi knew by the description that this man was his father. He longed to hear his voice, and, putting on an air of indifference, he kindly, but carelessly, said: "You are afflicted by a painful disease, sir."

"Yes, it is almost more than I can—more than I can—can," was the reply, in a voice that had once been strong and full, but was now cracked and whining.

"Would you be glad to get away from here?" asked Levi, looking down at the broken and bowed form before him.

"Oh, sir, I would, I would!" was the childish, 'plaining answer, and he looked up eagerly and inquiringly.

"It must be a lonely, sad life," said Levi, walking away and turning his attention to another inmate who was even in a worse condition than his father.

Levi talked alone with the proprietor, and the conference ended with the promise of having the old man's clothes clean and ready by the morrow, when he was to be removed. All this was to be kept from the knowledge of the poor inmate.

That night, after Levi had retired, he had leisure to think over what he had done, and for an instant he was startled at the step he had taken.

What would his mother say? Would it be right to carry home with him this imbecile old man who had once so shamefully and heartlessly wronged that gentle wife and mother? Would it be right to shelter that hoary old head under the same roof?

He tossed in bed uneasily, but after midnight he fell asleep, and in his dreams a vision came to him, his mother. With a benignity of countenance that was radiant and beautiful beyond all expression, she smiled on Levi and acquiesced with his decision. That dream satisfied him.

The next day, he drove over to the almshouse. He stood before the feeble old man, and in a low, but distinct, voice said: "I come for you; I am going to take you away from here, and give you a home while you live. Do you know who I am? can you surmise who would come and take you from this poor bondage?"

Henry Pettingill, the broken, shattered, trembling, old man, looked up and a blank expression crept over his twitching, pallid face, his eyes stared, and he swung his head with a see-saw motion as he whined out, in a dazed way: "Are you—are you? oh, I don't remember—that must have been a long, long time ago, wasn't it? Let me think—did you fetch us here that snowy day, when they put the quilts all over my head to keep—to keep—was that the time? and they told us—they told us they were takin' us to a better house! Ah, yes, I mind! you drove the horses, and you cracked the whip at them, ha, ha! ha, ha! Well, we will go and ride again, will we? ha, ha, ha! Yes, we will ride, ha, ha! thankee, sir, yee, ha, ha!"

It was very, very sad. An old bed was laid in the little spring wagon and a comfortable place made for the decrepid old man.

We can imagine the feelings that stirred the very fountains of his soul, as Levi drove down the lane that led from the door of the poor-house out into the state road. The proprietor opened the bars to let him drive through. The men shook hands. Tears were in their eyes, for both appreciated this scene in the sad drama of an ill-starred life—a life misguided, full of errors, blighted, and, as an unerring result, a failure. One wrong step will blight a whole life.

"Am I going home with you—eh?" laughed the old man, peeping up at Levi from his wrappings down in the wagon.

Levi nodded his head.

It was a long journey, and his charge grew very tired and restless sometimes. After a night's rest, he was recuperated, and would sing as they drove slowly along under arching oaks and through beautiful stretches of wildwood. He would amuse himself an hour at a time singing the words: "The rat ran up the wall; the rat ran down the wall; the rat ran in the hole."

It was night when they reached the pleasant home of the Pettingills. The firelight was flickering fitfully, and throwing up glancing lights on the walls and against the white-curtained windows. The old man was asleep when the little wagon halted at the gate. Levi softly climbed out and tapped on the window-panes at his mother's bed-room.

"Mother, I've come back," he said, brokenly.

"My dear son, my dear son," she answered, in tones full of emotion.

"Well," he said; and that one word contained a volume. He paused.

"Is it well with you, Levi, my son?" said the mother.

He held her in his arms while he told her the strange result of his visit.

"Mother, he is here now; he is out in the wagon at the gate. Can you blame me? Can you bear all this? Is it wrong that we—you and I—whom he deserted long, long ago, should return good for that great evil? I wanted to do this, mother. I felt brave and strong, and was glad to do it. I was proud to gather up the remnants of his tattered life and try to make peace and good come out of the poor fragments. Say you are willing, mother!"

But the limp figure had slid down out of his arms and fallen at his feet; even while he spoke his words fell upon deaf ears.

The distorted old form of his father was borne into the house and cared for comfortably. Mary Pettingill's husband was dead to her when he gave up her love for that of another; and she seemed to look upon this man, this diseased, ailing, pining, trembling pauper, even as she would look upon any of God's miserable creatures. To her he was as dead as though he had been buried thirty years before; her love for him was dead, her tenderness, her pity, her interest, all gone, but the one feeling of Christian charity. And though she cared for and ministered to his physical wants and necessities, it was mechanically done. No emotion stirred her pulses, no warmth gladdened her heart; she was repulsed even to loathing, only for the sake of the sweet revenge that came to her and to her boy. She could even sit at the same fireside and be warmed by the same ruddy glow, but he was no more to her than the cat lying on the rug or the dog beside the door. How fearfully had been answered the gushing and wrathful petition of the irate Brother Simpkins! Desolation had marked the path of the doomed man.

They lived thus two years, then the days of Henry Pettingill were numbered. One night he was taken violently ill, and when the disease assumed another form, lo, the shadows that had darkened his sky were gone! Like a pearly blossom that opened to the revivifying power of the blessed sunshine, the intellect cleared and shone out, and he was clothed in his right mind.

No womanly woman, under these circumstances even, could accept a perfect reconciliation. But Levi and his father talked together, and the noble son accepted of his meek petition for entire forgiveness. He told Levi that the anguish of the accursed had been with him in all the years since he had left his wife and baby and united his fortunes with those of a cruel, heartless and designing woman. He said no earthly punishment could have been harder to endure. He died calmly, peacefully.

The sun was just setting, and its golden beams fell aslant from the western hill-tops, and shone in upon the face of the man whose sin-stained soul had gone to Him who gave it. The little room was still, and no one was in it then, and as Mary Pettingill softly passed the door she looked in. The face was glorified in the halo of soft sunlight. For a moment she thought of the Henry of her youthful years, and with stealthy step she stole in and softly kissed the face of the sleeper. Only for a moment, though, did the old-time tenderness warm her bosom. The sun went down as she stood there, and with its last rays departed the blessed influence that had guided her faltering steps to that bedside—that moment came up vividly the memory of Salome Chester, and the kisses that she, the syren, had laid upon the face wrongfully, wickedly, and hers by no right given of God or man.

When the morrow's sunset came again, the little procession was winding its way down to the churchyard. A beautiful spreading beech-tree stood a little distance from the other graves, and under this was the sleeping-place designated and chosen by the lonely old man. Mary was not among those who surrounded the grave, but leaning against a native pine at the other side of the yard, a woman's figure was seen draped in black and closely veiled. She was standing there like a form in statuary when the procession slowly turned away and scattered in the directions of their several homes. When the gray twilight wrapped the earth in its gathering folds, the woman sadly walked to the newly-made grave, and stood in meditation many minutes. Then she turned and went away.

This was the story. I wish I could have told it in her own peculiarly vigorous style, and with the pathos with which it came to me. In a ten miles' ride across the beautiful country with Levi, I had an opportunity to learn all the particulars of this painful page of his life-history. He told it freely, and frankly answered the many questions I asked him.

Oh, these old cabin hearthstones! what stories do cluster about them. Every one has its tale—some tragic, some terrible and full of sorrow, and some calm and peaceful and full of a restful satisfaction! Why sit down and write strange, wild, unreal things, drawn from a morbid imagination, when tales o'ertrue and full of interest, and full of comfort and sympathy, and allied to the trials and sorrows and scenes of our own daily lives, lie all about us waiting to be told! Better to gather up these scattering threads and weave them into a web—not such as we behold glittering in our dreams, but such as we see clearly in every day that comes to us between the familiar bindings of sunrise and sunset.

PAPER IN JAPAN.

WHEN a people contrive to make saucepans, fine pocket-handkerchiefs and sailors' waterproof overcoats out of paper, they may be considered as having pretty thoroughly mastered a useful art; and this is demonstrated by the above articles of Japanese manufacture, with the additional little circumstance that the saucepans are generally used over charcoal fires.

According to their own account, these ancient islanders wrote upon silk faced with linen, and also used very thin wood-shavings for the same purpose, until nearly the close of the third Christian era. About A. D. 280, paper was first imported from the Corea, and, superseding the home-made fabrics, monopolized the market until the year A. D. 610, when the king of the Corea sent two priests to Japan to establish the manufacture. This paper was easily torn, and liable to be destroyed by worms, and, besides, did not take the ink well. These manifold disadvantages attracted the attention of Taishi, the son of the reigning Mikado, who substituted, as material, the bark of a species of paper-mulberry, which is still extensively cultivated for the purpose. By Taishi's orders the tree was planted throughout the country, the method of manufacture publicly taught, and thus the industry was commenced which has since so prosperously continued.

At the present time two hundred and sixty-three sorts of paper are manufactured in Yeddo. In regard to this immense number of styles, the national love for formalities must be considered; as, for instance, in addition to the usual varieties to which we are accustomed as appropriate for deeds, public documents, letters, notes, etc., the Japanese list mention four distinct kinds intended to be exclusively used for poetry and songs. There are also kinds enumerated as employed for umbrellas, hats, lanterns and waterproof clothing, one being described as serving for candlewick and pocket-handkerchiefs, while another is intended for handkerchiefs only, and a third is used for dressing dolls. Special kinds are prepared exclusively as wrappings for the several styles of religious, civic or social gifts.

The excellence in the manufacture is due, in a great degree, to the fact that Japan furnishes a number of trees and shrubs with a fibrous bark particularly adapted as a material for paper, and several plants of which the roots, seed or sap yield a natural size for the surface of the sheet.

The species of mulberry first used in the seventh century is still regarded as containing the best fibre, and it is extensively cultivated. The plants are annually cut down to the root until the fifth year, when, by this treatment, the wood has become dense and strong. The branches are then cut into lengths of about one yard, and steamed in a straw vessel over a boiler. As soon as the bark begins to separate from the wood, it is stripped off by the hand, the wood itself being preserved for fuel. The bark is then hoisted upon poles to dry, by exposure to the air, and when dry it is separated into bundles weighing about thirty-two pounds each. The dry bark is then immersed in running water for twelve hours, after which the outer husk or bark is scraped off to serve as the material for an inferior kind of paper. The remaining or inner portion is again washed in running water, and, after pressure under the heavy stones, the fibre is boiled with ashes. After another washing, it is well pounded, and then moulded into balls. These balls are next thrown into a wooden trough, and mixed with a pulp, together with a paste made from the root of the tororo, a shrub somewhat resembling the cotton plant. A portion of this pulp is next placed in a frame consisting of an inner and an outer portion with a false bottom of plaited bamboo. A dexterous and peculiar jerk from the skilled operator sets the pulp in the frame, and it is then so placed as to permit the water to drain off. The sheet of paper is lifted from the frame with a piece of bamboo, and laid with a brush on a drying-board, the side adhering to the board forming the face of the paper.

The paper "warranted to wash" is made with another kind of paste; and in the oil paper for waterproof clothes a glue is used made from young fern shoots stained with the expressed juice of unripe persimmons. Colors are applied in powder mixed with bean paste.

Several of the trees and plants used in the manufacture of paper are described as being the object of careful cultivation, especially in the manuring and preparation of the soil.

IMMODERATE pleasures shorten men's days more than the best medicaments can prolong them. The poor are seldomer sick for the want of food than the rich are by the excess of it. Meats that are too relishing, and which create an immoderate appetite, are rather a poison than a nutriment. Medicines in themselves are really mischievous, and destructive of nature, and ought only to be used on pressing occasions; but the grand medicine, which is always useful, is sobriety, temperance in pleasure, tranquillity of mind, and bodily exercise; in this the blood is sweetened and in good temperament, and all superfluous humors are dissipated.

The Story-Teller.

RACHEL DILLOWAY'S SON.*

BY MRS. JULIA C. R. DOER.
CHAPTER XVII.

WHEELS within wheels, pulleys, and axles, and bands, and levers. Did you ever watch some complicated piece of machinery, and notice the marvellous precision with which each separate part does its own work, and, at just the right instant, steps into its own place? There is nothing wanting, and nothing superfluous. Each part acts upon some other part, and all combine to make one grand, harmonious whole.

Human life, alas! is not always grand, nor always harmonious; but it is wonderfully complex. It, too, has its wheels within wheels. Effect follows cause, doubtless, by as regular a sequence as any that governs the course of inanimate nature; and the influence of one star upon another is not more sure and steady than the influence of other souls upon our souls, other lives upon our lives.

But what would become of us all if we fully realized this?—if we had the power to read the end from the beginning? What if by some occult divination, or even by some strange thrill running down to our finger-tips, we could know whenever in the street, in the market-place, in the temples of our God, or in festal halls, we pass those whose destinies are, sometime, to be so closely interwoven with our own, that they cannot be separated without destroying the whole fabric of our lives? What if we knew this? Could we bear it? Or even those who in some strange, incomprehensible way are to affect our lives for good or ill, even though their fate and ours may be utterly distinct? Mystics and poets tell us of those whose natures are so keenly strung that they tremble and turn pale, whenever a foot falls upon the spot of ground that shall one day be their grave. But to meet one's own ghost in the way—and to know it—would not that be worse?

They who hold in their hands the threads of each other's fates, come together so strangely from the farthest parts of the earth, from distant seas and opposing continents. But they pass each other without recognition, till the hour strikes.

Not many months ago, two who loved each other well, went down to their death in the restless, heaving sea, clasped in each other's arms. To think that they once met as strangers; that they were introduced in the ordinary, commonplace fashion; that he led her to the dance, or took her out to dinner, with all the orthodox prettinesses of speech, as he had taken others before her; that they looked quietly in each other's faces, and chatted idly at intervals during weeks and months, undreaming that they were aught to each other! What if one had told them then, that, after a few years of eventful life together, they were to pass beyond the veil at the same instant, companions and lovers even unto the bitter end?

Yet it is well—and ignorance is better than knowledge. Sleep on, O faithful hearts, whose cradle is the rolling deep—sleep on, and take your rest, lulled by the eternal anthem of the sea!

What set me off upon this train of thought? Why, just this: I was thinking of Rose Sterling and Roy Dilloway, and of how they met fate blindly, as the rest of us do. For it is not best to attempt any thin disguises. I am here to tell you the story of Rachel Dilloway and her son; and you know as well as I do, that I would not have gone out of my way to make you acquainted with Rose Sterling, if she had not had something to do with that story. So why should we make a poor pretense of supposing that she has not?

It was on commencement-day that Mrs. Sterling died; the commencement-day that was the beginning of Roy's last year of college life—his senior year. This was the year, too, that brought to him the certain indescribable, intangible, impalpable something, that stamps upon the youth the seal of manhood. Hitherto he had been a boy—eager, enthusiastic, full of abounding life, and in many respects mature beyond his years—but still a boy. He was not a saintly boy, either; sainthood, if it ever comes rightly, being the fruit and crown of long years of saintly living. He had been in more than one of those perilous and momentous escapades, vulgarly known as "scrapes." He had hazed and been hazed. He had been caught out in study hours, and had been demerited; and there is even a tradition that the length of his legs, and his own smothered laughter, betrayed him once on a time, when he despairingly thrust himself under a fellow-student's bed in a vain attempt to evade the awful eye of a tutor. In short, he had carried himself as many others of our young collegians do, who are equally far from being supremely good or really bad. He had spent more money, sometimes, than was for his own advantage; and he had often been unwise.

But he had never run in debt, he had never got drunk—even at society meeting—he had never compromised his own honor or his own purity. If he had less of the negative innocence of ignorance than when he entered college, he had won the positive strength that grows out of temptations resisted.

Rachel had not given him a great amount of good advice when she sent him to Linborough. She did not believe in preaching—especially to boys. But she put her arms around his neck, as she left him in the room she had taken such delight in fitting up for him, and said, looking into his full, dark eyes: "Roy, you are all I have. I shall not lose my true, pure, manly son by sending him to college, shall I? Don't forget God or your mother; and remember, always, if you are false to one you are false to both."

He promised silently as he pressed his quivering lips to hers—and he kept his word. He was no prig, and he was singularly free from all cant phrases and modes of speech, as well as from stereotyped, cantish ideas; so free from them, indeed, that he scarcely understood them in others. Most of his religious thought—which had never been in any degree forced—had reached him through the clear, undistorted medium of Rachel's sweet, limpid common sense. She had created no false conscience for him; she had never thrown the taint of sin over his innocent pleasures; she had raised no bugbears to scare him; she had built up no high mountains between him and God. She had made no mystery of right living and right thinking. There had been very little of what is popularly called "religious conversation" at Dilloway House. That is, religious conversation of a set purpose. Rachel spoke of God and Christ just as she spoke of other friends; quietly, simply, not altering the tone of her voice, or the expression of her face. The result was, that Roy's frankness was sometimes almost appalling to boys who had been differently educated.

"No," he said, to some proposition that was made to him during his freshman year. "Of course, I do not presume to decide for the rest of you. But it would not be right for me—or I should not feel that it was right—and I can't join you."

"Why, we're not church-members, any of us!" exclaimed one of the group gathered in his room. "If we were, it might be another thing. Come on, Dill! Don't be squeamish."

"Not church-members?" said Roy. "What difference does that make? Do you mean to say that only church-members need be loyal to their own convictions of what is right and manly? In or out of the church, we all have consciences, haven't we? I want to keep on good terms with mine—for it is God's gift," he added, reverently.

"Oh! If you are going to put it that way! I—I didn't know you were religious, Dilloway, or I shouldn't have asked you. I beg your pardon," and the speaker turned to leave the room.

But Roy held out his hand, with a frank smile. "I beg your pardon," he said, "if I have seemed to put on airs. I don't quite understand what you mean by being 'religious.' Certainly, I don't consider myself very good. But that's no reason why I should be deliberately bad, is it? How am I ever going to grow any better, if I choose the wrong way with my eyes wide open? Say, fellows, tell me that."

The "fellows" looked at each other askance. At last one of them answered, blowing a cloud of smoke from his meerschaum.

"I supposed the way to grow better was to be converted and get religion, by and by. Sometime or other, you know," he added, apologetically. "But I say, Dilloway, I believe you've been and done it on the sly; and it isn't quite fair on the rest of us, is it, now? We thought you were one of us."

"Why, so I am! so I want to be!" cried Roy, eagerly. "I'm not what you call 'pious.' I'm just as full of fun, and like it just as well, as the rest of you. But we all want to do what is right, when we know it, don't we?"

"You don't know anything about it, Dill," remarked one young philosopher, who sat on the table, striking his boot-heels together with a resounding thump. "You're not orthodox, young man. You can't want to do right unless you've been converted, because the human heart is 'deceitful above all things and desperately wicked,' don't you know? I've been told so a thousand times."

"No, I don't know," said Roy, sturdily. "I do not believe I am desperately wicked, boys, and it would be a lie if I should say I did. And I won't tell a lie for the sake of being what you call orthodox. I haven't been 'converted'—not to my knowledge; but I would rather do right than wrong, any day; and I believe the rest of you would, too; only you are not willing to own it, lest some one should think you are making pretensions to superior goodness. There are fellows in this college who are going to the bad, for that very reason."

"What is it to be 'converted,' any way?" asked a little fellow in the corner, tossing his Xenophon into the air, and catching it as it turned a somersault.

The question carried Roy away back into his childhood. His face flushed, and his lip quivered with strong emotion. Suddenly he remembered a long-forgotten conversation with his mother—a conversation that carried with it a new meaning now. The room was still as death.

"Let him tell us what he thinks about it," said some one, softly, nodding toward Roy.

He hesitated for a moment, pinching the cover of a book, nervously, and trying to swallow the lump in his throat. Then he said: "I remember asking my mother that very question when I was about twelve years old; and, if you like, I will tell you just what she said."

They nodded eager assent, every face wearing a lifted look that showed it at its best. Do you think young college "fellows" are only interested in dogs and horses, good wines and ballet-dancers?

"Some one had told me," said Roy, "that a boy of my own age down in the village—Woodleigh, you know—had been 'converted.' It was a new word to me, and I hurried up the hill to ask my mother the questions I had been afraid to ask of others. 'Johnny Blaine has been converted,' I exclaimed, rushing into the room where she sat. 'What have they done to him, mother? What is it to be converted?'"

A little ripple of laughter ran through the room.

"You must have been a precious innocent, for a twelve-year-old," said he of the meerschaum. "Guess you didn't go to prayer-meeting as much as I did, when I was a baby."

"I had never been in my life," answered Roy, simply. "Mother did not speak for a minute or two. I can see just how she looked," he went on, dreamily, "and I can read her face now as I did not then. She did not quite know what it was best to say to me, and she was a little afraid of saying the wrong thing. At last she took me on her lap—I was but a wee chap then, boys—and I remember just what she said.”

“Tell us, tell us!” cried the chorus.

Unconsciously the young speaker’s voice took a deeper and more reverent tone as he obeyed.

“‘My son,’ she said, ‘I do not know just what the person meant who told you that Johnny Blaine had been converted. But there comes a time in the lives of almost all persons, when they must deliberately choose one of two paths to walk in. They must choose for themselves whether they will go toward God, or away from Him—whether they will give Him love, or indifference, if not hatred. To convert means to turn; and I suppose Johnny Blaine has turned into the right way—the path that leads toward God.’”

Roy’s voice quavered and broke. He remembered something more that he did not care to tell. He remembered how he had buried his face in his mother’s bosom, and whispered that if that was being converted, then he guessed he was converted long ago!—and how she had held him close to her heart and kissed him over and over again. He did not tell the boys this. It was too sacred.

“I had forgotten this entirely,” he continued, after a minute, “until our talk called it up. It’s strange how things will slip out of our minds.”

The young faces turned toward him were thoughtful and earnest.

“It seems very simple,” said one, with a half laugh. “For my part, I have always mentally confounded the two words ‘conversion’ and ‘convulsion.’ Sound a good deal alike when you speak ‘em quick, don’t they, boys? Heigho! We had better not go down to Snedecor’s to-night, had we, fellows? It’s getting late. I’m off. Good-night, Dill.”

Roy was right. The natural bent of his character was toward good, rather than evil. Vice, especially all low vice, repelled him. No hereditary taint weakened or defiled him. Full of fun and frolic, and overflowing with healthy life and spirits, his instincts were yet pure, his impulses noble. It would have been easier for him to cut off his right hand, than to suffer it to do a mean or a dishonorable thing.

His uncle Robert left him, in a great degree, to himself in all that touched his outer life, during those first years in college.

“It is better so,” he had said to Rachel. “The boy must stand or fall for himself, or his college life will be of little use to him. It will harm him, both with the officers and his fellow-students, if I interfere ever so slightly. He must make his own way.”

But, as has been said before, it was not until his senior year that he fairly crossed the border-land that lies between youth and manhood. Then suddenly he awoke to the consciousness that life was something more than an earnest playground. Very earnest it had been to him, and its games had been all-absorbing. Its triumphs, its championships, its rivalries, its victories, and its defeats, had been eager and vital. They had seemed to him as real as life itself. Now, suddenly, as one wakes from a dream, his eyes were opened, and he saw that they were mere types and shadows—forerunners of the king whose chariot-wheels thundered not afar off.

Nay, not suddenly, though it seemed so. Nature’s processes are slow and silent, even while she abounds in seeming surprises. The garden bursts into vivid bloom and beauty, it may be, in a single week. But the work has been going on, out of our sight, through all the long, still, winter months. Under the snow the heart of the violet beats; and under the black mould the stately lily makes itself ready to receive the kisses of the sun.

And just so it was with Roy. The glory of young manhood, its loftier purposes, its higher aims, its more earnest thinking and doing, its stronger clasp of whatever is real and true, seemed to come to him suddenly. But all the sweet, strong, pure influences that had surrounded him even from his birth—ay, and before it—had been working and waiting for that hour. It was not sudden change; it was natural development, under favorable auspices.

Life had a new meaning. Books had found a soul. Nature spoke a language audible and clear. Sunrise and moonrise, starlight and dewfall, the voice of many waters, and the purple splendor of the hills, each had a secret for his ear; each told him something he had never known before of the mysteries of his own being, and of its mighty Author. “God said let there be light and there was light.” It was no miracle beyond the daily miracle of growth.

So the year went on for him—a year of hard work and earnest thinking.

CHAPTER XIX.

IT went on for Rose Sterling, also—after awhile. When she came out of the bed-room that night, it seemed to her that everything was at a standstill. The world had come to an end. With that, which but two hours before had spoken, and smiled, and loved, and suffered, to which she had ministered with such tireless hands, and for which she had been willing to labor unceasingly, now lying behind the half-opened door, silent, breathless, cold, and still, how could life go on? It was all a bewilderment. When it was such a short step between the Here and the Beyond—what did it all matter? What did anything matter? Mother was dead!

She knew that for a certainty. She had seen death before, and she could not fail to recognize its presence now. But after the first cry that had startled little Daisy, she made no further noise or outcry. She did not call any one, at first, even. She had been so in the habit for months, of doing everything for her mother herself, that to give her over into the hands of others seemed strange and unnatural. But she was faint, cold, trembling from head to foot. She must sit down for a minute.

She went into the outer room, drawing the door partly shut behind her. Daisy clung to her in a storm of frightened sobbings. She sat down in the little rocking-chair, and took the child in her arms. They had sat just so, in the very same position, twenty minutes before; but with what a difference! She wanted to say something to Daisy—to comfort her—to quiet her. But she could not speak. Her brain was in a whirl; her tongue would not do her bidding.

Clearer thoughts came to her at last, and she knew that something must be done. She must call some one. So she took Daisy and went downstairs.

They were very kind—the people in the house; and the boarders did everything that could be done. They were extremely sorry for the two young sisters, so suddenly and so terribly bereaved. But they could not understand Rose. She was so quiet. If she had really loved her mother very much, how could she bear it so?

They did not know that, underlying all the sense of loss and bereavement, all the pain of parting, all the shrinking from the yet unmeasured loneliness, there was a sense of rest, of relief. Rose had so dreaded long years of poverty, of a hard, narrow, scrimped life for her mother. She and Daisy could bear anything. They were young. They were strong. But, ah! the poor, frail mother! how could she ever endure what might be in store for her?

And now God had taken care of it all! He had taken her swiftly, painlessly, without even a moment of doubt or dread, into the arms of His own infinite love. Rose felt as if there was nothing left to fear. It was so much easier to yield her mother up to Him, than to see her live a life of unaccustomed toil and privation.

I think little Daisy felt something of all this, young as she was. Children have more far-sight, as well as more insight, than we give them credit for. At any rate, she had Rose left; and Rose was her strong tower.

Just before the hour for the funeral, they two went into the room where their mother lay, for the last, long, lingering look.

Her face was supremely beautiful in its calm repose. Something of fretfulness, something of ignoble discontent, had marred it during these later days. But that had all passed now, and her daughters saw her with her youth restored, and the scars and stains of her forty years effaced forever. There was no pettiness in the uplifting of the placid brow; no disquiet in the curve of the marble lips. All was grand, fair, and noble. The proudest of her proud race might have been glad to claim kindred with her in that hour.

"You will never grow old, mother dear!" whispered Rose, as she stooped over her to arrange one long, golden-brown curl that fell upon the pillow. "I am glad of that!"

When all was over, Rose was ill for a week. Then she got up, to look about her, and to see what was to be done.

She wanted a home—a little home for her and Daisy. She was tired of great boarding-houses, where people just stayed. She wanted to begin to live. But her landlady was not anxious to lose boarders who paid promptly every Saturday night; and the other people happened to be strangers and pilgrims like herself. Perhaps Mr. Stuart might be able to assist her.

But, dear me! that gentleman's ideas were altogether too magnificent. He suggested nothing that was not beyond her means. Then she went to Mrs. Morrison, who was still waiting patiently for the orange-blossoms and forget-me-nots. Could it be possible it was not yet a fortnight, since she had taken the order with such happy thankfulness?

Mrs. Morrison considered for a minute, with her finger on her lip.

"Marthy," she said at length, "don't you suppose your Aunt Jane could spare the linter to her house, out on the Doncaster Road?"

"Shouldn't wonder," said Martha. "It wouldn't do any harm to ask her."

"The—what?" asked Rose, timidly.

"'Linter,' I said," laughed Mrs. Morrison. "A lean-to, or sort of wing to the cottage. I guess you ain't used to Yankees. It's a real pretty place, and Aunt Jane's a nice old lady. There's three rooms and a pantry. It's just out of the city, but the horse cars run right by the door. I'll go out with you this afternoon, if you've a mind to try it."

"Oh, thank you! thank you!" cried Rose; a very blush rose for delight. "I'll go and get Daisy, and be back in half an hour."

"It'll be the very place for them, if Aunt Jane will let them have it," said Mrs. Morrison, confidentially, to Martha, as the latter brought her bonnet. "I would not like to think of them, living all by themselves, the poor young things! Aunt Jane is as good as gold, if you only get on the right side of her."

Which they did. In two days more they were at the cottage, waiting for the drayman to bring their trunks.

Aunt Jane was—as Mrs. Morrison had informed Rose—a "widow woman" of sixty-five, or thereabouts. Her two sons were seafaring men; and during their frequent voyages, which were not always short ones, the house was only too quiet. She was glad to rent the "linter" to the motherless children, in whom a whispered word or two from Mrs. Morrison interested her at once.

"Take your things right off now, and make yourselves at home," she said, bustling about in hospitable fashion. "I've had your part all cleaned, nice as a new pin, and when the man comes I'll help you get settled. But you must stay with me to-night. What was you calculating to do about furniture? Hain't got much, I suppose?"

"None at all," answered Rose. "Ah! here come the trunks!"

"One—two—three—four—five—six—seven!" counted Aunt Jane. "My! but there's a lot of them! Good-sized ones, too."

"We furnished our own rooms for awhile, in Paris," said Rose, smiling. "And our bedding and linen is packed in one of the largest trunks. There is a little silver, too—not much; but all Daisy and I will need. I did not want to do anything about furniture until we saw just what was necessary."

They were busy unstrapping the trunks—most of which had never been unlocked since they left Paris. Memories crowded upon Rose thick and fast, but she put them resolutely back.

"Here's the key to this one; they're all numbered. Mayn't I open it, Rose?" cried Daisy. "I'll be ever so careful."

"Yes. But don't meddle too much. I think your wax dolly is in there. Lift the things carefully."

"Oh! oh! oh!" piped the clear little voice ecstatically, a few moments after.

"What is it, pussy? Have you found Natalie?"

"No. I don't believe she's here. But here's the little china tête-à-tête set, somebody gave mamma one Christmas—don't you remember? It never was used in the world, but it is so pretty! Wouldn't it just do for you and me, Rosy? Come and take it out, quick! I'm afraid I shall break the handles off, or something!"

"Your sister is busy. Let me do it," said Aunt Jane, who had a fondness for pretty things herself, and yet was not without her due share of curiosity. She had seen already that the seven large trunks held much that, to her eyes, seemed rich and rare; and with the thrift and frugality of a true New-England woman, she wondered how people who were poor, and had to work for a living, happened to have so much "finery."

"Guess their mother wa'n't much of a manager," she thought to herself. "But, poor things, they're not to blame for that, and it will only make it all the harder for 'em."

The little tea-set, looking dainty and Frenchy enough, with its delicate black etchings on a pearl-white ground, and its two or three narrow bands of gold, stood, presently, on Aunt Jane's round, claw-footed table, without break or blemish.

"It's just lovely!" Daisy declared, folding her hands with a little sigh of content.

Rose was passing from trunk to trunk, lifting up corners of things here and there.

"What are you looking for?" asked Daisy.

"Why don't you take everything right out?"

"I am trying to find out what there is here. It is so long since these trunks were packed, Daisy! Some of them many months ago. When we know what we have, we shall know what we have still to get."

"Seems to me," said Aunt Jane, drily, "you've got pretty much everything—except what you really need. To be sure, there's piles of that linen, enough to last for years. But it's most too fine to use every day. And it's just so with that beautiful chiny."

"Oh, we'll take good care of it—Daisy and I," said Rose, "and it's best to make the most of what we have, Aunt Jane. Some things we must buy, and some things we must do without, for the present. Now let's hold a council of war."

"The reason that these rooms in the linter ain't furnished," observed Aunt Jane, "is, that when my niece, Jane Mari, got married last fall, I let her have every living thing there was in 'em. And they hain't been used sence. But I tell you what, girls! There are lots and lots of old traps up garret; and if you can find any things there that you think can be furnished up, and made to look kind o' decent, you can use 'em and welcome. I'd as lief you'd have 'em as not."

They flew up the narrow stairs, fleet and eager-eyed. To make something out of nothing—that would be beautiful!

"Don't thank me till you've looked," said the old lady, in response to Rose's warmly-expressed gratitude and Daisy's kiss. "Maybe you won't find a thing you can use."

But Rose was quick to discern possibilities. Her eyes brightened. The girl was a real home-maker. She was in her element now.

"Why, we can do beautifully, Aunt Jane," she cried, "if we may use these things. Would you mind if the posts of this bedstead were sawed off, to make it a little lower, so that Daisy wouldn't need a ladder to climb into bed with?"

"Not a mite, dear!" laughed Aunt Jane. "Fix 'em just as you've a mind to. There's that old lounge. It's real shabby, but—"

"I can cover it," said Rose, "and this chair, too, and here's a table, and—"

Well, the result of it all was that before the week closed, the "linter" was as pretty and cosey a little home as one need care to see.

Do you care to know how it looked on the outside? It was a low, rambling brown house, toward which the city had been slowly creeping for years, until now it had nearly reached it. It stood well back from what had once been the road. Now it was the "street," with a plank sidewalk and tall lamp-posts. The "linter" ran out toward the south, with a narrow porch half hidden by a luxuriant hop-vine, running its whole length. Between it and the door-yard fence, lay Aunt Jane's flower garden, all aglow in these mid-summer days with marigolds, and phloxes, and great tiger-lilies, flaming with barbaric splendor. There were beds of verbenas, and portulacca, too, and a hedge of sweet peas that filled the air with their delicate fragrance.

The door from the shaded porch opens directly into the little parlor. That is a pity, Aunt Jane says; but it does not matter now, and in cold weather they must use her door. Shall we go in?

Ah! is it not pretty? But you would hardly believe how little it all cost. The walls happen, fortunately, to be a soft tint of gray; the gray that harmonizes equally well with pink or blue. In the middle of the floor there is about three yards square of gray carpet—ingrain, and pretty well worn at that; but you would hardly know it, so deftly has it been matched and put together. Around it there is a border of gray and blue, and a mat of the same lies before the open fire-place. The border Rose bought, as she did the chintz with which she has covered the lounge and a chair or two. It is striped, blue and white; and the white stripe is sprinkled with delicate pink rose-buds. There is only one window, and that has a lambrequin of the chintz, bordered with a little frill; and the full muslin curtain is made out of an old dress skirt.

On the square of carpet there is a little red pine table, with square, slender legs. The cover which falls nearly to the floor, however, hiding all its ugliness, is a gray travelling shawl with a blue border. There are books on the table, and a pretty work-basket, and an easel with a lovely Mater-Dolorosa; and in a slender glass vase there are sweet peas and mignonette. On the mantel there are a pair of graceful bronzes—and the gilded shrine with the miniature of the dainty beauty with the powdered hair. Over it hangs a small copy of the central figure in Murillo's "Assumption." There are two or three other pictures on the wall; but all are so small that they were brought across the sea in a trunk; and some brackets and other ornaments are scattered here and there.

Such a tiny place as the bed-room is, with a bit of straw matting on the floor, and the little white bed in the corner! And the kitchen is hardly larger.

"But it is larger than Marie's," said Daisy, with a satisfied air. "And she had only two rooms, while we have three."

"Besides a pantry!" added Rose. "Marie would think us very aristocratic, Daisy. And there's the clothespress up-stairs that Aunt Jane lets us use—"

"And the cupboard!" cried Daisy. "That's best of all; for we couldn't put our beautiful china right into the pantry, along with all our cooking-dishes and things—could we Rose?"

Rose laughed. Daisy's "all" sounded very magnificent.

Was there no thought given to the poor mother during all these days? There was not an hour in which Rose did not think of her. But she must take care of Daisy now, and she had no time for the mere luxury of woe. Yet in the minutest ordering of the life that was to be, she remembered Mrs. Sterling's fastidious tastes, her delicate fancies, and tried to defer to them. Just as far as it was possible, the home she made for herself and Daisy should be such as would have pleased her mother. Even if she could have bought more, she would have used the fragile china and the fine linen, because to Mrs. Sterling an elegantly appointed table seemed a requisite of refined ladyhood.

Do you ask why they did not go back to Charleston? Because not one of their kindred was left. Rose felt, as her mother had felt before her, that if she must begin life on a new footing, she would rather do it among strangers.

CHAPTER XX.

THE life on a new footing had fairly begun now; a strange, quiet, circumscribed life for Rose Sterling, when one considered what her antecedents had been, but by no means a hard or unhappy one. I do not know that I am sorry it was necessary for her to do something to help support herself and Daisy; because earnest, regular work, with some positive end in view, is without doubt necessary to the entire physical and spiritual health of all human beings. The race will be better and happier when women, as well as men, fully realize this. But I am glad—are not you?—that the child, in her sweet, dainty girlhood, was able to find work that was as fresh and dainty as herself—work that she could do in the cloister-like seclusion of her own home. "Let women be ship-carpenters if they will," said the clarion voice of Margaret Fuller, speaking brave, strong words for the disenthralment of her sex from the servitude of custom. But for my part I cannot help being just a little bit glad, after all, that they won't—many of them! There is plenty of womanly work that has been waiting through all the centuries—waiting for women to take hold of it; work that shall make the world happier and better, and altogether a more comfortable place to be in, when the waiting, empty hands shall find it.

Not making artificial flowers. Do not understand me to say that our little Rose was conscious of having any "mission" whatever. She had need to earn money, to make life easy and pleasant for herself and for Daisy, and in order to give to the latter some of the advantages she had herself enjoyed in more prosperous days; and she was glad, as I doubt not you and I are, that she could earn it in so pleasant a way. She had no grand ideas about human progress, or the advancement of the race. But she wanted to make her flowers just as perfect as they could be made. And is it not something to put one's own thought of beauty, or grace, or delicacy, even into a muslin rose, or a spray of velvet verdure?

There was always money in the little purse, beyond what was actually needed for the day's necessities. And by degrees, one fair lady after another learned that there was a young girl out on the Doncaster Road, who made such lovely flowers—"just exquisite, you know—like the real French, only better than most we see in this country." One by one they sought her out when some sudden emergency arose, bringing with it the need of some peculiar tint or hue, and they always went away puzzled. More than one who entered the little parlor with a gracious, patronizing air, left it in a maze of wonder. This Miss Sterling was not to be patronized, or condescended to. Who could she be? and what brought her here?

Doubtless, the bronzes and the rare pictures, as well as Rose's pretty French dresses, and two or three bits of choice, but unobtrusive, jewelry that she habitually wore, had something to do with this. Her wardrobe had been well supplied, for Mrs. Sterling had always had her own way in that matter; and that lady never bought anything that was not of the best. The two girls wore now, what they had worn in Paris. They had not put on black garments—a fact which had cost Rose something of a struggle.

"But we cannot afford, Daisy," she said, with a sigh, "to throw aside all we have, and buy such mourning as mother would wish us to wear, if we wore any. Shabby black was an abomination in her eyes. We will go on wearing the very things she chose for us, and love her and think of her all the same. That is the best way, I am sure."

To all of which Daisy loyally assented. She went to school now—going in the horse-cars every morning with her little lunch-basket. They passed directly by the door; and duly as quarter to nine came, whoever was in the cars saw two young girls waiting in the little porch under the delicate, lightly-tossing wreaths of the hop-vine. They were singularly contrasted. One—the elder—had hair of reddish gold, that, guiltless of crimping-pins, rolled back from her pure white forehead in a profusion of tiny waves, and was gathered at the back of the small, well-shaped head in one heavy coil. Her eyes were very dark, almost black, large and liquid. Her cheek was pale when she was in repose, but the slightest emotion made the swift color come and go, like the changes of a summer cloud.

The younger had a round, pliant little figure; hair as black as night, which was tied back, usually with a blue riband, and fell below her waist; eyes that, it seemed, should have belonged to her sister; for they were as purely blue and bright as any sapphires, while her complexion was almost that of a brunette. Yet she was a pretty child—as light-hearted and joyous as a bird, with something piquant and striking in the very poise of her head. One who looked at her once, was quite sure to look again.

Every morning, as I said, the two waited in the porch for the cars to come along; and then Rose went down to the gate with Daisy, watched her as she got on board, and nodded a smiling good-bye to her. It was an attractive picture; the vine-covered porch; the door open, perhaps, into the little blue and gray room behind it; the gay flower-garden, bright with autumnal blooms; the slight, graceful maiden with the shining hair, and the pretty child with her smiling face and breezy, piquant freshness. Regular passengers began to look out for it in a quiet, indifferent sort of way; and to be disappointed—some of them—if they failed to see it.

Regular passengers began to watch for this picture so unconsciously made by the two sisters, who, without a thought of others' observation, were simply going about their daily business. So did some who were not "regulars." Roy knew very well which was the most desirable side of the car; and he never went to the city in the morning, without wondering if the little girl with the lunch-basket would appear—and if the young lady would come out to see her off.

"There's such a nice, beautiful boy in the car two or three times a week, Rosy," said Daisy one evening late in November. "Sometimes he is going up, and sometimes coming down; but he always sits on this side. You can see him, if you look."

"Is there?" asked Rose, lifting her eyebrows a little as she bent her wires. "I hope you don't talk to him, Daisy. You know what mother always taught us; and you are such a little girl, that I shall be worried about you if you have anything to do with strangers—especially with beautiful boys," she added, with a grave, unsmiling mouth, but a sudden gleam of fun in her dark eyes.

"I'm 'most twelve years old," said Daisy, tossing back her hair. "There! I've learned my lesson. Let me fix the wires while you do something else—oh! I don't talk to him, Rosy-posy, nor he to me. Only—once—the other day—I forgot to tell you—it rained when I got off at Lee Street, and he held his umbrella over me. Since then he lifts his hat every time he sees me, and of course I bow to him. He almost always goes down Friday morning, and if you look to-morrow I think you'll see him."

"Well, I'll look, if you think it would be a pleasure to me," answered Rose, her eyes and thoughts intent upon the lilies of the valley she was making. "I want you to be polite and civil to all, Dot. But you must be quiet, and let strangers alone. Will you remember?"

"Yes. But I don't feel as if he was quite a stranger, when he was so kind the other day. You'd think he was nice yourself, Rosy, if he should hold his umbrella over your head, and save your new hat!"

Rose smiled, and changed the subject. It seemed to be growing unprofitable.

"He was in the car this morning," cried Daisy, the next afternoon, as she came in fresh and jubilant. "Did you see him, Rosy?"

"No, I did not see any boy."

"Why, you must be blind as a bat! He sat right on this side. I don't see how you could help seeing him."

"Neither do I. But I did not. Now lay the table, Dot, and we'll have dinner. I have made one of Marie's nice little soups; and Aunt Jane put her head in at the door to tell me to prepare nothing else, for she was keeping something hot for you in her oven. Suppose you were to go and see what it is?"

Away Daisy darted, and presently returned with a roasted chicken on a little white platter.

"Aunt Jane is so kind. See here, Rose! Doesn't it smell deliciously? Seems to me everybody is good to us. That boy left the car before I did this morning, and as he passed out, he smiled at me and dropped this in my lap. It got all faded, and I put it in my pocket;" and from the depths she drew out a crushed and withered tube-rose, with a circle of blue violets and some geranium leaves.

"It is very fragrant yet," said Rose, quietly, but with a slight look of uneasiness about her eyes. She did not wish to put fancies into Daisy's head, nor to startle her into awkward self-consciousness. Yet in her heart of hearts, she wished "that boy," of whose very name she was ignorant, would be a little less attentive. She felt so young herself, to be the guide and protector of this little sister! She determined to keep watch, however, and catch a glimpse of his face if she could. She could judge somewhat from that, as to what manner of "boy" he might be.

But several weeks passed, during which she heard nothing more about him. He seemed to have slipped from Daisy's mind, if not from her sight; until one night the child suddenly declared that "that boy" must have gone away, for she had not seen him in the cars for ever and ever so long. Whereat Rose inwardly rejoiced.

One bright, cold morning in December, Rose stood by the glowing fire in their little parlor, tying a crimson scarf about Daisy's throat.

"You must wrap up well to-day, Dot, for it's bitter cold," she said. "There comes the car. Here is your muff, and your basket. And don't forget to go into Mrs. Morrison's, and get the box of flowers for me. It will save me a journey, and I'm very busy just now."

"I know it, Rosy! you work all the time. I wish—"

"Never mind, dearie! Hurry now, or you'll be too late."

They kissed each other, and Rose stood at the window to watch the child as she made her little signal, and the car stopped. The porch was too cold now.

Then she went back to the fire, and stood for many minutes gazing into the flames, and—thinking. It was as Daisy had said. She worked all the time; and yet the overplus in the little purse grew each week smaller and smaller. Winter had brought additional expenses of its own; and it had been necessary to buy some warmer clothing. French wrappings were not heavy enough for a New-England winter, and the pretty undergarments had proved altogether too light. And as the days and years went on, matters would grow worse rather than better. Clothes would not last forever; and as Daisy grew older, it would cost them more to live.

She put her hand to her forehead with a weary sigh, and for almost the first time, a shade of despondency stole over the sweet young face. How long could she live this kind of life, and not be dwarfed by it? She had no time for reading; she saw no society; she was forgetting all her music, to which she had given much attention in the old, careless days; and even if she had the leisure she could not practice, for want of a piano. She painted in water colors, and her brush was a delight to her. But she had hardly touched it since she came back to America. She was losing her hold upon everything, she thought, sadly, and how would it be with Daisy? Could she give her nothing but the commonest sort of an education?

"I must try something else," she said to herself, at last, as she went back to her work. "Flower-making, like literature, is 'a good staff, but a poor crutch.' My hard and steady work ought to bring me more money—and it shall! I feel as if I were turning into an artificial flower myself—soul and body."

The bright morning was soon merged in a cloudy noon; and long before it was time for Daisy to come home, Rose was looking anxiously out into a whirling, driving, furious snow-storm.

"I am so sorry I told her to go to Mrs. Morrison's," she exclaimed—to Miss Sterling, of course; for who else was there to speak to? And the poor child could not be expected to hold her tongue all day long, could she? And Miss Sterling replied: "Yes; it is a great pity; she will have enough to do to manage herself and her muff and her basket, even without the addition of a stiff, square, paste-board box, that must not be crushed, or maltreated!"

But it could not be helped now. The short December day grew dark, and the storm grew wilder every moment. Rose stirred the fire, sending a shower of sparks up the chimney, and then took her station at the window.

Meanwhile Daisy had been to Mrs. Morrison's after the box; and laden with that, her books, her muff, and her basket, was waiting at the Lee-Street crossing, under the shelter of an open porch, for the up car. Presently she saw it coming, and rushed out. But in the blinding storm the driver neither saw nor heard her. The car rolled on, and the bewildered child looked to the right and left for succor, and found none.

It was very hard to keep the tears back. What should she do? It would be a full hour before the next car would go up; and she remembered having heard a man who was passing say that they would take the horses off early to-night, for the track was almost blocked up, and there would be no travel. What if this was the last car? How should she get home? And, oh! what would Rose say?

She crept back to her shelter again. It was growing darker and darker. Mrs. Morrison's? But that was half a mile away, and Daisy doubted if she had not closed the shop, and gone home. There would be no call for flowers on such a night. Suddenly she sprang forward with a glad cry.

"Oh!" came faintly through the storm, and reached the ear of a pedestrian well muffled in furs.

The young man turned round. What child was out in this tempest? A little figure stood motionless in the dark shadow of the porch, and burst into tears as he approached.

"Why, is it you?" he asked, stooping down and taking the cold, trembling hands in his—for she had piled all her belongings on a bench beside her. "Did you miss the car, dear? So did I, and isn't it lucky? for I was just on my way to the livery-stable for a horse and sleigh, and I will take you home in a trice. Shall I leave you here just a minute? or will you go with me?"

And right then and there, with the fierce snow-flakes blinding her, and the wind roaring in her ears, Daisy, remembering all Rose's cautions, and thinking she saw a straight path out of all dilemmas, looked up, and said, between choking sobs: "If you—would—only—tell me what your name is, sir! Sister Rose says I must not talk to people I don't know. My name is Daisy Sterling!"

The young man laughed outright—for one instant. Then a grave tenderness stole into his voice; and, if it had not been for the snow-flakes, one might have seen a suspicious moisture in his eyes as he answered, lifting his cap for an instant as respectfully as if he had stood before a queen: "Your Sister Rose is quite right. My name is Royal Dilloway. If you will let me take you home, I will take as good care of you as if you were my own little sister."

It was all right now, and Daisy, brushing off the last remnant of a tear, thankfully signified her readiness to accept his escort.

The stable was just round the corner, and as the child did not like to be left alone, Roy hastily gathered up box, basket and books, and taking her hand, hurried her to a place of shelter.

"It seems to me, Miss Daisy," he said, as they rushed along, "that you carry a good deal of baggage for one small school-girl."

"Yes," she laughed. "It makes me think of the old woman's 'Great box, little box, bandbox and bundle.' But it is not all mine. I am carrying that great box for Rose. She—"

She stopped suddenly; probably with an instinctive feeling that her sister would not care to have her affairs discussed with this stranger. Roy wished she might have completed the sentence; but he was too much of a gentleman to make any attempt to draw her out.

Rose saw the car coming with a certain feeling of relief; and threw a shawl over her head that she might be ready to run out and open the gate for Daisy. She could scarcely believe her senses when it passed without stopping. Such a thing had never occurred before since Daisy began to go to school. The child had never failed to be on time. Had Mrs. Morrison kept her, fearing the roads would be blocked up? Or had she missed the car? And, if so, what would she do in this driving storm?

And—hardest question of all—how could she reach her or help her? Where was she at that moment?

She went into Aunt Jane's part of the house for a word of comfort or a timely suggestion. But none came. Aunt Jane was as helpless as herself. There was no man within reach who could be sent in pursuit of the laggard.

It grew darker and darker. Rose, standing at the window with a pale, anxious face, could but just see the dark outline of the garden fence a few inches above the drifts.

"I can't bear this," she said to Aunt Jane. "I must go out and do something, or find somebody. What if the child, missing the car, has started to walk home?"

Aunt Jane demurred seriously; but Rose began to put on her wrappings in nervous haste. She seemed to hear Daisy's voice in every moan of the wailing wind.

The old lady was looking out of the window even while she was trying to dissuade Rose from her mad undertaking. Suddenly she exclaimed: "Why—what upon air! Who in the world can be coming here in all this storm? I hope Jerusha's child ain't worse—but I shouldn't wonder one mite if they'd sent after me."

A sleigh had stopped at the gate. Some one had leaped out into a drift that came far above his knees. He bent over the sleigh and picked up a large bundle of—something.

"Why, I do verily believe!" exclaimed Aunt Jane again, hurrying back into her own part of the house. But what she believed no mortal ever knew; for Rose threw one swift glance out of the window, and rushed to the door, her face all aglow with sudden joy.

"Here I am, Rosy-posy, all safe and sound," cried a child's glad voice. "Were you frightened almost to death about me?"

Daisy, muffled from head to foot in the folds of a fur-lined cloak, had just been set down in the porch; and the gentleman to whom said garment belonged, was unfastening the clasp that confined it about her throat.

"There!" he said, shaking the snow from it as he threw it over his own shoulders. "Run in to the fire, quick, before you freeze to death!" And before Rose had gathered her senses together enough to enable her to speak, he had lifted his cap, bowed, regained the sleigh, seemingly in two bounds, and the eager horses were dashing onward through the snow.

"O Daisy, darling!" cried Rose, half-laughing, half-crying, as she closed the door, and drew her into the warm, bright room of which Roy had caught one swift glance as he stood there "out in the cold." "What was the matter? How did it happen?"

Daisy told her story rapidly, in her own nonchalant way, ending with: "If he hadn't come along just then, I don't know what I should have done, Rosy."

"He was very kind," said Rose; "and I was so bewildered that I did not even thank him."

"There!" cried Daisy, triumphantly, "I told you you would think he was nice, if you could only see him. Didn't I say he was a beautiful boy?"

"Say—what?" asked Rose fairly aghast with astonishment. "You surely don't mean that this—"

"Is that boy?" interrupted Daisy, as she complacently proceeded to warm her toes. "Why, yes, I do. I supposed you knew."

"O Daisy! Daisy! what a child you are! The person who brought you home to-night is not a boy. He is a young man—and a very gentlemanly one, too. What made you talk about him as if he were a little boy?"

"I didn't!" retorted Daisy, indignantly. "I did not say he was 'little'—nor a word about his size any way."

"Well—but—talking about 'that boy' all the time," said Rose, with an impatient emphasis on the unlucky words, "I thought he was about your age, or a little older. I did not suppose you were talking about a man. I think you might have known better, Daisy!"

"How was I to tell?" asked the child, with an injured air. "How is anybody expected to know when boys leave off being boys, and begin to be men? Girls put on long dresses and do up their hair—and then they're young ladies; but boys—they dress just like men from the beginning. I couldn't tell!" and the indignant little speaker vented her mortification in a fierce thrust of the poker into the bed of glowing coals.

"Well," said Rose, severely, "I think if I were speaking of a person nearly six feet high, and well proportioned, who wore a moustache, and carried himself like a prince, I should call him a man, and not a boy. But, O Daisy, how foolish we are to quarrel about this! Come and get your supper, darling. It is all ready."

MEN in the vigor of their health and age should endeavor to fill their lives with reading, with travel, with the best conversation and the worthiest of actions, either in public or private stations, that they may have something agreeable left, in the way of pleasant and grateful remembrances, to feed on when they are old.

THE STORY OF RENNY.

BY G. DE B.

HE was such a mite of a fellow, scarcely came up to my waist when he stood on tip-toe. I saw him first in the horse-car. He sat opposite me, and I was attracted by his tiny size. He had on a dark blue cloth suit with black velvet leggings, a little felt hat with a long feather, and round his neck he wore a wide watered ribbon on which hung a little silver hunting-horn.

As soon as I saw him I thought, "He has just stepped off a fairy opera stage, and he is playing Rigoletto," for he was not little because he was a baby, but from accident, and, like Rigoletto, he had a large hump on his little back that made my heart heavy to look at.

At last he seemed to notice my evident look of curiosity, and his face flushed as he turned away. I was pained to think I had unintentionally wounded his feelings, and therefore changed my seat and went over beside him.

"Will you let me see that pretty little horn?" I asked, as a sort of explanation for my curious gaze.

Without answering, he unfastened the little toy and handed it to me.

"Is it to call anything with?" I continued. "Boys sometimes have pet dogs that answer to a whistle—is yours a dog?"

He still made me no reply, when the lady who was with him leaned over and said to me: "Renny will not speak to strangers—the whistle is to summon his nurse."

I fastened back the little horn upon its ribbon and whispered to him lowly as I secured it: "I wish Renny would speak to me. I like little boys, and I can tell stories!"

He looked up in my face then. His eyes were brown and beautiful, with only a little gleam of temper in them to mar their loveliness.

"What kind o' stories?" he asked, in a deep, low bass—if any one can imagine such a kind of a voice in a mite of a boy.

"Any kind—what kind do you like?" I answered, pleased to receive a reply.

"I like wicked ones—where all the big, strong boys are beaten and pounded, and the little girls pinched and hurt." And the brown eyes looked wicked enough to mean it!

"Oh, dear, I am so sorry," I replied. "I thought, maybe, you would like some about little boys with big hearts, boys who do great deeds, although they may have little means of doing, and do them in little ways."

His eyes flashed. "There never was any such kind!"

"Oh, yes, Renny, I know some—you see, if the heart and the soul are noble and great, it don't matter how small the body is."

He seemed to ponder over my words, then asked, abruptly: "Do you like little fellows?"

"Oh, yes, indeed; I love all boys, little ones and big ones, and I like to tell them stories."

"Will you come to my house and tell me one, then, 'bout some little fellow?"

"I will; where do you live?" I answered, gladly.

He whispered to the lady beside him, and she immediately handed me a card, saying, with a smile: "You have accomplished a wonderful thing, although you may not know it—Renny never speaks to a stranger, and he has asked me to give you his mother's card. I am sure both Mr. and Mrs. Moulton will be happy to see any one toward whom Renny appears so friendly," and she handed me the card and address.

I thanked her, and left the car, telling Renny I would surely see him in a few days.

According to my promise, not long after, I called at the address, which I found to be a large, handsome residence on — Street. Upon asking for Mrs. Moulton, I was shown into an elegantly-furnished reception-room, where I stated the reason for my peculiar call to a very beautiful and fashionably-dressed lady.

"Yes," she said, "Renny had spoken of the strange lady he met in the car," she was very happy to see me, and hoped I would have no trouble with the child. He was such a strange child—horrid temper—perfectly fearful at times—she really did not know what would become of him—I was very kind, indeed, to come and tell him stories, and she was sure Mr. Moulton would be very grateful to any one who would amuse or interest Renny.

I asked her where I should find her little boy, and was shown up-stairs into a large sitting-room, or nursery, where a fearful racket appeared to be going on. I knocked, but receiving no answer, entered, and beheld Renny in a perfect fury of rage, throwing down chairs, dancing up and down, pounding on the table with his little fists, and looking the incarnation of wicked temper. Two little girls stood at some little distance, white with fear, and the nurse was barricaded behind a chair, afraid as well. When Renny looked up and saw me in the door, he ceased his tantrums, and looked a trifle disconcerted—not ashamed, however—for there was a bravado of temper still in the rear.

"Well, Renny," said I, pleasantly, "what shall my first story be about?" and without appearing to notice the commotion I had interrupted, I walked over, picked up a chair and seated myself. The nurse took this opportunity to make her escape with her little charges.

"'Bout devils!" answered Renny, in his deep tones, and looking at me defiantly with his flashing eyes.

"Well, come over here beside me, and I will tell you one." He walked slowly up to the lounge near by and threw himself down, looking at me curiously now. I began: "I will tell you about a horrid little demon, Renny, who goes prowling round the whole wide world. He is of different colors. Scarlet, and crimson, and white. He carries a loom with him with which he weaves webs. He is a sly little demon, and watches his chances for fresh new spots whereon to set up his loom, and he always picks out little tender places on which to start the weaving of his web. At first he spins a slender thread, then, if he be not checked, he makes the little thread to grow larger and it becomes a cord, and stronger and it becomes a rope, and stouter still and it forms a chain which it is impossible to break or hold in check, but which will, instead, grasp in its strong bands the victim, and hold him slave and prisoner, and oftentimes, O Renny, this strong, stout chain will lead the victim to some murderous act, and then the little thread which, unchecked, has grown so strong, will be the rope which hangs!"

Renny listened attentively with open eyes, then he asked, in a husky tone: "Did you ever see this devil?"

"Yes, Renny, I have seen him."

"He is different colored?"

"Yes; he is scarlet in rage and fury, he is criminal in ungovernable impatience, and he is deadly white in relentless, unforgiving, wicked Temper!"

"Can any one break through the web?"

"At first, when he weaves, the thread is light and fine, and it is possible to let him weave it no stronger, and even if it becomes a cord or rope, it need but hold together firmly weak places—it is only when the cord becomes a chain and unmanageable, that the little demon becomes master and leads one wicked ways. O Renny, Temper is a good soldier, under the generalship of Control, but when it breaks ranks, it rushes madly on, and leads through many a weary path to oftentimes a bitter goal!"

Renny was thoughtful for a few minutes, then he asked, looking up, earnestly: "How's a fellow going to begin to break their temper?"

"You need not break it, dear—only hold it in check; have a masterful control over it. Think how foolish and little it is for a man—you will be a man some day, you know—to lose all dignity and force of character by some fiery exhibition of temper. Why the Indians, though they be savages, never display ungovernable temper—and how we admire and respect the grave stoical demeanor and carriage of the "red man of the forest."

"Do you think I will ever grow to be a man?" and the brown eyes looked up at me wistfully.

"I hope so, Renny, and a great and good one, too. I think you have a good foundation upon which to build a fine character—and, therefore, you must to cultivate the best in you, and control the worst."

He stood up now and cried, half-bitterly, half-pathetically: "I, a great man! with this hump! Pahaw—what's the use o' trying?"

"There is always 'use,' Renny, in trying to be good. When I come to see you again, I will tell you of some men who have carried great minds and noble hearts in as frail and tender bodies as yours—and, Renny, remember, besides, there is always something to be glad of and thankful for. The blind people can hear, the dumb ones can see, and the crippled and lame may have both sight and hearing to be grateful for. Be thankful and content with the mercies you have, and though you may be little and frail, let your goodness grow large, and strive to be great in your mental and moral stature.

The little frail body threw itself down now, in a passion of tears, on the lounge.

"Why, Renny—don't, dear!" I cried, bending over him, and pained to see his uncontrollable emotion. "Think over all I have said; try to hold the little demon I have told you about in subjection; strive to be strong in your many good qualities, and I am sure you will be both good and great when a man."

He would not look up nor answer me, but lay there, with great sobs convulsing the little frame. I kissed the brown head of soft curls good-bye, and whispering I would soon come again, left him.

Upon making my next call, I was received by Mr. Moulton, who I found to be a grave, kindly-cold gentleman. He thanked me for the interest I had shown in his boy, who, though rarely speaking to strangers, had displayed a warm liking for me.

"He is a very peculiar child," said Mr. Moulton, "and one whom no one appears to quite understand. His mother died when he was but a baby, and until within the last few years he has had none but nurses to see to him. Mrs. Moulton is very much attached to him, of course, but her own little girls require the most of her attention, and as Renny is not fond of little girls, and will have no boy playmates—they are so 'rough and strong,' he says—he is consequently left very much to himself. He is my only son. He is very dear to me—and, madam, I thank you most heartily for the warm, kind interest you have shown for my poor boy."

I read it all. Poor Renny! He was a little waif even in the midst of this large, luxurious home. All the best in him was being dwarfed and crippled by the selfishness with which his little life had come in contact, since his mother died! His worst passions were constantly aroused. He was envious and jealous of those little girls—his sisters—who had come, he thought, to usurp his place in his father's heart, as their mother had his own dear mother. He saw other boys strong and stout of limb, who would bravely fight their way outside, while he was obliged to sit at home and brood over his sorrows and his wrongs. Poor little mite! How my heart ached for him—for I could see there was some right on his side. Then I determined I would comfort and cheer him, if I could. I would strive to bring out his best, and destroy his worst. I would try to show him to be good was to be happy; and if, perchance, any little seed I might drop should sprout and grow upward, I should feel I had obeyed the will of Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye do it unto one of the least of these, ye do it unto me also."

Renny was waiting for me in the large room where I had found him before. He was alone, and his face brightened with a smile when he saw me, and he came gladly forward to relieve me of my furs and wrappings.

"What are you reading, to-day?" I asked, picking up the volume that had fallen from his lap as he rose. "Æsop's Fable's," I read. "Why, Renny, this is one of the very men I was going to tell you about to-day."

"Is it—what did he do?" asked Renny, eagerly.

"He wrote all these beautiful stories, each one with a fine moral, teaching us patience, humility and virtue, and also showing us the many little weaknesses to which all human nature is prone. It is a philosophic work as well as an entertaining one; and, Renny, although this man had a great mind—he was—little—like you.”

“Like me!”

“Yes, so we are told; and he was a slave beside, and cruelly treated by a hard master. But, though he was a slave, he had the master mind, and he has left behind him, in his works, a name, while that of his owner is forgotten! There have been more men than he, Renny,” continued I, waxing warm, as I saw the interest that lighted up his pale face. “Men who have been small of stature, but large of heart and mind and spirit. The poet Pope was one of these. His genius was great, though the lamp that held the fire was small and misshapen. And there was a great artist, too, who, without arms or hands, has painted himself a great name in grand pictures. And Richard III. of England, you know, was little, but he was brave of spirit. And even St. Paul, we have reason to believe, had some physical defect, for you know he speaks of the “thorn in the flesh” with which he suffered; and see, Renny, what a life his was. And there have been men and women in the lower ranks who have carried a burden on their backs, while their hearts and their lives have been noble and large with the good in them.”

“But I can’t ever do any of these; I can’t ever be great!” cried Renny, and the voice was tremulous.

“Ah, Renny, who knows but you may. Try, at least; and if you cannot be great, you can be good, that is within any one’s power.”

“Who cares if I am?”

“Who cares? Why every one will who knows you—your papa, whose only son you are, you know; your mamma, your little sisters, and I. Don’t you want that I should care a little, Renny?”

He did not answer me. Then he looked up, with a little gleam in his eyes, and replied: “My papa likes little girls best, and my mamma is in Heaven!”

“Your papa loves all of his children, Renny,” answered I; “but I think his only son is very dear to him; and your mamma in Heaven, I think, will be happier even there, to know her little boy is trying to be good, so as he may come to her there some day.”

The nurse just then came in with the two little girls of whom Renny appeared so jealous. He looked disturbed and angry at their intrusion.

“Will you tell me the names of your little sisters?” I asked.

“No,” he replied, curtly, and walked away from my side.

I put my things on quietly, and, after kissing the little ones, who looked at me curiously, I turned to Renny, who stood with his back toward me, in the bay window.

“Good-bye, Renny; when shall I come again?” I said, putting out my hand.

He made no answer, but appeared to be struggling with the little crimson demon.

I stooped down, asking: “Won’t you kiss me good-bye?”

Then he looked up, and answered my first question in a defiant sort of tone: “Their names are Bessie and Katie; they are ‘good’ children; everybody likes them best; and I s’pose you will, too!”

“No, Renny, not best—if you try to be good, too,” I whispered, as I bade him good-bye again.

I soon grew to look forward with great pleasure to my little weekly visits to Renny, and he welcomed me always with a bright, happy smile. He was an intelligent, apt scholar, and a very bright boy; but I discovered had, evidently, before my acquaintance met with no one who took any interest in him, save as a deformed, ugly boy; consequently he was fast becoming no more. The best in us all needs a help and a recognition that shall keep us high, the base and worst in us is so apt to triumph otherwise.

Renny’s father loved him, but he did not know him; his mother dressed him beautifully, and kept him warm and well fed; but the heart of the child was hidden from both.

I was glad to see him improve under the little sermons I preached him, always with a different text that should interest and amuse; but I strove to make every sermon illustrate the text that to be good was to be great, and that little men could be noble men!

One of the first proofs that my influence was at work, was the disappearance of the little silver horn from off Renny’s neck. I had missed it for some time before I spoke; then one day I said, laughingly: “And, oh, where is your horn, my Little Boy Blue?”

He flushed, and answered me: “I have lain it away with some bad habits. I speak and call to the servants now when I want them.”

“O Renny,” I cried, “that is good—that is noble! See, you are growing great already; even a little thing tells; it is as though some harsh master had thrown aside his haughty, cruel, overbearing manner, and decided to be a generous, kind man to those beneath him.”

He smiled with pleasure at my warm praise—praise is so sweet; and merited praise is always just!

“And, Renny,” continued I, “will you give me the little horn? It was that which first attracted me toward you; it was that which opened our acquaintance; and it is that which has opened your eyes to one of your bad habits, at least. Let me have it for a souvenir?”

He brought it to me; and then for the first time in all our long acquaintance he lifted up his lips and kissed me of his own accord! It was the sign and the seal of our friendship. And though Renny is a man now—a good one in his character, a great one in his noble, generous deeds—I still wear the little silver horn he gave me as a trophy over which I may feel justly proud, for Renny’s papa says I made his “bad boy a good man,” and Mrs. Moulton says I “tamed a savage.”

The story of Renny is the story of many another child who may be even now spoiling an otherwise fine character by the bad passions of envy and jealousy and also by the uncontrol of that little demon, Temper, who goes prowling around for a spot to weave his webs in little children's natures. Let each one recollect, then, that the little, slender thread may be held in check, but that the chain can never be broken, but may lead to prison cells and gallows! And may every little one remember, too, that however plain, or homely, or disfigured he may be, that the light of a fine, noble character within may illuminate and make lovely and beautiful, or a talent applied or a genius nurtured transform into great and famous!

DEBORAH NORMAN;* HER WORK AND HER REWARD.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER IV.

IT was not to make alterations in her dress that Deborah Norman had gone to her room, but to gain time in which to compose and fortify herself for a meeting that she would have gladly avoided. After closing the door of her chamber, she knelt and remained in silent prayer for over the space of a minute. On rising, her lips had a firmer set, and her eyes were calmer and deeper. There was no sign of weakness or irresolution in her face or manner. She was resting in God and on her convictions of right and duty. Many times had her heart sunk in her bosom as she thought of this lion, which, sooner or later, she knew would stand in her way. But now that the encounter was at hand, courage and strength had been given and she was not afraid.

"Philip," she said in a calm voice as she entered the little parlor where the visitor had been restlessly awaiting her. He caught her hand with a nervous pressure; but she let hers lie passive, and this for but a moment or two ere it was withdrawn from his clasp.

The person who stood, flushed and agitated, before Deborah was a handsome young man somewhere between twenty-five and thirty years of age. Strength and self-reliance were in his face, but his mouth had some hard and sinister lines that marred the excellence of a countenance in which you saw much to attract, and something to repel.

"Philip! And is that all? Only Philip!" The young man caught back the hand she had withdrawn, and looked down into her face with eyes full of a tender passion.

But she gently disengaged it again, and stood quiet and irresponsible.

"Deborah! What does this mean?" There came a glow into the man's dark eyes, and a thrill of anger into his voice.

"It means, Philip," she answered, not losing a chord in the even tones of her voice, "just what I told thee at our last meeting. Our feet are set in different ways; how then can we walk together?"

"Fickle—changeable—false! Must I say this of Deborah Norman?" exclaimed the young man in momentary loss of self-control.

The small head was drawn quickly back; the soft lips shut tightly and marred by an expression of pain; the eyes set wide open and flashing. But this was for only the briefest interval of time. The flush and excitement died out as quickly as they had come, and left the face of Deborah very pale and calm.

"I thank thee for the words, Philip Cheston!" she said, "I can now talk to thee with the needed plainness. Sit down."

She spoke with a strength of will that gave power to her words. The young man sunk into a chair.

"Not so, Philip," she continued keeping her steady eyes upon him. "I have not changed. As Philip Cheston was five years ago, I loved him. But the Philip Cheston of to-day is another man. His feet and mine are set in different ways, and we cannot walk together."

"A mere fancy, born of thy too ideal life, Deborah," replied the young man. "How have I changed? In what am I different from the Philip Cheston thee loved five years ago? I am older, more in earnest, and more thoroughly absorbed in my business, as every man who hopes for success in life should be; but in all else I am the same."

"Not so—thy ends and aspirations are not the same; and these make the man," replied Deborah. "I loved thee for what thee was inwardly and not for thy person alone, Philip. For the noble ends thee had; for the pure spirit that ruled thee; for the love of God and humanity that was in thy soul. And when I saw a shadow fall upon these, and thy heart turn to mean and sordid things, I felt as if night were closing about me. Then I knew that our ways must part, and that I should have to walk alone!"

"Mean and sordid! And this from thee! O Deborah! Deborah!" Cheston's manner was greatly disturbed.

"Look into thy heart, Philip, and answer to thyself and to God. Is it now as it was five years ago? Are thy ends the same? Is thy ideal of life what it then was? Art thou growing inwardly purer, nobler, less selfish, and more earnest in thy desire to serve humanity?"

"The dreams of that pleasant time were very sweet and pure, Deborah," Cheston replied, with some bitterness in his voice. "But in the earnest and absorbing work men have to do in the world if they would achieve success, such dreams are never realized. The real life we have to encounter, and the ideal life our fancies paint as we stand on the verge of manhood, are different altogether."

"There is only one true ideal of life," returned Deborah, "and that is to be found in the words of our Lord: 'As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them.'"

"A thing literally impossible," said the young man.

"O Philip! Philip! This from thee!" There was a quiver of pain in Deborah's voice. "I did not think thee had wandered so far away."

"Away from what?" The young man spoke with some irritation.

"From the path that leads heavenward."

A slight curve of the lips betrayed a feeling of contempt in the heart of Cheston.

* Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1875, by T. S. ARTHUR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

"There is only one way to Heaven, Philip," said Deborah, speaking with much seriousness, "and the gate of entrance is through neighborly love. It is a strait gate; and the way narrow; but it leadeth into life."

"Doubtless thee is right," answered Cheston, with a sudden change of manner, as if moved by some better impulse. "The world is a hard, selfish place, Deborah, in which every man must stand alone, and rise, if he rise at all, through his own unaided efforts."

"But, in rising, he need not hinder nor pull down another man, Philip. Nay, ought he not, rather, to help the weak, sometimes, trusting in God to make good any little loss that may seem to be occasioned thereby? The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof. He can set up whom He will—cause this to increase, and that to fail. Men make a very sad mistake when they leave God out of their calculations, as some do. They might as well ignore the law of gravitation, and jump from a tower, trusting for a safe descent. This was all very plain to thy mind once, Philip. I grieve to know thee has lost thy clearer vision."

"Where all men seek their own; where every man is for himself; what chance is there for one who tries to work by the golden rule?" he answered, fretfully.

"O Philip! Philip!" Once more there was a quiver of pain in Deborah's voice. "What chance for one who is just and merciful in his dealings with his fellow-men? For one who will not take the gains of wrong or oppression? For one who will not build at the cost of his neighbor?"

"A man need not cheat nor steal," said Cheston. "But he's got to take care of himself, and make the best of the chances that come in his way. If every man looked out for himself and made the most of his opportunities, we should have a different state of things in the world. Our neighbors would attend to their own affairs and not leave others to make good their defects."

The shadows that lay on Deborah's countenance deepened as Philip Cheston spoke. There was a sorrowful look in her eyes. The young man saw that he had not helped his case; yet was he unable to discern in what he had failed, so dull were his perceptions. Nothing was plainer to him than that men should be self-helpful, and not in any way dependent on their neighbors. He had a feeling of contempt for weaknesses and thriftlessness; and in his heart despised the poor—regarding all poverty as the outgrowth of vice or idleness. Nay, had he possessed the adequate degree of introspection, he would have seen that he despised or thought meanly of all men but himself. For him the sun shone, the rain fell and the earth gave its increase; and what of God's bounty he saw in the possession of other men seemed but robbery of himself.

Long ago, Deborah had looked deep enough into the mind of Philip Cheston to see its intensely selfish quality; but she had trusted in the power of higher and purer things to lift him out of its narrow and hardening influence, and had fondly imagined that she would be able to lead him to the paths wherein her own feet were set. Before she knew him thoroughly, she had loved him. He was her ideal man, and she invested him with all the perfections she saw in a true and Christ-like manhood. Her complete illusion did not last a very long time. That closer view which is obtained through the more intimate relations of an accepted lover, revealed elements of character which threw a shadow over the brightness of her life. Still, love was deep and strong; and its first impulse was an effort to lift him to the level of her ideal. For a time he seemed to be rising. For a time she was able to inspire him with a measure of her deep interest in humanity, and to draw him into some active work. But, almost from the first, she saw that he lacked heart in any noble cause.

A man's thoughts take shape from what he desires. It is out of the abundance of the heart that the mouth speaketh. And so, we need listen for but a little while to another's speech ere the drift of his ruling impulses is perceived. Deborah was, naturally, a close observer. Her insight was clear and deep. It was impossible for her to hold intimate relations with any one, without knowing something of the motive-power that impelled him.

For a time after the ungarded speech of Philip Cheston began to show the real things upon which he was setting his heart, Deborah sought to awaken in his mind nobler desires. At first he was irresponsible; but soon began treating with levity what to her was of deep and solemn interest. Argument and opposition followed; and in his fervor of speech, Cheston often betrayed an irreverent spirit that not only grieved her beyond measure, but put an intervening space between them, which widened day by day.

Early in life, Deborah had learned self-discipline. For truth, or what she believed to be the truth, she was loyal as a martyr, and could not have been turned from it though fire and faggot stood in her way. And they stood, really, in her way now. There is a fire into which, if we be not false to truth and duty, some of our dearest hopes and sweetest natural affections must be cast. It is a fire that consumes swiftly; but can no more touch the real human life than the common fire in which only the visible and mortal perish. Out of it the soul comes purified, and rises into regions of celestial peace.

It was not without a shudder of fear—not without anguish and shrinking—that Deborah Norman walked with steady feet to the stake where the love which had become almost a part of her life was to be burned to ashes. Not with any sudden resolution, nor in a moment of enthusiasm, was this done; but after years of waiting, and hoping, and effort to lead the man who had won her love back into the ways from which his feet had gone. When, at last, she saw that his life was becoming more and more lost in worldliness and self-seeking, and that an internal union between them was impossible, she accepted the issue and met the fiery ordeal.

But Philip Cheston was of another mind. His love for Deborah was that of an intensely selfish man who desires some precious and costly thing for the good he expects to gain. Not for the blessing he might give, but for the blessing he hoped to receive, did Philip love and seek to win the pure and pious maiden. Her refusal to accept a marriage to which she had never formally pledged herself, only quickened the ardor of his love, and made him the more determined to possess her as his own. He believed in the power of a resolute will, and thought all women weak in the direction of their sentiments. He knew that Deborah loved him, and trusted in the influence of her heart over any of the superfine notions, as he called them, which had found entrance into her busy brain. He had only to continue the siege upon her affections to make an ultimate conquest sure.

But Cheston found himself in error. Month after month the siege was prolonged, but there came no signs of capitulation. Not a stone was loosened in her tower of strength; not an impression made upon its walls.

"Our feet are set in different ways, Philip, and we cannot walk together." So she had answered him one evening, when, with more than his usual impassioned earnestness, he had urged his suit. "It is now over two years since our paths began to diverge, and we are getting farther and farther apart every day. Do not shut thy eyes any longer to this truth. There is a steadily widening gulf between us, which nothing, I fear, can bridge. I am giving myself to the work of helping and saving others, while thee looks down upon and despises others in comparison with thyself. Thou art making mammon thy God."

"A false accusation!" exclaimed Cheston, stung by this last sentence.

"We worship what the heart is set upon," answered Deborah, calmly, "and make that our God. Thy heart is set on money."

The strong, flashing eyes of the young man fell beneath her steady gaze.

"Only fools despise money," he returned, with a hard rattle in his voice.

"It is one thing to despise money, and another thing to accept it as a good gift and use it aright," said Deborah, in reply. "But," she added, her manner changing, "we will not talk any more. Thee sets thyself farther and farther away from me with every word."

They parted coldly, and did not meet again for over a year. At Cheston's next call, he was told that Deborah had dropped out of sight, and gone no one knew whither. How they met after that long interval we have seen. In nothing, as to quality, had either changed; and they stood farther away from each other than at any time before. Every sentence uttered by Philip only revealed to Deborah new evidences of a rank growth in worldliness that was fast absorbing all the life-forces of his nature. He was more passionate in his efforts to win her love; but she missed the old tenderness. He showed greater strength and force of character; but it was harder and more self-asserting. His presence hurt her pure and sensitive soul. To all he urged upon her, she had but one reply.

"I say it again, Philip—our feet are set in different paths. How, then, can we walk together? It is impossible."

And every time she thus answered him he felt the distance between them growing greater. It was well, perhaps, that, in his excitement at finding all his efforts to change the mind of Deborah unavailing, he betrayed more of his real self than appeared in guarded moments. If any latent weakness remained with Deborah, this had the effect to extinguish it, and set her free from any influence he might still have had over her.

They parted—she pale and calm; he chafed and turbulent as an impeded stream—she with a gentle admonition; he with a passionate charge of fickleness and want of heart, flung out madly through quivering lips.

CHAPTER V.

DEBORAH would have been less than a woman had she come out of this trial untouched by pain or weakness. Philip saw only her pale, calm face, and saintly eyes that looked into his steadily to the last moment; but she veiled her heart so that he could not see how faint and full of suffering it was. The heat of his anger as he turned from her made his step firm; and pride, though wounded by rejection, gave to his bearing a statelier air than usual. She went like a stricken thing to her chamber, and sunk upon her bed in utter exhaustion. To be so denounced and cruelly assailed by the man whose loving words had once been sweet to her ears, was hard to bear; and though it pushed him still farther away, and made the intervening gulf impassable, the process was full of bitterness for her gentle spirit.

It was like the shutting of a cloister gate upon some world-sick soul whose last dear hope had died. There was nothing to lean upon but God; and even He seemed afar off now, because her eyes were dim-sighted, and her heart too weak to lift itself toward Him.

Mrs. Conrad saw nothing more of Deborah that day. When supper was ready in the evening, she called her, but Deborah excused herself, saying that she did not wish any supper. The kind-hearted woman was troubled at this, and insisted on bringing a cup of tea, which Deborah received at the door, quietly thanking Mrs. Conrad, but not inviting her to enter. She came down as usual on the next morning, looking a little paler than on the day before, but with no other sign of the trial through which she had passed. As she was about leaving the house soon after breakfast for the purpose of visiting Mrs. Pyne in Coulter's Row, a lady past middle life, plainly dressed, and with signs of long and wearing trouble on her countenance, met her at the door.

"Are you Miss Norman?" she asked, on seeing Deborah.

"That is my name. Is there anything I can do for thee?" replied Deborah, a smile of encouragement resting on her lips.

Then turning back, she invited the woman to enter. On being seated in Mrs. Conrad's little parlor, Deborah said in her sweet, winning way: "And now what can I do for thee?"

"Oh, so much, I hope!" exclaimed the woman, clasping her hands together, while an eager light flashed over her face. "I know all about what happened at Sandy Spieler's saloon, yesterday. It was so brave! God bless you for it!" And with a quick movement she caught one of Deborah's hands and kissed it. The act, so unexpected, sent a warm flush to the maiden's cheeks.

"Good has come of it already," the woman continued. "God has answered your prayer, and sent conviction and repentance to one heart at least—the heart of my husband!" Her voice broke into a sob on the last word, while tears ran over her cheeks. "He used to be a good, religious man," she went on, recovering herself, "and we were happy and well-to-do in the world. But, drink got the better of him in time. He was one of those who would take a little, thinking it good for him, and having no thought of danger. I saw when the appetite began to grow, and tried to hold him back; but it angered him whenever I spoke about it, and so I had to keep silent. I need not tell how it went on, getting worse and worse as the sorrowful years went by, until he ceased to care for anything but the gratification of his thirst for liquor.

"He was at Spieler's when God guided you, a tender lamb, into what seemed a den of wolves; and when you prayed, arrows of conviction entered his soul. Old feelings came back upon him. The Spirit of God had power to move his heart and fill it with penitence. He came home all broken down, and said he was going to try once more to get free from the horrible pit into which he had fallen. But, oh, dear, Miss Norman! it will be of no use if he trusts in himself alone. He knows that, as well as I do; but he's a backslider from the church, and seems afraid to go to God."

"Afraid of God!" said Deborah, in a tone of surprise. "Though all men turn from us, yet will He not! Ah, no; let him go in humble trust to the Lord, and he will find loving hands outstretched to receive him."

"I know! I know! But he is in such darkness. O Miss Norman! won't you come and see him? It will help him so much. It may save him!" And the trembling woman grasped the hand of Deborah and looked imploringly into her face.

In a small, meagrely furnished, but clean and tidy room, sat Joshua Gilbert, whom the reader will remember as one of the inmates of Spieler's saloon when the young Quakeress dropped in among them, bringing with her the pure airs of the higher region in which she dwelt. His elbows rested on a table, and the palms of his hands were held tightly against his temples. His face had a look of distress. A Bible and hymn-book were upon the table, the former lying open. A sound of feet on the stairs caused him to raise himself quickly and lean forward in a listening attitude. The door opened, and he saw the serene countenance of Deborah Norman. It was to him like the countenance of an angel. Light came suddenly into his dreary face, playing about his lips and shining from his eyes.

She came forward in her gentle way, and reaching forth one of her hands, said: "God help and comfort thee, my friend."

Gilbert rose, his face strongly agitated, and stood mute before the maiden.

"He is nearer to us in our sorrows than in our joys; nearer in our conscious weakness than when we feel strong and self-sufficient," she added; "and always very near to help us in every good resolution."

The wife of Mr. Gilbert, who had come in with Deborah, now reached a chair, and as she took it Gilbert dropped back again into the seat from which he had just risen. The light that had come into his face still shone there; but he was trembling under the rush and pressure of new feelings.

"In all our troubles and trials," said Deborah, "we may go to our Heavenly Father and be sure of receiving help and comfort. In our acknowledged weakness, His strength becomes manifest. Shall we go to Him now?"

She made a movement to kneel. Gilbert dropped from his chair and almost crouched upon the floor in an attitude of deepest humiliation. His wife knelt by his side and laid her hand upon him. Then the voice of Deborah came out in low, tender cadences, and she seemed like one speaking face to face with a loving friend who was wise to know and strong to help in every human need.

"Pity and help our weak and wandering brother," she said, "who, like the prodigal son, now turns his face toward his Father's house with tears and longings. Give him strength to come back; and put into his heart assurances of Thy favor. Oh, let him see Thee, while he is yet afar off, standing with outstretched arms and countenance full of love and forgiveness."

When they had arose from their knees, Deborah said, with that confidence of tone and manner which carries assurance: "It will not be hard for thee to lead the new life upon which thee has now entered, friend Gilbert. God will give all needed strength if thee will go to Him."

"But I have gone to Him, oh, so many times!" was answered, "and begged, with tears of sorrow, for strength to stand. And yet, I have fallen again and again. My good resolutions have been like flax in the fire."

"Because thee trusted in thyself and not in God," returned Deborah. "His strength, when given and received, never fails."

"I don't know how that may be," said Gilbert, his voice falling to a tone of weakness and despondency. "No one ever prayed more sincerely for help than I have prayed, times without number. And yet all has been of no avail. It has seemed as if God did not care for me any longer; as if, having so often broken my promises, and brought dishonor upon His name, He had cast me off as a son of perdition."

"Thee dishonors God more by such a thought than by any sin thee has ever committed," replied Deborah. "Thee cannot take thyself out of the circle of God's love. Thy sin may be an offence to His divine purity; but thy soul never ceases to be precious in His sight. Thee cannot get so low down in the pit of a defiling sensuality, nor so far off in the wilderness of sin, as to be out of the reach of His love and power. But thee will never be delivered from the pit unless thee grasp the hand that is reached down to thee, and hold it in utter despair of thy own strength; and thee will never find thy way back from the wilderness unless thee walk in the path of daily self-denial and perpetual trust in God. It does not do to pray and then go off guard. We must watch and pray. It is not by prayer that we overcome. Prayer and trust in God are the means by which we get strength to overcome. God cannot save us unless we try to save ourselves. Salvation is our own work, which must be wrought out, as the apostle says, with fear and trembling; but the power to work is the gift of God. I think thee must have prayed in thy closet, believing that in answer to thy prayer, which was earnest and sincere, God would keep thee free from temptation, and defend thee from all that would hurt thy soul."

"God knows how earnestly I have so prayed, hundreds of times!" exclaimed Gilbert.

"And yet thee was not kept firm in the hour of temptation; and thee was not defended when the enemy rushed in upon thee," said Deborah.

"No—no—no!" he answered, shaking his head mournfully. There was something helpless and despairing in his eyes as he fixed them earnestly on the maiden's face.

"But God is true," Deborah spoke in a clear, strong voice. "And His Word is full of promises to deliver those who call upon Him in the day of trouble. Did thee always call upon Him and trust in Him in the day when thee stood face to face with this great enemy that is seeking to destroy thy soul? Think! Or did thee forget God and parley with the enemy? Did thee put thyself in battle array against him, and then look to God for divine aid, using it as it was given; or did thee match thy own poor strength with the powers of hell? The difference lies just there, my friend. No wonder thee has fallen so many times, if thee went into battle in thy own strength."

"What, then, must I do? How shall I get the needed strength? I have prayed and wrestled with God, oh, so often! I have implored Him to save me from this great evil; but all has been fruitless."

"Thee must keep off the enemy's ground," said Deborah. "This is thy first great duty. Thee must not lead thyself into temptation, as so many do—as thee has done, I fear, again and again. If thee tempts the tempter he will surely overmaster thee. Thy second duty is to stand fast and firm when the enemy comes upon thy ground, looking to God for strength. Do not parley nor be afraid. With all Heaven on thy side, ready to help, victory is in thy hands. Thee may stand as immovable as the mountains, if thee will."

The confidence with which Deborah spoke had the effect to lift Mr. Gilbert out of his weak dependency; and her practical way of stating the case as between him and God, enabled him to see how strength could be given and received.

"If," she said, "thee would have Heaven and its saving influences on thy side, thee must be obedient to the laws of Heaven. And what does the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly before Him?

This is the sum of all religion; and here lies thy panoply of strength. If thee weaken by any self-indulgence thy power to serve others in some useful employment, then thee is unjust to thy neighbor, and unmerciful to those who are near and dear and dependent upon thee. And thee cannot walk humbly before God if thee prefer thyself and the gratification of thy appetites to the good of others—for humility would make thee regard others more than thyself.

"Now, does thee not see that for thee to touch drink is to sin against thy neighbor, and that in doing so thee takes thyself out of the protecting sphere of Heaven, and sets thyself among the influences that arise from beneath? That, in doing so, thee is neither just, nor merciful, nor humble; and do not, therefore, walk with God, in whom alone is strength and safety? Thee must feel that to touch or taste the poison that inflames thy blood and dethrones thy reason, is a sin against God; and when thee has the smallest desire to commit this sin, thee must set thyself against it on the instant, and in conscious weakness look up to God for strength to resist. But do not make the mistake of some, who pray for strength, yet fail to use the gift as if it were their own. God does not fight for us, but in us. He has given us a will-power that we can exercise in freedom; taking strength for action from Heaven or hell, just as we choose. Take from Heaven, my friend, and thou art safe."

"God helping me, I will!" Gilbert returned, in a steady voice.

"No fear about His help," answered Deborah, "if thee will but use the strength He is ever ready to give. And if thee will think of thy real enemies as having a personality—as evil spirits watching at the gates of thy soul, and ever ready to rush in through the smallest unguarded opening—thee will have a truer sense of thy danger and thy duty. A sword is often spoken of in the Bible, and in such connection as to give it a spiritual meaning—as something in the mind by which the soul fights against its enemies. Paul speaks of the Sword of the Spirit, which he calls the Word of God. Now, the Word of God is divine truth. And we may call any truth which we take from the Bible, and use in defending ourselves under the malignant assaults of evil spirits, a sword. A man tempted to defraud his neighbor in some business transaction, feels himself almost powerless to resist, though conscience tells him it is wrong. Evil spirits hold his thoughts to the gain he desires, and press him to consummate the wrong. He is, of himself, weak as a bending rush under the pressure of their influence. Without help from Heaven, he must fall. What can he do? How shall he defend himself and get the victory? He must draw the Sword of the Spirit, and cry unto God. Let him take from the armory of God this divine precept—drawing it forth as a sword—'Thou shalt not steal;' and let it even go out of his mouth, flashing in vocal utterance. And if he do this, turning his thought to God, and asking for help in the conflict, victory will be sure. As in this temptation, so in all others. By the Sword of the Spirit he shall surely conquer. And why?

Think for a moment, and thee will see the reason. God is present in His Holy Word; and evil spirits flee from His presence. If, therefore, His words abide in us we shall dwell in safety."

Then Deborah prayed again for the humbled and penitent man, asking God to strengthen all his good purposes and to lead him back to the old paths from which his feet had strayed.

All this sank very deeply into the heart and conscience of Joshua Gilbert. A new influence, more powerful than any he had ever felt before, was pressing upon and controlling him. It seemed as if God had sent an angel from Heaven to help and to save him. Old hopes revived and visions of a new and better future made his heart swell with glad anticipations. A great peace fell upon his soul.

"Will you not come again?" he asked, tears filling his eyes as he caught the hands of Deborah, when she was going away. "I am very weak and afraid! Oh, if I could have you near me always!"

"Thee may have One stronger than I am always near thee, if thee will," she replied. "One who sticketh closer than a brother. He will not leave thee nor forsake thee. But, remember, that He cannot keep thee from going away from Him. Herein lieth thy great peril. Take hold of His hand and clasp it tightly. Let His words be in thy heart. The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life; and if the spirit and life of our blessed Lord and Saviour be in us, giving light to the understanding and obedience to the heart, no evil can come near enough to do us harm."

"I know, I know," replied Mr. Gilbert. "But I have been in darkness so long that my eyes are not used to the purer light into which you have brought me. The hands of my spirit are not yet strong enough to take hold upon God. If you will come and see me every day, and let me feel the strength of your presence, I shall be able to stand."

"You will come!" cried Mrs. Gilbert. "Oh, yes; I know you will come!"

"Just as often as thee may desire," was the low-voiced answer. "But thee must not lean upon a human arm alone. That may help, but it cannot save."

"Help, now, is what I want," said Gilbert, with trembling eagerness. "I am not strong enough to stand alone."

"Ask and ye shall receive," returned Deborah. "It is the promise of One whose word cannot fail. No, thee is not strong enough to stand alone; and in thy conscious weakness lies thy assured strength. He that is for thee is more than all that be against thee. Leaning on and trusting in Him, thou shalt be as the immovable hills."

CHAPTER VI.

DEACON STRONG, to whom reference was made in Sandy Spieler's bar-room, was a Christian of a peculiar type; sound in the faith of his church, and a good hater of all sects and denominations outside the limit of his own peculiar doctrine and form of worship. He had a high regard for religion, and considered it a sacred and holy estate; too sacred and holy to be brought into near contact with common life; something to be put on with his Sunday suit, and laid carefully away, to be kept free from spot or wrinkle, or any such thing during the six days of his worldliness and absorption in the lust of gain. He regarded himself as under the gospel, and not under the law. He had risen out of the bondage of legality and come into the freedom of grace. Was a disciple of Paul in his argumentative obscurity, rather than of Christ in His plain precepts. He trusted in faith for salvation; resting on the merit of Christ as all-sufficient to make him fit for Heaven. What could he do to merit Heaven? Nothing! Good works were an offence to God—the filthy rags of a presuming self-righteousness. And so he did not insult Heaven nor peril his soul by doing them.

Deacon Strong was liberal to the church; but on the principle of the man who pays freely to keep the bridge in repair over which he has to pass. His church was the bridge by which he was to reach Heaven, and he must see to it that it was always in good condition. The deacon had a cotton-mill in which he gave employment to about a hundred operatives, mostly women, young girls and boys; and they were the hardest worked and poorest paid toilers in the town of Kedron. Len Spangler's denunciation of his grinding exactions was in nothing unjust. Bad as this man was, he had more natural humanity than the deacon, and his chance for salvation was quite as good.

The cotton-mill yielded a handsome profit every year, and this profit had to be invested. Nothing, the deacon had discovered, paid so well as the miserable hovels of the poor, for which a rental of from twenty-five to fifty, and sometimes a hundred, per cent. on the cost, could usually be obtained. In the "Coulter's Row" district, he was a large owner; and especially of houses used for liquor-selling—the rent of such being generally paid most promptly. Deacon Strong did not look after this peculiar property himself; and rarely, if ever, went into the neighborhood where it was located. He had an agent named Maxwell, colder, harder and meaner than himself, to whom he gave entire charge of this part of his business. Of the character and condition of his tenants he made it a rule not to inquire. So the rent was paid, and the investment good, he was satisfied. He knew that they were a forlorn, wretched, thriftless set in the main; but he couldn't help that. They were not fit to live in any better way, and might as well pay him as any one else for the poor shelters into which they crept from sun and storm.

We hardly think it ever crossed the mind of Deacon Strong that he had any responsibility touching this miserable tenantry. They were, in his thought, "God-forsaken wretches," and doomed to perdition. Vile sinners under the curse of God. Men and women so far outside the pale of the church as to be entitled to little or no consideration. In his heart he loathed them.

On the question of temperance, Deacon Strong never had much to say. If the matter were discussed in his presence, he agreed with those who pronounced intemperance a great evil; but he saw no remedy. Men were free to eat and drink what they pleased, and none had a right to hinder them. Against legal measures for suppressing the traffic, he was outspoken. To stop the sale of liquor in Kedron would be to take many hundreds of dollars from his pocket yearly; for the thrift of sobriety would rob him of the tenants who paid the largest profit on his investments; and corner whisky shops, for which he received from three to five hundred dollars a year, would not bring half that sum if rented for any useful business. Not that Deacon Strong set this result squarely before his mind and went against legal suppression because it would diminish the productive value of his property in the neighborhood of "Coulter's Row." But the influence of this consideration was, nevertheless, quite as strong as if he had stated the case to himself as plainly as we have done it to the reader. Motives often act very subtly, and hide themselves from cognizance. Self-deception is a very easy thing; easier, often, than deception of others; and there were few in Kedron who did not know Deacon Strong's real character better than he knew it himself.

In person he was short in stature, but strongly built out of common material. Course and hard by nature, his spirit, in clothing itself with an earthly vesture, had selected the coarser and harder conditions of matter by natural instinct, and built for itself a body in all things suited for its proper contact with life in the outer world. Everywhere, in facial outline and expression, in muscular development and personal bearing, the hard, selfish soul made a clear revelation of itself; and all men could read the signs. A large head covered with stiff hair, now turned to an iron-gray; cold, dark eyes of a nameless color; a heavy mouth, with the under-jaw projecting; a short, thick neck; a dark, leathery skin, through which the blood never showed itself in heart-warm flushes—these made a presence the reflection of which rarely faded from any mind upon which it was once cast.

His early surroundings and associations had drawn Andrew Strong into the church. Shrewder, better gifted with language, and more self-asserting than most of those with whom he came in contact, his self-esteem and love of being first soon raised him into leadership. The weaker and more modest deferred to his stronger will and desire for pre-eminence. And so his self-love found in Sunday-school and church work as real a gratification as men of no religious profession find in the pleasures and pursuits of the world. Some understood him, and some did not. Those who came nearest to him valued him least; and men of no religious faith, who held business relations with the deacon, did not hesitate to call him Pharisee and hypocrite. It was marvellous with what a loud-voiced confidence and melting fervor he could pray in public, and how prominent he made himself in every religious movement special to his own church. There was no conscious shame in his pious pretences. And it may be questioned whether his self-ignorance was not so complete as to hide himself from himself.

Peter Maxwell, the agent who had charge of Deacon Strong's property in Kedron, was one after his master's own heart. In person he was small, with stooping shoulders and form a little bent forward, as if the body had yielded to a long-continued pressure. Your first thought on seeing him was of a man broken and utterly cowed; but the firmly-closed, thin lips, and the cold, gray eyes that looked steadily into yours when he raised them from the ground, where they generally rested, satisfied you that the spirit in him was alive and alert. He was not a barking dog; and so people who did not know him were seldom on guard at his appearance; but a sneaking cur, who came up quietly after you had passed and bit at your heels. By nature he was cold and pitiless.

About the time that Deborah Norman entered the poor abode of Mr. Gilbert on her mission of love, these two men sat together in the deacon's private office holding a business conference, as was their daily custom. The deacon's manner was more excited, and his heavy brows more contracted than usual. Something had disturbed him.

"If it gets going in Kedron," his agent was saying, "and the women have their way, it will upset things dreadfully."

"But our women are not going to be led into this thing by a forward girl whom nobody knows," answered Deacon Strong; "and a Quaker at that!" he added, with unconcealed contempt.

"I don't know," replied Maxwell. "If the gun is loaded and primed, it doesn't matter as to the one who pulls the trigger or applies the match. I'm not at all certain about the effect of this Quaker girl's visit to Sandy Spieler's after the news gets well about."

"When did you hear of the affair?" inquired Deacon Strong.

"Yesterday afternoon."

"Is it generally known through the town?"

"Not yet, I think."

The deacon drew his hard mouth together and lowered his heavy brows reflectively.

"It was done, as I am told, very quietly," said Maxwell. "She came in, as I heard a man say, like a gliding ghost; and even Len Spangler, who happened to be present, was struck dumb, and couldn't utter a word until she was gone."

"A profanation of holy things!" growled the deacon.

"Maybe it is," returned the agent. "I don't pretend to say. I'm not a professor, you know."

"More's the pity for you," said the deacon, with touch of acrimony in his voice. "But that doesn't signify now. Was there anything in the paper this morning about the excitement in Ohio?"

"Yes; considerable."

"It's still going on?"

"Yes; and spreading like wild-fire."

"To burn out as suddenly as it has blazed up."

"Most likely. But while it lasts it seems very much like a flight of locusts, or the march of army worms; not much is left in its course," returned Maxwell, in the rasping undertone with which he usually spoke. "If it gets going here, somebody's bound to be hurt. I know of twenty or thirty properties that pay a handsome interest to-day, that won't net the taxes if the liquor trade goes down in Kedron."

"Whatever interferes with a man's business, or depreciates the value of his property, is wrong," said the deacon, with a positive jerk in his voice as it pronounced the last word. "Right or wrong, liquor is made and sold under the sanction of law. This manufacture and sale has become a large and important industry all over the land, and millions upon millions of dollars are invested therein. Its legality gives every man the right to engage in it if he will; and as long as he does not infringe the laws, society is bound to protect him. So large an industry connects itself, necessarily, with nearly all other industries, and you cannot make a sudden and destructive assault upon it without serious injury to the rest. What would be the effect here, for instance? Why, hundreds of people, in one way or another connected with the business, would be thrown out of employment, to say nothing of direct pecuniary loss and depreciation in the value of property. It would be a calamity, Peter Maxwell! A great calamity!"

A boy entered the office and said that a lady had called and wished to speak with Mr. Strong.

"Who is she?" inquired the deacon, looking slightly annoyed.

"I don't know, sir," answered the boy.

"Tell her to come in." The tones were not very gracious, for Deacon Strong did not feel in a particularly amiable mood.

The boy went out. A few moments afterward the door opened quietly, and Deborah Norman entered with almost noiseless steps. Her face was calm, and her eyes had a soft and sweet expression, as she paused a few steps within the door and looked into Deacon Strong's cold, almost frowning face.

Home-Life and Character.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSISSIWAY POTTS.

THIRD SERIES.—No. 2.

I'VE a good mind to tell it! other folks have their family affairs, I suppose, just the same as the Pottses have, and I feel as if I'd like to tell it and let an arbitration of women decide, and then I'll know which is right, Brother Rube or myself. I have a pretty decided notion that I am correct; the women will know, any how.

Dear Aunt Kitty, one of the best of women, and our Cousin Sallie, a princess of a girl, visited us late last fall, and when they started on their homeward way, Rube and I took them in the deacon's little spring wagon as far as her Brother Andrews.

We had not gone forty rods toward home, until a dark cloud loomed up from the west and a dashing shower came down upon us. It was sunset then; all the way was hilly and broken; our families expected us both that night, and all we could do was to wrap up in the robe and jog along and make the best of it. I took off my new black silk calash, tied the ribbons, and hung it on my arm like a basket, turned the cape of the deacon's camel cloak up over my head, raised my faithful blue cotton umbarel, and we two rode along right cheerily. The way was rough but superbly beautiful; the road wound around hills, and a-down valleys, and across gullies, and long reaches of it lay through the leafy brown woods of November, where the tree-tops met above our heads in an arch sixty feet high. What did I care for the swashing rain! I knew the girls at home would have, ready and waiting, good fires, hot tea, slippers and woollen stockings-a-near the stove, and a suit of warm, dry clothes lying all ready to slip into. Through the weird shadows and the darkness of that out-door November picture shone a brighter and a gladder one of the cheerful home that awaited my coming.

As we rode along, I said: "I think our father is changed so. Do you never notice that if anybody does anything mean, or low, or unprincipled, he never likes them afterward? Why, the girls and I have to be real careful not to tell of such things, and not to speak out a word against a neighbor, if we do, he seems to see nothing good in the person after that."

"Why," said Rube, opening his eyes wide right before me, "you and father are as much alike as two peas! that is just the way with yourself, Pipesey."

I finched a little. "Oh, no, Rube! now you know I'm not that way. Maybe I was when I was a little girl, but I've been fighting against it all my life like a hero. I want to be noble, and generous, and liberal, and I am striving for it. Now, I won't be a bit mad if you tell me of a few instances."

Rube said, "W-e-l-l," and jerked his head down and fell to thinking with all his might.

I chirked to the horses to save him a little exertion. Did I really draw a line and compel my neighbor to stand with their toes on the mark, or meet with my displeasure? Did I measure them with my measure, weigh them with my balances, put my own narrow construction on the motives that controlled them? Shame!

"Well, hurry up, Rube," said I.

"W-e-l-l," was his tardy answer; "indeed, you do that, Pipesey," said he, "but, somehow, I can't quite remember when."

"Oh, you can recall one single instance, can't you?" I urged.

"Oh, yes, now I have one! Yes, I have two!" he said, but not with the fervor in his voice that I expected. "You remember what beautiful, rosy, pretty girls the Pauls were when they came here, fifteen years ago. Just as handsome girls as you'd find anywhere. And you know, Pips, that you didn't like Sue one bit. You allowed just one little thing to turn you and the girls against her, and I never thought that was fair, or just, and for my part I always liked Sue and her sister, though you didn't want me to."

"Why, Ruben Potts!" said I, startled; "no woman who loved and revered the beauty and excellence of a true womanhood could tolerate the baseness of Sue Paul's character. You remember when Ida was a little girl, sitting at the roadside reading and watching a gap, that Sue came along and began talking to the shy little child, and she used low, scurrilous language, such as a drunken vagabond only would make use of, and our poor little sister cried with very anger and indignation! Now, could I, the one who filled a mother's place toward that motherless child, tolerate the presence of Sue Paul after that? And when, with some made-up pretence, she came to our house afterward, and sat and talked with you, would I have been a womanly woman, and an honest woman, if I had taken her hat and shawl, and shown her cordiality, and invited her to stay for supper, and urged her to come again? You know I would have belied my principles—I would have been dishonest, deceitful, and the little watchful ones in my car would have seen me proven a liar and a two-faced woman. The three pairs of honest blue eyes were following me then—it seemed to me that they were always on the lookout to see if I practiced what I dally preached, They had such a sweet, abiding faith in me; and though I wore it every day, and was proud of it, it held me as trim as a straight jacket. I wanted to merit their approval. No, Rube, you can't bring that incident up against me; in your very heart you know I did what any well-meaning woman would have done;" and I chuckled over my victory.

He was not to be shaken off, however; he wanted to substantiate his charge; and as he stooped over to tuck the robe about our feet, he said slowly: "Well, but, Pipsey, you are proud—or something; you are a good deal like the deacon, after all; you are a good bit stuck-up, and you needn't deny it."

"Bring on your proof," said I. "I do deny the charge; but if you can prove it, I will own up. Give me one instance."

"Well, the case of the Hardys," said he. "Now you know they lived over the hill for nearly three years, within hearing of gunshot, and you never permitted yourself to become acquainted with them. The old lady was a member in good standing in the Disciple Church—a praying woman, a kind-hearted, affectionate neighbor; she'd a-taken the last bite out of her mouth and given away two-thirds of it; and yet, Miss Potts, you never called there unless you went on an errand, and that not more than twice in those three years; and though you met her often at church, you never any more than nodded, or said, 'fine weather;' and she told my Martha that you never invited her to a tea-drinking all the while she lived there! I believe you did send her some nick-nacks once when she had a sore breast, and gave her little girl some vine seeds, but that was all. Now what is that but stuck-up?"

"Will you please answer me a few questions, Mr. Potts?" said I.

"With pleasure," was his reply; and I have no doubt, could I have seen his face, that I would have seen it all aglow with the expression, "Aha! I have ye now!"

"Was she a woman who used clean language?" said I, slowly.

"She would swear like a trooper when she was mad; but she would be sorry for it before an hour," said he, apologetically.

"Was she not a good deal like Sue Paul in using low, mean talk?"

"Well, she was very sharp—and—yes—well, she would use low, bad language; but then she was so sharp. Oh, she could pray like a preacher! Oh, she could fill the house with her noise, and when she paused you could hear a pin fall!"

"I wonder why she don't have better boys and girls, then?" said I, to draw him out a little.

"Well, I guess her children don't believe her. She will pray for, and scold, and cuff them, all inside of the same hour."

"Do you think the Lord hears such prayers, or that he has faith in such people's professions?" I asked.

"Oh, I don't know," said he; "but you know, Pipe, we ought to think as kindly of everybody as we can. We have no business to set ourselves up above others, and to dictate to them, and to mark out their line of conduct, and condemn if they do not walk in the same path we do."

"Well, but we should not compel ourselves, against every honest desire of our hearts, to associate with them, just because they are human, and wear the same likeness that we do. If they are repulsive to us, it is no sign that we are proud, or stuck-up, or fastidious, when we do not frequent their company, but rather shun it. We know what our likes and dislikes are better than another knows for us. Ruben, there is an old saying of granny's that 'water will seek its own level.' Now because this queer, coarse woman, who could swear and pray in the same breath, was our neighbor, that was no reason that I should run hand in hand with her when I preferred another woman, or preferred the companionship of my books. I do not say that Sue Paul was bad at all; her early training may have been neglected, or she may have been unfortunate in the selection of her companions, or she may have been deprived of all precious advantages that go so far in the making-up of a girl's character. And, while the girl was utterly repulsive to me, I thought of this, and always treated her with cool but polite civility. And so with the other woman. While I could not bear to associate with her, I made all allowance for the fervor and enthusiasm of an emotional nature. There is good in the heart of such a woman—there must be; but there is nothing positive in her character; she has no stability; else, when she sees her pitiable weakness, she would resolve, and then cling to her good resolutions, and grow into a strong, self-reliant woman.

"I think I am right in preferring to choose my own associates. I know best what my likes and dislikes are. I always thought you boys were a little too liberal in your judgment of others. You remember Charley Wilkins; now I never liked to have you associate with him, and I used to tell you so. He had a habit of sneering at women, and speaking lightly of religion, and I always felt miserable in his society, for I have no faith in a man who does this. But you used to say: 'O Pipey, that fellow'd share the last cent with another; he'd give away his best coat to one in need!' I didn't doubt it at all; and it was this generous trait that made him all the more a dangerous companion for young men. He had the stuff in his nature that Bret, Harte and John Hay seize upon when they would eulogize their heroes for bravery, intrepidity and valor. It is a dangerous lure for inexperienced young men; they will pour out their admiration, seeing only this one good trait; they make it to cover a multitude of sins."

By this time Rube was willing to talk about something else, but I could see that he still held his first position; I had not even shaken his citadel; he still thinks Pipsey is stuck-up because she does not take into her friendship and confidence every one who comes along.

I do wonder if I am correct? I don't want to be proud, or haughty, or unkind, or think myself better than my neighbors, but I should like the privilege of choosing my two or three friends without A., B. and C. sitting in judgment upon me with all the gravity of wise owls.

We really have not the authority to choose the path our friends should walk in, the associates who should walk with them, any more than we should dictate to them what to eat, and drink, and wear.

Well, when I got home that dark night, everything was just as cheery as I had pictured it—slippers, stockings and a suit of clothing hanging on a chair by the stove, the tea steeping, the table set in the little dining-room for one, and even the lamp burning there, and everything waiting bright and full of good cheer. Two of the students, Wilson and Covert, had called. Ida was playing, and Lily and the boys singing. The deacon, in an adjoining room, sat reading his Bible. I was soon dressed up, and as dry as toast—and—that is all there is of it.

We were especially favored last fall by such good visitors. An uncle from Lansing, Michigan, an excellent man, who married my mother's eldest sister about forty years ago, paid us a visit, accompanied by his third wife. My aunt died nearly twenty years since, but Uncle William is just as dear to us as ever. He holds very tenderly the memory of his first wife, the mother of his children. He made me promise to visit them next summer; says he will take me away to the deep, dark, dense pine woods, where the winding roads through them awe, and thrill, and make one shudder on beholding them the first time. Some of my cousins are in the lumbering business away off among the towering pines, and we will visit there; and, if the Lord spares my health, I will write and tell the women readers of the HOME of the sights and sounds among the sobbing pines. One of uncle's neighbors reads the HOME, and he has heard her often speak of Pipsey, and wonder where she lived, and if she really and truly did carry an umbarel and go about in a roomy calash bonnet, but he knew no more of Pipsey than his neighbor. I never said a word until just after Uncle William kissed me good-bye, and then I said: "Uncle, I want to send a cordial kiss to your neighbor, Mrs. Mullet, and you must tell her your niece, Pipsey Potts, sent it to her." He took it with very blue eyes and heightened color, and his sad face—chiselled by the privations and sorrows of sixty years—was as beautiful as a pretty woman's face. How Mrs. Mullet will "oh!" and "ah!" and "dear me, suz!" when uncle offers the kiss for her acceptance, or rejection. I hope I shall give it to her with my own mouth, yet, sometime.

By the way, what good cheer you dear, kind, tender women readers do heap upon me! Why I boo-hoo right out, royally, sometimes, and I laugh at the same time, too. I wish I could tell you how it all came about, in God's own good time and way, for me to find my place, and write little, cosey, imperfect talks to you. I felt for years that I had something else to do than to trot, like a pet squirrel round its wheel, to turn old dresses wrong side out and upside down, and the legs of pantaloons hind side before; to pick berries to sell; to manage, and pinch, and contrive to keep my family presentable; to cook dinners out of nothing, and—oh, you poor dears! I needn't tell you—too many of you brave, true-hearted women know every inch of the ground yourselves, you walk on it every day, and you are greater heroes than those whose names are blazoned on the scroll of fame. So keep up good heart. My heart was full of the burden that it carried; sometimes I reached my arms up, but they always came back empty. I wanted to earn my own living—I felt my womanhood degraded, starving, cramped beyond endurance when I had to say, after nerving myself for the humiliation: "I need a dollar." Not a Potts ever said to me, "Why, is that whole dollar gone a'ready?" but women do hear it said every day, they tell me so, and they are pained and abased when they hear it.

Sometimes I felt almost strong enough to move mountains, strong physically, and vigorous intellectually, and I said, "There must be something more for me to do. The Lord has not led me through all these thorny paths, and darkened ways, and under these midnight skies, and a-down the vale of sorrow, unutterably bitter, even to the verge of the yawning grave, that I might only toll wearily days and years in the poor service of this little family." I tried to help myself. I reached out in this direction, but my hand came back as empty as it had gone forth; undismayed I extended it in another direction, but it returned to me void of anything.

Don't think me egotistical—let us talk together, I may comfort some of you by a word or a sentence. How I did reach forth! I said to one in authority, "Can I not be a nurse in a hospital?" but he wrote back, "Your sympathies are too strong, they would reach beyond your powers of endurance; you could not stand the sights, and sounds, and smells."

Then I tried to get some poor dead mother's little babies to bring up and care for, and thus receive a triple compensation, but that way was hedged up. I could have taken the sweet little "hindrances" from half a dozen living mothers, or the women who bore them, fashionable creatures whose children were a trouble instead of a blessing, but I didn't want that kind. Our poor, old, tumble-down log-house was illy arranged, and I could not take boarders.

A very excellent couple suggested that I would make a good matron in some public institution, and as Dr. —, in one of our large eastern cities had just sent a letter of inquiry to our State capital for such a woman for the large benevolent institution under his control, my friends sent a recommendation for me. I was delighted at the prospect, though the idea of leaving my dear family and the little ones in charge of a hired girl, was exceedingly painful. The recommendation must have been a charming one, for the doctor was so very anxious to secure my services. I wrote back to inquire what all would be expected of me, the full extent of my duties and what would be the remuneration. In the meanwhile I turned my old brown dress the second time, set trimming on it to hide the ravages of years, took my other calash to the milliners to have it turned and made over, gave my dingy thibet shawl a fresh dip, darned my stockings, fixed up the deacon's best suit, made new clothes for the little girls, cut out some pantaloons for the three boys—who were all at home then—and was getting the things in good living order when the doctor's answer came. He had rather liked the style of my letter, and said my duties would not be very onerous. There were only one hundred and fifty in the institution, besides the officers and attendants. I would have to oversee the whole working machinery; manage the cooking; plan everything in the most advantageous and economical manner; in fact, mother over all of them. For recreation I could attend the dance that was given to the inmates once a week, and I could go to church on Sabbath mornings. My compensation would be the enormous sum of ten dollars a month and half the expenses paid on my journey there.

The laugh did me immense good—my venture had turned out so funny. None of the family laughed like I did. I thought they were very kind not to make fun of me. One of the boys said, "You are worth three thousand dollars a year at home, but I 'spect you'll never get it!"

Then I went on for three or four years doing the best I could. I churned and sold butter, and made new nests for the hens and enticed them to try them; sold berries, and melons, and lard, and cucumbers; and whenever I could spare a dollar, I bought a coveted book, and its possession made me rich. The little children were treated to new books on birthdays and Christmas days. And I made children's parties for them, and, by the blessing of God, they all three look back upon a happy childhood. That makes me glad. Our poor father had a bail debt to pay, and that was one cause of a great deal of self-denial and painful sacrifice in our family for years. I remember how I used to comfort the little girls when, all through the pretty summer Sabbaths they were obliged to wear their last winter's coarse, stubbed, hole-y leather shoes with thin little white coats and fluttering ribbons. I would stitch a bit of black cloth under the holes and hide the white of the stockings, and while I would puff, and rub, and polish with blacking, I would say, right cheerily, that brave old couplet:

"Honor and shame from no condition rise, Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

The story of the Christ-child lying in the manger was a wonderful incentive to contentment and happiness, too.

I wrote a good deal about this time, but generally after the family were all abed. I never realized twenty dollars, however, for all that I wrote during a period of perhaps fifteen years. I wrote because I liked to do it, and I could not keep back what I wanted to say.

Within six years, my minister, Brother Jenkins, said to me: "Do editors ever send your manuscript back to you?"

"Very frequently," was my cordial reply.

"Well, out of, say half a dozen articles, on an average, how many come back to you rejected?"

"About two," I replied.

"Well, I declare!" was his answer; "do you suppose I would preach, if my people rejected two of my sermons out of six?"

There was not much encouragement in that, but his words touched me no more than water would touch a duck's back while swimming. I felt myself held in an irresistible power, stronger than any words of Brother Jenkins's.

All my life I regretted that some woman did not write out of the fulness of her heart to her sister-women; that she did not come close up to them, pityingly, lovingly, even with her earnest words, that would be like the laying on of her hands—words that would reach them as they toiled over the wash-tub, cook-stove, sewing-machine, ironing-table; in their parlors, cellars, dairies, sick-rooms; on their bended knees in their closets, smarting under unkind words, sorrowing all through noble, and brave, and blessed lives, lonely and unappreciated, and suffering pain of soul and pain of body uncomplainingly. Occasionally some man or woman did write comforting words that healed bleeding wounds, and carried new-born joy to stricken souls; but the few who wrote thus could be counted on your fingers. Too many of the stories were for ladies in their luxurious homes, and instead of making one glad they made one dissatisfied and filled her heart with murmuring and unrest.

My sympathies went out freely to the burdened wife, the girls who toil, and the poor women who, overtasked, sink under their imposed—perhaps self-imposed—burdens. I wanted to write for them; I wanted to make them stronger, to lift up their aspirations, and to make them friends with me; to make them take hold of the toll-worn, brown hands I so lovingly and tenderly extended; and, as laughter is called a good medicine, I wanted them to laugh with me.

What good times we've had! Why, we've united in a wave of jolly merriment that has rolled from the rock-bound coast of the Atlantic away to the silver sands of the Pacific! What a circle we did make when we all touched hands and felt the same thrill!

How kind you've all been! Why, bless you! you crowned me more than queen! One dear woman sent the darlingest little, soft, knit tidy for my rocking-chair all the way from Minnesota, and here it is now, and my shoulders rest against it as I write. One precious, hard-working woman sent me these soft, thick, woollen stockings that I have on this minute all the way from Wisconsin, through the liberal mail. I didn't hint for them! I didn't say that to me knitting was harder than mathematics; and I'm sure I never told you that I'd been a married woman twenty odd years ago, only that he always wore great long-legged, home-knit woollen stockings that came above his blessed knees! No, I didn't tell; this was just a streak of my good luck, getting these royal "Wisconsin grays." One little lady-bird in Montana sent me some posie seeds, just out of good-will. A grandmother in the State of Alabama sent me some snuff to cure my troublesome catarrh; and another in New Jersey something to cure the tetter on my hands. A lady reader, who writes a dashing hand, free, and easy, and flowing, with never a mistake in her good Yankee spelling, sent me from Vermont something to mend my broken lamp; another, from Ohio, some pretty embroidery for my nightgown—the one I wear when I go to associations and ordinations.

Then the letters from schoolma'ams, and school-girls, and tired mothers, and weary tollers, have come to me full of loving words, and kindly remembrances, and good recipes; and I do most cordially thank them for all. I wish I had time to write to all these good folks and tell them how happy they make me.

Thinking and thinking of what I wanted to write did not accomplish anything. If I asked an editor if he would like such a series as I proposed, he would hitch up his shoulders and try to turn the subject, and talk about the weather, and end by saying some very fine things.

At last I made a venture. I wrote out a few chapters after the manner I have been writing for the HOME, called it "OUR NEIGHBORHOOD," and sent it to a leading paper in a great Western city, with the request that they would read it, and, if they approved, it should be the beginning of a serial for their paper, giving them the privilege of setting their own price upon it.

I waited about six weeks and then wrote them, enclosing postage, and requesting them to return the manuscript, saying I presumed I could not write well enough for their publication.

A bundle of late papers and a letter came immediately. The letter said, of course, my articles were good, and they had accepted them, and herewith they were all printed in the accompanying half-dozen papers. Not a word said about remuneration; but, instead, some kind of a glozing taunt.

Now that did bring the tears. The deacon said something kind of comforting from the scriptures about sinners, and I—well I wiped my eyes a wipe or two, and then had a laugh.

I waited another year; but the desire to write that serial broke out afresh, and I wrote a few chapters, called it "Other People's Windows," and sent it to Mr. Arthur. You all know the result, and how graciously that serial was received by those kind women for whom it was written.

But what a long story I have been telling!

It was dinner-time just now, and the girls have been doing a two-week's ironing to-day, and I wondered what they could have for dinner when they had so little time to cook. I expected bread and butter and tea, with something black spread on the bread, and I was surprised when I saw a nice cornstarch pudding. Lily had made it this morning, and set it out on the cupboard on the porch to cool. I think warm puddings are not as good as cold ones. I will ask her how it was made.

Well, she says take one pint of good, sweet milk, heat it scalding hot; beat three eggs and four tablespoonfuls of sugar together, and pour them into a teacupful of cold milk, in which has been dissolved two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch; then pour this into the scalding milk, and cook till it is thick; pour out into a dish, and flavor with vanilla or lemon to suit the taste. This makes a delicious pudding.

I made a rice pudding yesterday. First I made a good custard, and then thickened it with boiled rice, not forgetting a little pinch of salt, a handful of raisins and a few little bits of butter. This is a good way to save a drib of boiled rice that would else be wasted.

We do not churn now, and in consequence we often have more cream than we are likely to use. Fact is, I don't believe I make very good butter—at least I don't think so—and I prefer to buy the little that we use from some good woman who has a cold, clear, sweet spring of water, and a sweet-smelling milk-house; then when I taste her butter I see the broad meadows where her cows graze, and I hear the brawling brook that dashes onward among the tall reeds, or winds and tinkles and giggles along among the willows and flags, and creeps down under the bottom rails of the mossy meadow fence, and then speeds onward between sedgy, sloping banks. I seem to see the rows of crocks, and jars, and pans inside of the spring-house under the wide-spreading branches of the spotted beech. That may only be a whim, but it is a very poetical and pleasing one, and comes up to me so freshly when I eat of "that other woman's" good, honest butter.

When we have a surplus of sweet cream, I often make a very nice pudding with creamy milk, eggs, sugar and dry crusts of bread. Always be careful and not put in too much bread, or it will be dry, and stuffy, and kind of tasteless.

Then we often kill a chicken just for the chance of using the cream in making cream gravy. It is better than gravy made with butter, and can be warmed over a dozen times if desired, and be as good as it was at first.

I think I never told you of the cunningest little dinner dish that I just happened to make one day. We had a good deal of nice chicken gravy left, and we had a good many slices of wheat bread that had been cut the day before, and a couple of large light biscuits. I put the bread and biscuits, broken, down quite compactly in a deep dish, and poured the hot gravy over and set it away. The gravy was quite absorbed the next day, and when I was thinking what would be handy for dinner and easily gotten, I remembered that dish. I melted a little butter in the big spider, and when it was hot and nice, I cut and laid in slices out of the big dish and let them fry brown, then turned them and browned the other side. Really, it tasted just like the top crust of my mother's baked chicken pot-pies used to when I was a little girl. It is an excellent dinner dish, but to be good the fowl must be fat and the gravy made just right.

I said the girls did a two-weeks' ironing to-day. Some of the clothes were a little damp, but they are all right now. We have such a neat frame to hang our clothes on when they come first from the ironing-table, and now that I come to think of it, I never saw a like convenience in any of the homes I ever visited. I used to hang my ironing on chair-backs, and on lines stretched across the room, until one of my brothers got this made for me. It is a folding frame made of light linen stuff, and can be opened out until it is twelve feet long. I painted it white last summer. Any of you women can get a workman to make one for a trifle, and you will wonder then how you ever managed to get along without it. It is nice to hang garments on at any time, and can be used as a substitute for a little partition at the side or foot of a bed.

HOUSES AND HOMES.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

WHEN we speak of home we do not necessarily mean a house, nevertheless, the house is to the home what the body is to the soul. It is the outward manifestation—the corporeal surrounding. There may be houses which are not homes in the real sense of the term—which possess no home-like characteristics; but though the poet tells us "tis home where'er the heart is," home must have a visible abiding place, whether it be roomy mansion or a single garret.

There are houses which are in themselves home-like, there are others which only the outlay of time, strength and means can induce to take on any semblance of home.

It has always been one of the most unaccountable things to me, that women who are reckoned as mistresses of the house, and so directly concerned in all its interior arrangements, have not found themselves forced into architecture. Now and then a woman does attempt planning a house, in an amateurish way, for her own benefit; and we almost invariably find, however faulty her plans may be, measured by the strict standard of art, there is a visible improvement in practical matters. Women know better than men where they want closets, they economize passage ways, decrease the number of doors, (an item to be considered in house-cleaning times,) and they make calculations to save themselves steps. They never blunder into having no immediate connection between kitchen and dining-room, and having to traverse a long hall and open and shut two or three intermediate doors in going from one to the other. They do not commit the mistake of bringing the back stairs down into the dining-room—the last place in the world where they ought to go—or the still worse one of forgetting them altogether. Women will generally provide for both light and air in the kitchen: men are too apt to think either unnecessary.

Every new-married pair should follow the example of the birds, and proceed at once to provide themselves with a nest. There is no such thing as home in a boarding house or hotel. And the young people who spend the first years of their married lives in either place are committing a sad mistake. They not only miss the greatest happiness they can ever know, but are, by the habits and associations they are forming, totally unfitting themselves for simple domesticity in future. They are learning to be extravagant, idle, and fond of pleasure; they lose all sense of responsibility; they even run the risk of losing the hold which each has upon the affections of the other. It is only by the closest, most intimate, most unconstrained, and most private companionship with one another, it is only by working for, waiting on, and living with one another, that the bonds of matrimony, which are at the first little more than a form, become firmly welded, and the two are in thought, feeling, tastes and affections figuratively one. This privacy and intimacy of relationship can never be obtained in the publicity of the hotel parlor and dining-room. There is no opportunity for the practice of economies, for little acts of self denial, for labor performed in love—opportunities which are constantly springing up in the privacy of home.

It has always been a wonder to me that men and women—women especially—of moderate means—mechanics, clerks and the like, and their wives—are content to remain in the city subject to all the inconveniences and expenses of city homes, while far more comfort and convenience can be obtained in the outskirts of most of our great towns, within easy access of business, and at a far less rate of living. The city house, built on the principles of cheapness and compactness, and on those alone, are the worst places in the world for the health and comfort of our fragile American women. Even if they have strong and hardy foreign help, these houses are still a perpetual source of weariness to not over-strong women. If a woman has no help, but has instead that abomination wherever found—a basement kitchen—so that she works and eats on one floor, finds her parlor and sitting-room on another, her nursery and sleeping apartments on one or two more, she is obliged during the day to perform feats of pedestrianism before which even Weston might quail, and which are enough to make her the invalid she too often is, without any other cause whatever.

It is an old proverb that "fools build houses and wise people live in them," a saying with which, however, I do not entirely agree. Every man and woman should build at least one house. It is an experience which every one needs, and a pleasure to which every one is entitled. If there was no other weighty reason for such an act, it should be done as a method of expression of character. It should be an embodiment of their individual needs and tastes, studied over, and drawn out carefully by themselves. And if the plan is afterwards submitted to an architect, as it had better be to have incongruities reconciled, mistakes remedied and cost estimated, it should be with the full understanding that none of the main features are to be changed.

But the time to build is not when a couple are just setting out in life. They had better buy or rent, then. If they are subjected to the disagreeable experience of frequent change, and thus become familiar with moving horrors, they may console themselves with the thought that it is part of their education; and that when the happy day comes when they may build air-castles, which have any probability of being realized, concerning their very own house, they will be all the better prepared to make it what it should be, and to find it satisfactory when completed. They will at least become cognizant of many things which they do not want, if they still remain in the dark as to what they do want.

I wonder if there is any one proof against the fascination of house-building upon paper? If there is, he or she can have no sympathy with me. I can scarcely remember the time when architectural drawing was not one of my most amusing pastimes, and the study of architectural plans a delight. Still, I lay no claim to professional knowledge on the subject. My best laid plans would probably "gang aft aglee" if carried to an architect for revision. Still, I maintain that these repeated studies and diversions, added to experience with various houses in both city and country, have given me a certain practical knowledge about the interior arrangement of a house that is of service to myself, and that I am glad to make of service to any one else.

The first thing to be considered in the planning of a house, is the amount of money to be expended upon it, and it is well, besides counting the actual outlay, to leave a margin for contingencies, which are certain to arise. In other words, do not calculate to have your house cost quite as much as you can afford; and before it is finished you will find plenty of use for your surplus money. This, even if it be built by contract; still more so if it is not.

If one's means are limited, and one has that longing for a home of their own, which is both natural and desirable, it is well to build a small house at first, but to build in such a manner that additions can be made from time to time, and not mar the harmony of either the internal or external arrangements.

If I were writing a book on architecture, nothing would delight me more than to fill its pages with various plans of my own designing. But I fear I would be scarcely excused in the present instance. However, while the general arrangement of the plan must be left to individual taste, there are certain suggestions which it may be well to make for the benefit of those who have not had experience as varied as my own.

In drawing the plans of a house, let there be special thought given to the chimneys, not only that they do not come in the way of windows or doors, or in undesirable parts of a room, but that as few as possible shall serve the purpose of many. If one lives within reach of coal, it is a great economy of time and fuel to have some kind of heater which, with one fire, will heat four or more rooms. I prefer the kind that are fed and burn in one of the rooms rather than in the cellar, for the two reasons that the former is more cheerful, and saves travel down and up the cellar-stairs. Such a heater placed in the parlor can be made with a hot air flue open to the sitting-room, dining-room or library back of it, and with flues also into two chambers above. The kitchen range, if there is one, will serve to warm the back portion of the house. Thus there will be only two fires to attend to, and abundance of warmth. If there is no range in the kitchen, and only a stove, (which, to tell the truth, I am singular enough to prefer,) the pipe can be carried up through the room above, and, with the addition of a drum, render that room warm enough for a sleeping apartment.

In the kitchen there should always be at least one window near the chimney to give full light to the cook in her culinary operations. This a male architect never seems to think of. I have often wished, as I have examined their plans, that they might be forced to cook a few dinners in their own dim kitchens over their dark ranges. I think there would be a marked improvement in their future plans. The kitchen, too, should have every opportunity for ventilation and draft, if it is to be comfortable. Somebody, either the mistress or her servant, must necessarily spend much of her time within its precincts, and there is no reason why she should roast or stew along with the dinner.

While I am dead set against a woman spending one moment more in her kitchen than is absolutely necessary, still I would have the kitchen as cheerful as possible. To procure this result, pantries, closets and dressers are necessities, that all the various paraphernalia of cooking and kitchen drudgery generally can be kept out of sight except when in use. Every woman may not be like me, but for myself there is no more depressing object than a bare flour barrel setting in full view in the kitchen, rough stools and benches grouped around, and the walls covered with pans, skillets and tinware of all sorts. I do not care how nicely and brightly they may be kept—I don't like them. I always have in my mind the model kitchen with its rag carpet, its curtained windows, its freshly whitewashed walls with the looking-glass and some pretty engraving, not quite good enough for the rest of the house—a kitchen all neatness and brightness, where the house-keeper need feel no hesitation in receiving a neighbor's unceremonious call, if she is busy with domestic duties. The pantry should be as commodious as possible and well supplied with shelves and drawers. There should be water within the kitchen, or in close proximity to it in a shed, well protected from the suns of summer and the winds of winter.

Every outer door to the house should, if possible, be protected by a porch, or shelter and wind-break of some sort.

If one is building for comfort rather than show, let him not make the ceilings too high. I know advice is generally given all the other way, but having had experience in doing several jobs of papering in rooms of immoderate height, I have resolved that no home of mine shall ever exceed ten feet. That is high enough for health, and in a cottage where the rooms are not too large, even nine is quite high enough for looks. There is no closeness in summer, and the rooms are more easily heated in winter. If one walked like the flies, suspended from the ceiling, it would not make so much difference. But as the heat all ascends to the upper portion of the room, the higher the room is, the broader the cold belt beneath. If the contemplated house is of a more pretentious order of architecture, one must submit to the inevitable, and have walls of a corresponding height. But, then, in that case, the paper-hanging must be done by professionals.

I like bay-windows. Mrs. Swisshelm does not, and compares them to warts and wens, marring the fair features of the house. But, then, I never did like order or regularity. And a bay-window here and a porch there, make to me a pleasing break in an otherwise dull uniformity. Besides, a bay-window judiciously placed to the south, will allow its possessor to keep a little summer within doors all winter long. Even to the east or west it is not so bad. But a bay-window to the north is not so desirable, as few flowers will bloom without sunlight at some portion of the day. A bay-window to be perfect should have the protection of double sash for winter.

The best position for a house is to front the west. That allows the morning sunlight to come where it is most needed—to the kitchen—early in the day. If there are trees upon the premises, something should be sacrificed, if necessary, to place the house near them, so that they may protect it from the sun at some portion of the day. Trees to the west of a house are most desirable, as they will shelter it from the fierce afternoon suns of summer. If there is a heavy wind-break of trees to the north, the house-builder is especially fortunate.

A dining-room should be long, rather than square. Whether the parlor be square or long is a matter for individual taste to decide.

When it comes to the chambers, let them all be large, and, if practicable, each one with a bath-room and dressing-room attached. If this latter is impracticable, then there should be at least one commodious bath-room on the second floor, entirely separate from any chamber, yet of easy access to all.

As to the exterior of the house, let there be as many porches as possible, or as consistent with your means; only do not build them in such a manner that shall darken your rooms. Every room should receive the unobstructed sunlight through at least a portion of its windows.

There must be as few passage-ways as possible. These may render a house cool in summer, but they are dreadful promoters of colds in winter, unless the heating apparatus is complicated indeed. All doors and passages should be arranged with special reference to the convenience of the mistress. The parlor should, of course, have one door near the front entrance, for the convenience of those entering, but it should have another in the rear especially for family use, either in direct communication with the room adjoining, or not far removed from it. Without this door, hundreds of unnecessary steps must be taken, in consequence of which the room may gradually fall into disuse altogether. A mistress of a family, whether she does her own work or has a limited number of servants, is compelled to be almost ubiquitous. She must be in kitchen, nursery, dining-room and reception-room at almost one and the same periods. She always has steps enough to take, without unnecessary ones being forced upon her. For this reason I believe, when economy of ground is no object, it is well to have the nursery on the first floor, sandwiched in between the other rooms of the house, that it may be in direct, or nearly direct, communication with them all.

Halls have always been a stumbling-block to me. Yet no architect would dare plan a house without one. What is there more dreary, more forlorn, more inconvenient, than the long, narrow passage-way with a flight of stairs that we misname a hall! It seems especially planned to create extra labor in every way, without any returning good. As usually built in cottages, they serve apparently no other purpose whatever. A hall should be in some measure a reception-room, where a transient caller may wait before being admitted to the inner sanctuary of the home, and where every one may divest themselves of outer clothing. But as usually built it is scarcely large enough for two or three people to stand in conveniently, to say nothing of its falling utterly as a reception room. A large chair or table will fill all available space. A hat-rack and umbrella-stand is the most that can be crowded into it.

Our expensive villas have, of course, large halls; but even these seldom exceed nine feet in width, and are long and barren.

I once examined a pretty little cottage built by a carpenter for himself, after his own ideas. It was in most things perfect, but the hall completely won my fancy. It was simply an anti-room, six by nine feet, and cheerfully lighted, from which led the front staircase between parlor and dining-room. There was no long, dreary passage-way of waste room to be carpeted and kept clean, and to be traversed twenty times a day. Small as it was, it was far better adapted to the legitimate purposes of a hall than anything I had ever seen.

I have long had my ideal of a hall, but when I came to build, my builder utterly refused to put it into tangible shape, because I could not furnish the requisite wherewithal in vulgar currency. Never mind; I live in the hope of yet seeing my ideal realized. I will describe it here, in the hope that perhaps some one else will be attracted to it sufficiently to adopt it, and thus, though my own hopes prove fruitless, it will not be utterly lost to the world.

First let me give my ideal of the house to which such a hall should belong. It must be a cottage, and built with two prominent ideas, neither of which must be made subservient to the other—those of compactness and beauty. In brief, a home for a family of comparatively limited means yet refined tastes, in which every foot of space must be of practical use, and in which the mistress either does her own work or has but a limited amount of assistance.

I give arbitrary dimensions, which might be waived almost indefinitely. Let the front door, which shall have narrow side windows, after a common manner of hall doors, open upon a room stretching back say twenty-two feet, with a breadth of twelve feet. Ten feet from the door, and directly in front of it, and of course in the centre of the room, with a space of four feet on each side, will be a staircase four feet in width, with strong, heavy balusters, leading up to within two steps of the top. Here will be a broad landing, from which on each side will go up the two additional steps. (No winding stairs for me, if you please; I have too great a regard for my neck.) In front of the landing, and raised to a level with the first step above, should be a deep recessed window—a bay-window, if you like, and your means justify—at all events a broad, double or triple arched window. This recessed window should be filled with flowers and running vines, until the light filtered through the living green resembles that through stained glass. Now as this room must be something more than a mere entrance-hall, I would place below, in the alcoves on either side the stairs, and underneath the turn of the stairs above, cases for books. So that we should have a hall and library in one. On either side the door should be wardrobe and hat-rack, and the remaining available space unoccupied by doors, should be furnished with easy chairs, stands and lounges, sufficient in number to give the room a habitable look, while the spaces on the walls should be filled with pictures, and brackets containing roses and statuettes.

Such a hall as this could be finished and furnished in almost any style. My own manner of doing it would be thus: The stairs and balusters should be of oak and black walnut, or some other richly-contrasting woods. Curled maple is prettier than oak. The doors dark, with light panels. The book-cases of the same dark wood, with glass above and light panels below. The floor should either have a dark, plain carpet of green, or else matting of inlaid wood, enlivened here and there with bright-colored rugs. The walls I would paper, to the height of three feet, in imitation of wainscoting, to match the woodwork. Above that the tone of the paper should be a pearl color, with panels of crimson, surrounded with dark imitation moulding. I select crimson for the paneling, because it is the richest color upon which to show pictures, and there should be one or more pictures to every panel. There might be a large vase on a pedestal on either side of the staircase. If the house is a small cottage, the dimensions might all be smaller, and the window at the head of the stairs a gable window merely, breaking the line of the straight, low-ceilinged roof.

Such a hall (remember I have seen it only in imagination), would be always beautiful and attractive, and would strike the visitor with its novelty, and challenge his admiration when he first entered it. It would serve not only as hall, but as library, reception-room, and even miniature conservatory, counting the blooming window at the top of the stairs, and, probably, frequently as sitting-room, also.

The ideal as I have given it is capable of enlargement, and could be introduced into a villa with excellent effect. Then, if the length of the hall were increased, and richly-carved screens placed across the alcoves at the foot of the stairs, and a bay-window placed directly underneath the stairs between the two book-cases, a roomy apartment would be formed, which should be partially cut off by the screens from the hall in front. In the place of the window underneath the stairs there might be a door leading to a conservatory.

Such a hall as this, small or large, if arrangements were made for its proper heating in winter, would be comfortable and pleasant at all seasons of the year.

If one finds himself in a position to build a house, let him and his wife sit down with pencils and paper, and after carefully estimating the amount they can afford to invest in such an undertaking, consult with each other, plan and draw, revise and alter, until they both are satisfied that they have got everything exactly to their minds, and that to suit their purposes no farther improvements are possible. Then this completed plan had better be submitted to the inspection and correction of an architect in order that any defects may be remedied. Then they are ready for their builder.

If the man himself possesses mechanical skill, and is familiar with the use of tools, and neat and handy in workmanship, he may find it to his advantage to superintend his own building, engaging journeymen carpenters and masons as he may need them, and paying them by the day or job. But if he has no such mechanical knowledge, he will probably find it to his advantage, peculiarly and otherwise, to let the building of his house on contract, stipulating for every item, the whole to be completed within a certain time at a certain fixed rate.

As he submits his plan to his builder, he must be prepared for one thing, and that is, that his builder will probably compel him to reject the carefully-arranged plan entirely, and accept one of his own, which will, perhaps, be larger, completer and more finished than the one he desires, and at the same time can be done at a cheaper rate. There is nothing for it, then, but to take home this latter plan, make a hurried examination of it in conjunction with his wife, to see if it can possibly be remodeled to suit their needs without changing it so much that the builder will have excuse for adding seriously to his charges; return the revised plan to the builder, and, resigning himself to an overpowering fate, let things take their course.

There will be one satisfaction to be derived from his own uncarried-out plan. He can always keep it treasured somewhere in a safe corner of his desk, examine it occasionally with a sigh, half of satisfaction and half of regret, and resolve that if the time ever comes when he shall be peculiarly independent of builders, he will yet put it into tangible form.

Inscrutable are the ways of master-carpenters! I have sometimes wondered if they did not have a multitude of houses all cut after one pattern, laid by ready to put together at a moment's notice, and which, being manufactured by the wholesale, as it were, can be afforded at a cheaper rate than one after an entirely distinct plan! I knew if I went to a cabinet-maker and required a piece of furniture differing materially from the usual styles, I must pay for that difference. But houses! I thought they were another matter. It seems not, however.

Mothers' Department.

TIRED MOTHERS.

BY CELIA SANFORD.

"I AM so tired," said a weary, care-burdened, discouraged mother. "It seems that I can never get to the end of my burdens, and I have no heart to try. What with the steps of the little ones to mind; and the house to keep in order; my work-basket heaped with sewing, which must be done to make the children comfortable for the winter school, to say nothing of the knitting and mending, and a thousand other things, it almost makes me crazy to think of it.

"It is such a hard existence, with no brightness in it, and there is no escape from it, not while life lasts—not, at least, while health and strength hold out. Health and strength! I had not thought of that—what if my health and strength give way? Would not pain and suffering be harder to bear than weariness? And the little ones, Heaven bless them! ought it not to be accounted a blessing, instead of a hardship, to be able to care for them? I have something yet to be thankful for, though a moment ago I thought there was not one single thing to be thankful for in my life."

Yes, tired mother, there is yet many a cup of blessing within reach of thy lips. Thy life is not all a desert, there are lovely oases, green, sunny spots, with springs bubbling over with living, refreshing waters, scattered here and there in thy way. There are blessed rifts in the clouds of sorrow which hang over thee—granting that clouds of sorrow do really hang over thee. But do they? Ponder for a moment. You are weary, overworked and disheartened; but are you really forsaken of Heaven? Are your children all spared to you? Ah!

"There's many an empty cradle, There's many a vacant chair."

Does healthy blood course through their veins? and are they sound of limb? You would not envy the mother who is this moment bending over the wasted form of her darling, soothing the aching brow, and cooling the parched lips; nor her, who is tenderly nursing one who is a cripple for life. Does the light of intelligence glow in their faces? I knew a mother who, for ten long years, carried her boy in her arms, and in all that time, not one answering smile was given to brighten or repay her toil. And then the good Lord said, "It is enough," and gently lifted him from the tired, patient arms.

Can you give your children nourishing food, and warm, comfortable clothing? and have you provisions made for the long, cold, winter months? Anguish is wringing the hearts of thousands of mothers, even in our own happy land, because they know not where to-morrow's bread is coming from to nourish the dear ones who are dependent upon them for supplies; or to-morrow's wood or coal, to keep their half-clad forms from perishing.

Are your children affectionate and loving? and, as you tuck them into their little beds at night, can you kneel and thank God that every one nestles beneath your sheltering care? Remember the mothers who shed scalding tears, and keep lonely vigil for reckless and erring ones; or those whose children are scattered so far from the home-nest that no "light in the window" can reach them and guide their feet to mother and home.

Tired and hard-pressed mother, almost fainting under your burdens, if you would take time to think, and count over your blessings, you would find much to be thankful for; and as you thought, mayhap you would cease to complain, and instead of repining your lips would take up a glad refrain for the mercies which have fallen to your share.

Yet I know that a mother's lot is often a hard one, viewed only from the dark side; there are many cares and many burdens, and especially if she have no help; if her one pair of hands must take up and go through with all the varied duties and labors of the household.

It is poor economy for a mother, if she can afford to have help, to slave and fag herself out, day after day, through summer's heat and winter's cold, thus expending the life-energies that should be carefully husbanded to bestow upon the more important interests of her family. Sometimes it is the wife's fault that she does so, but oftener, I think, it is the husband's.

It is the wife's fault if she foregoes needful help that she may save money to bestow upon the useless adornment of her little ones; forgetful that her sons were entrusted to her charge that she might train them to be men—noble, worthy, self-sacrificing men, fitted to take their places, in their proper lot and station, in this onward-marching world. That her daughters were placed in her care that she might have the honor of training them to be pure, godly, intellectual women.

It is her fault if, forgetful of the higher needs of her children, she spends the hours she needs for rest and recreation, in tolling and stitching, that Mary may have a delicately-embroidered slip, or Johnny an elaborately-trimmed suit.

It is the husband's fault if he is so absorbed in business and money-making that he fails to see that his wife is wearing herself out in the attempt to make his home comfortable, and bring up his children respectably, while, very likely, she is straitened for want of means, and everything she has to do with is as unhandy as it is possible to be; but he does not notice that her wearing cares are eating into her life, making her prematurely old, irritable and unlovely. He may even look on wonderingly and say, "How is it, wife? You are getting to be a regular scold. I don't see how the work can be so very hard. Mother had twice the family that we have, and yet she always managed to do her work without help." Little he knew what struggles and sacrifices his mother had to bring his wayward feet up the slippery steeps to manhood.

But, mother, if your lot is hard, and you cannot change it, resolve to make the best of it. A cheerful disposition, and a determination to look at the bright side of things, will go far toward lightening your burdens; and a true sense of the obligations of motherhood, with an earnest desire to fulfil them in the best manner, will lift you above petty cares and vexations.

Cultivate a thankful spirit for mercies received; and instead of sitting down to brood over your trials, remember that "The darkest day will wear away," and that dark and cloudy as the day may seem to you, it is darker still to some one else.

Make the moral and religious training of your children the first and greatest object of your life; and then take up the subordinate duties that lie in your path, cheerfully and one by one. It is this crowding the work of a week into a day that wears on one so. To be sure, one must look ahead, and plan and contrive, but all undue anxiety in regard to the future but adds to your burdens. The days and hours of the future, as well as the months and the years, are wisely hidden from us; and the great Master said: "Take no thought for the morrow, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

The poor mother who complains despondingly in the morning that the work of the day looks like a mountain before her, and she is sure she can never accomplish half what she really must, may be called to lay down every earthly burden before nightfall. Strive, then, to do well each duty as it comes, trusting in God.

A thorough systematic arrangement of your domestic labors, allotting to this and that, and as far as possible everything, a given time—which you may plan for yourself—would save you hours of trouble and perplexity.

But, you say, this may all look very well on paper; but how to do it is the thing. How to be thankful, and patient, and considerate, and systematic, and all this. It is easier said than done.

Yes, I know. But it may be done. And it is because I sympathize with you, and understand the thousand difficulties that beset your path—which I do from experience—that I have penned these words, hoping that some tired mother may be comforted and strengthened thereby, and inspired with new hope and courage.

Boys' and Girls' Treasury.

A STORY ABOUT VALENTINES.

BY MRS. SARAH HART.

THE little girls of Miss Tower's school were grouped in pairs, and threes, and fours, and were chatting and laughing and enjoying themselves as little girls are apt to do in the few moments that remain before the time for the bell to ring. Just then Clara Seaton came bounding in among them, her pretty cheeks flushed, and her eyes brightly glowing.

"O girls!" she exclaimed, "I am going to have some capital fun! See here, Jennie Cole, and you, Mary Goodwin, I'll tell you something. I don't want any the rest of you to know. I'll tell you about it when I've had my fun." And so saying, she took her comrades and withdrew from the other little girls.

"Pooh! Who cares for Clara Seaton or her secrets!" said May Thornley, tossing her brown curls; and some of the others imitated her; but the remainder were very cautious about speaking so contemptuously of Clara, for Clara was the only daughter of very wealthy parents, and she therefore held her head very high, and looked down on the most of her schoolmates; so Jennie Cole and Mary Goodwin felt particularly flattered when they found themselves set apart for her confidence.

"I am going to have such splendid fun!" she said, when she had taken them to a safe distance. "See this, and this!" and she unfolded a batch of comic Valentines of every conceivable caricature. Mary and Jennie laughed as the hideous pictures met their gaze.

"You're not going to send them to any one, are you?" asked Mary.

"Certainly I am!" answered Clara. "This is for Uncle Jim; he's always twirling his moustache, you know. This is for Sister Julia; she'll be awful angry about it, but will never suspect me. And this is for—guess who."

After guessing awhile, and not being able to hit upon the right one, both girls gave it up.

"Now, don't you tell—never, never," said Clara.

Both promised.

"It's for that hateful Katie Blake!"

"Katie Blake!" said the astonished girls.

"Yes. She's always getting ahead of me; and ma says it's too bad. How impudently she marched up above me yesterday, when I had made sure of getting a head mark. I said then I'd have my revenge," and Clara looked triumphant.

"That will be a poor revenge," said Mary Goodwin, as she looked at the picture.

"It will make her think she has an enemy, and that will be spite enough for me, for I heard her say not long ago that it would grieve her dreadfully to think she had an enemy—the meek-faced saint!" said Clara, scornfully.

All further conversation was checked by the ringing of the bell, and in a very orderly manner the little girls walked into the room. Foremost among them moved Clara Seaton, and behind her came Katie Blake. She was a sweet-faced, bright-eyed, intelligent child, and the favorite of all who knew her, excepting Clara, and her dislike arose from envy alone. Clara could not bear to be excelled, and that by the daughter of a washerwoman—for Katie's mother did Miss Tower's washing in payment for her daughter's tuition.

No one who looked upon the bright, eager faces in the school-room that morning, could have suspected the schemes at work in the brains of at least three of the number. Clara Seaton was planning how best she might deliver her ill-natured missive, while May and Jennie were planning how they might defeat her scheme, and thus save Katie from the bitterness they knew she would feel should she receive the valentine. Finally they concluded to detain Katie at May's home after school, so that if Clara should send it to Mrs. Blake's house, that lady would destroy it, and Katie would never know. But Clara was too cunning for that. Her chief design was to see Katie's suffering. So she arranged with a little boy whom none of the girls knew to carry it to Katie and deliver it to her at school.

Early that afternoon the little boy came. Miss Tower herself answered the summons.

"Katie Blake is wanted," said Miss Tower, as she re-entered the room.

Katy turned red, smiled, looked awkward, and obeyed, exciting no little curiosity among the scholars as to who wanted Katie. She remained out so long that most of them had forgotten about her. But Miss Tower grew apprehensive, and went at last to seek for Katie, whom she found in the hall weeping bitterly, with the vicious valentine open in her hand. The kind teacher comprehended the situation at once, and tried to soothe the poor little girl by telling her it was not worth so much distress, and that only evil-minded persons ever resorted to such low means to triumph over another.

"But, O Miss Tower! to think that any one hates me so!" sobbed Katie.

Miss Tower smoothed her hair and talked to her until she grew calm.

"You may be excused for the rest of the day," said the teacher. "We will say nothing of this to the scholars, Katie."

"Oh, thank you!" returned Katie, gratefully, for she felt that she could not return to the school-room.

"She got it. That's what she was called out for, and I suppose she is so mortified over it that Miss Tower has let her go home," whispered Clara, as she passed Jennie Cole in the aisle.

Jennie whispered Clara's message to May Goodwin at recess, and their hearts sunk within them. How now to act they knew not. They talked it over all recess, but could come to no conclusion, and so carried heavy hearts back to the school-room. But toward the close of the day, May seemed to have hit upon a plan that suited her. In her impatience, she tried every lawful way to let Jennie know that something could be done, but she was obliged to wait until school was over. It did seem there never was such a long hour as from three to four o'clock. But it was over at last, and as soon as she could get Jennie by herself, she confided to her her plan.

"Oh! splendid, splendid!" cried Jennie, jumping up and down. "Then, to-morrow, we'll ask the girls to show their valentines, and won't Clara open her eyes!"

Poor little Katie! In spite of Miss Tower's kindness, her wounded heart was not healed, and her tears flowed afresh as she showed the ugly picture to her mother and told her the story.

"Who could have done it, mamma?" she asked, with her tearful eyes on the picture.

"I do not know, my dear. You must not mind it. Some evil-minded person has only practised a joke on you," answered her mamma, with a kiss.

That evening, just as they were at supper, there was heard a knock at the door. Katie ran to open it. A little boy inquired, "Does Mrs. Blake live here?"

"She does," answered Katie.

"I have a package for Katie Blake," and he gave it to the astonished child, who, in a bewildered way, carried it to her mother.

"He said it was for Katie Blake, mamma. Do you really think he meant me?" asked Katie, her blue eyes wide open with surprise.

Her mother made no reply, but, quite as mystified as her little girl, untied the package. Such a sight!

An elegant little work-box with all the accompaniments complete, and on the top a beautiful valentine for "sweet Katie Blake."

"O mamma, mamma! It is for me, isn't it?" said Katie, half in gladness half in fear.

"I think it is," said mamma.

"Oh! it is just like a dream or a fairy story! Who could have sent it?"

"Some one who loves you, my dear," answered her mamma, and I am sure there were tears in her eyes, too.

"I believe that Miss Tower sent it, mamma," said Katie, after a moment's thought. "She felt so sorry for me to-day when I got that hateful thing."

Katie could hardly keep her eyes off of the beautiful, mysterious valentine. When she retired, she placed it where her eyes would open right on it in the morning.

"May I take it with me to school, mamma?" she asked, as they sat at breakfast.

Her mamma consented, and never was there a happier little girl than Katie as she carried her treasure to school. The girls crowded around to admire it, and Miss Tower was questioned; but when that lady denied all knowledge of it, Katie was more mystified than ever.

Now Miss Tower was one of the kind of persons who keep their eyes and ears open, and, consequently, before the day closed she had discovered the authors of both of Katie's valentines. Her sorrow for Clara's conduct was only equalled by her admiration of Jennie's and May's. She was unwilling that such noble conduct should go unrewarded. So that night, although a little too late for a real valentine, there did come a beautiful one to each of the kind-hearted girls. May's valentine was a silver thimble on which was engraved "My valentine;" and Jennie's was exactly like it. I do not believe they have yet found out who sent them.

THE FARMER'S PARROT.

ONE beautiful spring a farmer, after working busily for several weeks, succeeded in planting one of the largest fields in corn; but the neighboring crows committed sad havoc with it. The farmer, however, not being willing that the germs of a future crop should be destroyed by either fair or foul means, determined to drive the bold marauders to their nests. Accordingly, he loaded his rusty gun, with the intention of giving them upon their next visit a warm reception.

Now the farmer had a parrot, as talkative and mischievous as those birds usually are; and being very tame it was allowed its freedom to come and go at pleasure. "Pretty Poll" being a lover of company, without much caring whether good or bad, hopped over all obstructions, and was soon engaged in the farmer-like occupation of raising corn.

The farmer with his gun sallied forth. Reaching his cornfield he saw at a glance (though he overlooked the parrot) the state of affairs. Levelling his gun, he fired, and with the report was heard the death-scream of three crows, and an agonizing shriek from poor Poll.

On looking among the murdered crows, great was the farmer's surprise to see stretched upon the ground his mischievous parrot, with feathers sadly ruffled and a broken leg.

"You foolish bird," cried the farmer, "this comes of keeping bad company."

On carrying it to the house, the children, seeing its wounded leg, exclaimed:

"What did it, papa—what hurt our pretty Poll?"

"Bad company—bad company!" answered the parrot in a solemn voice.

"Ay, that it was," said the farmer. "Poll was with those wicked crows when I fired, and received a shot intended for them. Remember the parrot's fate, children, and beware of bad company."

With these words the farmer turned round, and with the aid of his wife bandaged the broken leg, and in a few weeks the parrot was as lively as ever, but never forgot its adventure in the corn-field; and if ever the farmer's children engaged in play with quarrelsome companions, it invariably dispersed them with its cry, "Bad company—bad company!"

A LITTLE SNOW SCENE.

BY G. DE B.

TOMMY stands watching the fast-falling snow, Wondering what makes the wild "white wind" blow.

"Auntie, oh, see it!" he joyously cries;

"Out-doors is full of nice, little, white flies."

"Ah, Tommy, darling," says auntie, "these things

Falling from heaven are angel's white wings,

Which the good Father sends, softly, like down,

Keeping the seeds in the cold, hard ground warm."

Tommy looks up, then, with faithful blue eyes,

Watches with wonder the slow-moving skies.

"Are dese de fadders dey drop?" questions he.

"Oh, won't dare mammas be sorry to see

'Em tummlin' home wis dare little wings bare?

Auntie, I'll div 'em my tippet to wear!"

The Home Circle.

MY GIRLS AND I.

BY CHATTY BROOKS.

SECOND SERIES.—No. 2.

WE are all glad when Saturday comes. That day brings freedom to the girls. They can help about the housework, fix up their clothes, wash and starch their collars and laces, go out calling and have a good time generally.

Sylvia never irons her laces, just stretches and smooths them until they are dry; she says that prevents them from growing yellow. I do wonder if I told you girl-readers about Sylvia's pretty, comfortable and ingenious skirt! I told somebody and I cannot remember now who it was, but I will tell it again, for it will be new to some of the new girls who were not acquainted with Chatty Brooks and her blessed family of last year.

Two or three years ago, Sylvia was going to Slippery Rock, Pennsylvania, to stay a week among the wonders of that rare, and beautiful, and wild nook, and wanting a serviceable and cheap dress, she was beguiled into buying one of gray wash poplin. Now, you girls all think that wash poplin is a swindle; Sylvia thought so when she washed it and it shrank, and though she rinsed it time after time, it would dry in streaks in spite of her. So she hung it up in the closet and thought no more about it until, one day, she was looking around and contriving up comfortable clothing out of the stock of stuff on hand. It came to her, then, what to do with the gray dress of wash poplin. She needed a substantial skirt for winter, so she took that dress, lined it with the same about half a yard deep around the bottom, then trimmed it with rows of blue chambray, some of the strips wide and some narrow, stitched on the sewing machine with coarse thread of a contrasting color; and, really, girls, it is the prettiest skirt in the precincts of Millwood. Blue and gray harmonize beautifully. I told her I was afraid, when she washed it, that the gray would run into the blue and leave it all in dingy streaks, but she said she thought of that, and the first time she washed it she hung it on the line with the band down, so if any fading color did settle, it would not come in the blue trimming. It did not fade any more, however. That skirt is warmer in a cold, windy day than one of flannel or cloth; that kind of material is thick and almost impervious to wind.

Tuesday.—I must tell you something nice. A sister of one of my girls came from the West to visit her, or, I might say, to visit all of us, because we all enjoyed her society so much. She was a very thin, spare woman of thirty or thereabouts, and would have been homely, only that she knew what to wear and how to wear it. So many women are really quite pretty, only that they are so very thin—their faces narrow and the skin seeming to cling to the bones about their necks, throats and ears. Every muscle was as visible as a cord in this lady's long, thin neck; her ears were large and set out from her head; but a little, shrewd, womanly ingenuity had remedied all these defects. There was padding in her dress about the shoulders and thin shoulder blades, and this gave a hint of plumpness and took away those angularities that are not pretty. Then she wore a very tasteful, full, standing frill, and her hair was arranged in just the one way left for such women to wear their hair. It was put up in a loose coil at the back of her head. She had saved, carefully, all the loose hair that she had combed out and had given it into the hands of a poor girl to make into curls. She made four, and they were fastened on hair-pins and stuck into the side of the coil and covered the thinness about her neck and ears, and made a pretty background for her finely-chiselled face. We all admired the lady, and admired the good taste that had induced her to hide these little deformities. I forgot to say that the upper part of the waist of her alpaca dress was gathered and held into fullness before it was fitted upon the lining. Mary says puffed is the word to use here, that girls will understand it, then. That kept her from seeming so spare and thin as she really was. She said she always saved every loose hair and laid it away lightly in a box kept for that purpose, for the reason that she might lose all her hair, sometime, through sickness, and then she could wear her own braids or frizzes and not be obliged to resort to an entire deception.

Morning.—Last evening Mary and I went to church to hear the new minister. Nearly all my girls went, some with escorts, some with their companions, or relatives, and it so chanced that Mary and I went together, but, between us, I do hope I'll never have to go any place with that fussy, fidgety, little Mary again! She is so poky. She was the last one to get ready. I sat and read awhile after my gloves were on, and then sat and warmed my feet, then went round through the house to see that all the fires were safe, and still Mary was not ready. At last we started. She slipped her arm in mine, but before we had walked ten rods she stopped to fix her garter. Then we walked on, and suddenly she halted me with, "I do declare for it! If my garter isn't untied." I held her hymn-book and muff, and stood chattering until the garter was laced. She took my arm, and we walked on, perhaps a dozen steps, when she stood still suddenly, and found out that the other garter was untied. So I held her things while she doubled over and tied it up snugly. Then she hustled around and loosened my wraps in a very decided manner in her search for my arm. By this time she was chilled and was not content with merely taking my arm, she must nestle her hand in a warm place clear in under my cloak and furs. We walked on a few rods, when, with apparent dismay, she found that the first garter was untied again.

"Let it go," said I, "you can lace it after you get there."

So she hobbled along, like a cripple, a few steps, when she halted, saying: "I can't stand this; take my book and muff, and I'll fix it in an instant."

The chill wind was blowing a gale, but I stood there until she gave marching orders. We had not proceeded a dozen steps until her shawl fell back because the pin had lost out. I fumbled about my own clothing and found a pin for her, but in trying to handle it with her tight kid gloves on, she lost it, and very suavely asked me if I could spare her another. I shouldn't wonder if there were wrinkles in my forehead by this time, but I said nothing, drew off my gloves, took a pin out of my own dress and very safely pinned on the little flirt's shawl. Then, with her teeth a-chatter, she rummaged until her arm was within mine, and we walked on. By this time I was decidedly "out of sorts," but she was so calm and cool that I was determined to try and appear so, if I wasn't.

About eight rods this side of the church the last garter became untied again, and she handed me her book and muff. I very deliberately laid them down in the snow beside her and said I would slowly walk on. Just before I reached the church door I heard her "Aunt Chatty! Aunt Chatty!" and then, with a whispered vow that I never would go any place again with that little fidget, I stopped for her.

Little things do influence me so. Now my temper was a good deal ruffled, although I tried to be serene and calm.

The girl's flirty ways had annoyed me more than I would have confessed even to my best friend.

There is nothing more admirable in a woman's character than to see her easy, graceful, self-possessed—mistress of the situation. How despicable a woman does appear when she "has on her clothes," and knows, and feels, and acts that she is dressed up! What is more humiliating than to see a sister-woman softly stealing glances down at the bow of ribbon on her breast, or the chain fixed thereon, or the dress trimmings, sitting admiring herself like a vain peacock? How common to see a girl with the prettiest side of her hat made to the "congregation side; to see her lean pensively on the hand that wears the gaudy show of rings; to see her sleeves a little short to show off the glittering bracelet; her neck bared beyond comfort to show the foamy white laces that rise and fall on her compressed bosom with every poor, short, imperfect respiration.

Oh, how hollow! Nothing stamps a woman's character as frivolous, vapid, sooner than to see this display of vanity.

I remember when I was a very little girl, so little that I toddled along to church in my bare feet, of my Aunt Abbie stopping me in the road and saying: "Chatty, I saw you looking down at the ruffle on your dress; that is not pretty—not lady-like. Whenever you have on a pretty dress, or any new clothes, you must act just as though you didn't know of it at all. Now I will show you how you ought to walk, and you must remember it, child."

And that woman—beautiful, and intellectual, and beloved—bade me stand still at the grassy roadside while she walked a few rods, and then back again. I remember distinctly her lithe, trim figure, the queenly poise of her head, the graceful shoulders thrown back, just as she appeared to the little barefoot child on that summer morning, long, long ago. We were walking in "the hollow," we called it, a scooped-out green dell, with dense thicket of blooming crab-trees on one side of the road and grassy meadow on the other. That "hollow" it is well high level with the broad fields that surround it now.

But the teachings of Aunt Abbie. How I did admire her! And then, as if to finish the lesson she had taught me, she took my hand again and led me a circuitous route, that went through the old burying-ground. Pausing at a sunken grave, she said: "We must all come to this; this is the end of our lives on earth. How can we be proud, or lifted up, or look down on another with scorn or hatred?"

And then she told me of the life beyond the grave—a beautiful life, with no sorrow in it, no tears, no trials. She must have made her talk very simple, so that the capacity of the little eight-years-old girl could comprehend it, for I remember it all, and understood it as clearly as I would now.

I hope the time will come soon in which this subject, that so materially concerns Mary, may be brought up and dwelt upon in a manner that may be for her edification.

One of the sweetest girls I ever saw, a perfect lady in all her ways, owed all to her one charm—her self-possession. I met her last fall at a convention; the best men and women in the State were there; no lady present received more attention than did Cecilia. I chanced to sit beside her one day, and, though I did not mean to do it, I can remember exactly how she was dressed. She was poor in this world's goods, and could not afford to dress well; but dress seemed to be the least thing in her thoughts. Had she been arrayed in royal velvet, she would have behaved no more like a princess. Her hat was a plain, coarse, black straw, trimmed with a little knot of velvet ribbons and bunch of little meadow grasses and leaves; her dress was black and white ninapence calico, made plain; a small double cape of black thibet or cashmere was about her shoulders; lace about her neck and wrists; good kid gloves; and that was all; and yet that calm, sweet, modest face and modest demeanor stamped her as one who "was a lady born."

Wednesday afternoon.—I was over to Millers for butter this forenoon, and did not get home until the girls had dinner almost ready. I had told Lottie to mop the floor in the dining-room preparatory to putting down the new carpet, and just as soon as I came in and sniffed a little I knew she had not done it well. It did not smell clean, like fresh water and fresh pine boards ought to. I said nothing, however, for the poor dear looked tired and worried, and her hair was frowzy, and her appearance was anything but tidy. After she had gone down to the Institute for the afternoon recitation, I put on the boiler, heated water, and mopped the floor thoroughly with hot soapsuds, wiped it off and rinsed it twice. Then I washed the chair-boards, and window-sills, and door-frames, and made the dining-room smell fresh and clean.

Some girls do mop that way. They will take a little drib of warmish water, perhaps in a pail that has been used for something else, and will drag the mop about in a listless, sleepy way, merely wetting the floor, while in reality they are leaving it dirtier than they found it. The right way, and indeed the only correct way, is to move every movable article out of the room, make the way clear, and then, with plenty of hot suds in a tub, scrub the floor with a broom, taking care not to splash the walls. Then with a mop gather up and wring out all the dirty water, wipe the floor dry, and then go over it with warm or hot water, clean. Scrub well with the broom, wipe up with the mop, and after that rinse with clear, cold water, and wipe it up with the mop after it has been washed out and made perfectly clean. That is the good old way our mothers scrubbed and mopped floors, and is the only way to do it well. Any good housekeeper can tell as soon as she goes into a room whether it has been honorably scrubbed or not. I must tell dear little Lottie about this sometime in an off-hand way, so that she will not surmise any hint. A mop should be taken out of the clasp, washed, rinsed and dried, and then put back and kept in a dry, airy place. I notice some of my girls drop the mop down wet and leave it.

We had a caller last evening—a young preacher from the West. He is a cordial, good fellow, but some of his ways are very funny. I should have sat back in the shadows and laughed a little, only that I wanted to set a good example for my girls.

The poor fellow! he rocked himself backward and forward in the big rocking-chair in a way that startled us for fear he would tip over and spill himself out. He is unmarried; and Professor McWilliams says he needs a fellow-worker, and is in search of one. I had to shake my head at Tudie and Midget for exchanging knowing looks at each other. Josephine was inquiring about her former pastor, now in the far West, and the young man, in his excess of good-will toward the aforesaid brother, remarked: "I'd rather hear him preach than to sit down and eat any time; his sermons are better than any thanksgiving dinner."

The girls teased Josephine a good deal about the young preacher who compared sermons to dinners.

By the way, Josephine cooked the dinner to-day. We had some flabby bits of veal that would not do to fry, and were not worth boiling, and too thin to roast, so she boiled them in just water enough to cook them, then made drop-dumplings of batter, and dropped in a spoonful at a time, and one in a place. They made a very nice dinner, and certainly it was an economical one. We have to study economy in our little home-nest. Indeed, I always had to, though, for we were poor in my father's house; and then my dear dead husband was only a tailor, and barely made a good living. The tailor's trade is not a lucrative one, especially in a country village.

Thursday morning.—I do not want to say anything against the dear people of Millwood, because they have been my friends all these years that I have lived among them; but I did think Parson Welland stirred them up one Sabbath at church lately. It seems that he was annoyed at the general behavior during service, and at last he had to speak of it. I don't know whether it is the custom in other congregations to bob the head around as soon as the door opens, or a footfall is heard in the aisle, I hope not. But here in Millwood every head turns and stays turned until the long look is satisfactory. If a little dog barks, or a baby pipes out a shrill cry, or a cow bawls out in the street, or a horse snorts, that sets the young people giggling. If any one should happen to fall, or blunder, it is a source of infinite amusement. If Jack Williams should happen to sit in the pew occupied by the young widow, Euna Shelley, then the younger part of the congregation will wink and blink at each other, and send notes or write comments in their hymn-books, and conduct themselves in a manner very unbecoming the place, and the day, and the occasion. So the parson dwelt a few moments on this subject. He said nothing annoyed a minister more than for people to turn their heads at every noise, twisting them about as though they were set on pivots, to look at every new arrival, to whisper, nod, make comments and behave in a light, frivolous manner. He said the minister often drew inspiration from a pair of attentive eyes, and if people only knew and felt the importance of good attention, and how much it contributed to his assistance, they would pay it most devoutly. Then he told what he had overheard a beautiful young lady say one evening when she was going home from service. She was walking before him, in the dark, her arm inlanked with another girl's. She was conversing fluently, and saying, "I always like to sit away up in front, so that my eye can take in the whole congregation. I like to see people when they come in, and see if there are any strangers, and how they are dressed. One often sees new fashions and new contrivances, and more than once I've seen something that helps me wonderfully toward working over some of my old clothes into new ones, that even my own folks wouldn't know they'd ever seen before."

I could not blame our pastor for dwelling rather pointedly upon this theme. Before he dropped the subject he told us that when we were at service among other denominations it would be courteous and kind if we adopted their ways; kneeling when they knelt, sitting, standing, bowing the head or whatever their customs were. He said he had frequently been pained at baptisms to see members of other denominations look upon the ordinance with derision, smile, turn away or behave in some manner that stamped them as very unladylike or ungentelemanly. All these sacred ceremonies and ordinances should be witnessed with a sense of profound reverence and respect.

I was very glad Brother Welland dwelt upon this subject, not that any of my girls particularly needed to be reminded, but none of us can be too cautious in our observances of the Lord's day.

By earnest thought and prayer we should bring our minds away from the cares and occupations of the week, and we should endeavor to centre them on thoughts of sacred things.

Poor little Tудle, while she lay cradled in my lap, she said: "I do wish, Aunt Chatty, that I could make myself mind when I am in church. I want to think of what the preacher says, and know what the beautiful hymns mean, and while I am trying my very hardest the first thing I know I am thinking of my lessons, or the dear baby at home, or wondering how much some lady's shawl cost, or wishing my hat could be made over into another shape, or that my feather was blue instead of black; but, then, auntie, I mean to keep on trying."

Poor little Tудle! she will find hard work, I fear.

A CONTENTED mind is of more worth than all the treasure of both the Indies; and he that is master of himself in an innocent and homely retreat, enjoys all the wealth and curiosities of the universe.

WAITING.

(See Engraving.)

SHE had gazed from the window long,
Down the dim and crowded street;
She had listened with ear down-bent
To the tread of the passing feet.

She had watched the last flush die out
From the cold, gray, winter sky,
And the first pale star look sadly down;
She had greeted it with a sigh.

Like a flash in the street below,
The lamplighter sped along;
And solemnly, faint and low
Came the notes of an old street song,

They were singing a well-known lay
She often had sung to him
Long ago, in the country home;
And her eyes with tears grew dim.

But she turned from the window away,
And glanced round the home-like room;
Tears, tears must not greet him of foolish heart;
I know that he soon will come.

And so, woman-like, with a half-breathed sigh,
She shuts out the dreary night,
Draws close the curtains, and tends the fire,
Till the little room glows with light.

She is kneeling before the hearth,
Little wife, with an anxious face;
For the wearying thought comes back again—
He is late; time wears on apace.

And the firelight gleams on the soft brown hair,
And kisses the rounded cheek;
Deep thoughts are thronging the woman's heart,
What a woman's lips fear to speak.

"I love him! I love him!" she whispers low;
"He is all the world to me;
But, ah! husband mine, thou must never know
How this frail heart worships thee.

"Yet I often think, when I'm waiting here—
Watching and waiting alone—
What if the world steal away his heart,
Which is now my own—my own?"

"For what am I but a simple girl,
With only my love to give?
And yet he tells me I am more dear
Than aught that this world can give.

"But when, as to-night, he is late—so late,
My heart sinketh faint and low;
But all these fancies, my best beloved,
Thou must never, ah! never know."

Little she dreams of the loving eyes
That are watching her from the door,
And how deep, deep, in her husband's heart,
The love groweth more and more;

Till, as he watches her kneeling there,
She seems, to his fancy quaint,
Like the guardian angel of his home,
A woman, and yet a saint.

Saint and angel she is to him,
Fond, loving woman beside;
More fair and dear as the trial-tried wife
Than the day she was his bride.

What, Nelly! musing? a hand is laid
On the fair and down-bent brow;
And stands beside her the watched-for one,
Ah! where are her sad thoughts now?

All vanished and fled at the well-known voice,
At the clasp of the fond embrace;
And the firelight falls on no fairer sight
Than the young wife's happy face.

HOW TO BEAUTIFY OUR HOMES.

HUNDREDS of ladies every year make generous collections of the treasures of our northern woods, such as mosses, ferns, trailing evergreens, etc., but lay them away in some closet to be forgotten. Doubtless this is, in many cases, owing to a lack of ingenuity in devising means for their use. The following hints may be suggestive to those who can better execute than plan.

Ferns of every kind, from the delicate, feathery fronds to those of the coarsest texture, may be used in hundreds of ways.

For a window transparency.—Form a bouquet of pressed ferns and delicate grasses upon the finest tissue paper, white or tinted, according to taste, each spray must be slightly touched with mucilage to fasten it to the paper.

Over this place a picture-mat with oval center, and a glass same size, and bind over the edges of both with black ribbon a half an inch wide, or with black paper, in imitation of the passee-partout frames. A spray of bright autumn leaves, or some pressed flowers, can be added if desired.

To make illuminated texts.—Mark the letters carefully upon card-board with a lead pencil, cover them one at a time with mucilage, then arrange tiny bits of ferns over them. Tiny pressed flowers might add to the pleasing effect if skillfully introduced. Take, for instance, the text, "No cross, no crown," make the cross of birch-bark with mosses and ferns at the base, and a vine of pressed cypress with scarlet star-like blossoms climbing upon it. Cover the letters as described above, and make the crown of pressed golden-rod, or of ferns after they have assumed their yellow, autumn hue.

Crosses, anchors, lyres, etc. may be made by slightly gumming together ferns, maiden hair, and autumn leaves. These have a very pretty effect when pinned upon muslin or lace curtains, or upon window-shades of white material. A SUBSCRIBER.

SPEAK A CHEERFUL WORD.

DID you never go out in the morning with a heart so depressed and saddened, that a pall seemed spread over all the world. But on meeting some friend who spoke cheerily for a minute or two, if only upon indifferent matters, you have felt your spirits wonderfully lightened. Even a child dropping in to your house on an errand, has often brought in a ray of sunshine which did not depart when he went his way again. It is a blessed thing to speak a cheerful word when you can. "The heart knoweth its own bitterness" the world over, and those who live in palaces are not exempt, and good words to such hearts "are like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

Even strangers we casually meet by the way, in the travellers' waiting room, are unconsciously influenced by the words and tones we use. It is the one with pleasant words on his lips, to whom the stranger in a strange land, turns for advice and direction in his perplexities. Take it as a compliment if some poor wayfarer comes to you to direct him which street or which train to take, your manner has struck him as belonging to one he can trust.

It is hard sometimes to speak a pleasant word, when the shadows rest on our own hearts; but nothing will tend more to lighten our spirits than doing good to another.

When you have no opportunity to speak a cheering word, you can often send a full beam of sunshine into the heart of some sorrowing, absent friend, by sitting down and writing a good, warm-hearted letter.

Evenings with the Poets.

FEBRUARY RAIN.

BY HELEN L. BOSTWICK.

STARLESS is the night, and dreary;
And my ear is very weary
Listening to the wind's wild sighing,
And the wave's more hoarse replying—
To the fitful dash and flutter
Of dead vines against the shutter;
To the pattering and the beating,
To the surging and retreating,
And the riotous refrain
Of the February rain.

If I slumber, dream I only
Of all things most stark and lonely:
Beetling cliffs, with shadows dismal,
Lost in blackest depths abysmal;
Spectral horsemen, madly riding—
Spectral sails, in moonlight gliding—
Lightning-scar'd and blacken'd branches,
Clicking, shuddering avalanches—
Strange that thought should catch such train
From the February rain!

Yet, I know the kind earth keepeth
Every little drop that creepeth
Down among the roots of flowers,
To make glad the April hours,
'Midst the roots of grains and grasses,
Whispering, as the cold flood passes,
'Lo—neath aspect of affliction,
Nature's holiest benediction!
Fairer crown shall Summer gain
For the February rain!"

And from this I fain would borrow Comfort in my night of sorrow;
Trusting that its clouds, distilling
Now such bitter tears, and filling
All my heart with doubt and sadness,
Yet shall water germs of gladness;
Flowers, whose bloom shall languish never;
Pure resolve, and strong endeavor—

Hopes serene, and chastened feeling—
Clear-eyed faith, to Heaven upstealing—
Patient-waiting—self-denial—
Till I bless this stormy trial,
Even as flower, and fruit, and grain,
Bless the February rain!

SLOW AND SURE.

BY ALICE CAREY.

UPON the orchard rain must fall,
And soak from branch to root,
And blossoms bloom and fall withal,
Before the fruit is fruit.

The farmer needs must sow and till,
And wait the wheaten bread,
Then cradle, thresh and go to mill,
Before the bread is bread.

Swift heels may get the early shout,
But, spite of all the din,
It is the patient holding out
That makes the winner win.

THE PARADOX.

BY CHARLOTTE F. BATES.

I WISH that the day were over,
The week, the month and the year;
Yet life is not such a burden
That I wish the end were near.

And my birthdays come so swiftly
That I meet them grudgingly:
Would it be so were I longing
For the life that is to be?

Nay: the soul, though ever reaching
For that which is out of sight,
Yet soars with reluctant motion,
Since there is no backward flight.

ANTICIPATION.

WHEN failing health, or cross event,
Or dull monotony of days,
Has brought me into discontent,
That darken round me like a haze,
I find it wholesome to recall
Those chieftest goods my life has known,
Those whitest days, that brightened all
The checkered seasons that are flown.

No year has passed but gave me some;
O unborn years, nor one of you—
So from the past I learn—shall come Without such precious tribute due
I can be patient, since amid
The days that seem so overcast,
Such future golden hours are hid
As those I see amid the past.

Chambers' Journal.

CHARLES SUMNER.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

GARLANDS upon his grave,
And flowers upon his hearse,
And to the tender heart and brave
The tribute of this verse.

His was the troubled life,
The conflict and the pain,
The grief, the bitterness of strife,
The honor without stain.

Like Winkelried, he took Into his manly breast
The sheaf of hostile spears, and broke
A path for the oppressed;

Then from the fatal field
Upon a nation's heart
Borne like a warrior on his shield!—
So should the brave depart.

Death takes us by surprise,
And stays our hurrying feet;
The great design unfinished lies,
Our lives are incomplete.

But in the dark unknown
Perfect their circles seem,
Even as a bridge's arch of stone
Is rounded in the stream.

Alike are life and death,
When life in death survives,
And the uninterrupted breath
Inspires a thousand lives.

Were a star quenched on high,
For ages would its light,
Still travelling downward from the sky,
Shine on our mortal sight,

So when a great man dies,
For years beyond our ken,
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

SOLOMON RAY.

BY EUGENE J. HALL.

A HARD, close man was Solomon Ray,
Nothing of value he gave away;
He hoarded and saved;
He pinched and shaved;
And the more he had the more he craved.

The hard-earned dollars he toiled to gain
Brought him little but care and pain;
For little he spent,
And all he lent
He made it bring him twenty per cent.

Such was the life of Solomon Ray.
The years went by, and his hair grew gray,
His cheeks grew thin,
And his soul within
Grew hard as the dollars he worked to win.

But he died, one day, as all men must,
For life is fleeting, and man but dust,
The heirs were gay,
That laid him away,
And that was the end of Solomon Ray.

They quarrelled now, who had little cared
For Solomon Ray while his life was spared.
His lands were sold,
And his hard-earned gold
All went to the lawyers, I am told.

Yet men will cheat, and pinch, and save,
Nor carry their treasures beyond the grave.
All their gold some day
Will melt away,
Like the selfish savings of Solomon Ray.

"PIPSEY."

CALCINED plaster is what we use to repair our lamps when the mouldings have become loosened. Fill the cavity with plaster, which you must first wet with cold or warm water; then set the glass firmly and hold it in place for a few minutes. It hardens quickly—and your lamp is as strong as when new.

That starch was nice, Pipsey. But when you make again, just put your sifted flour and cold water in a pan, and shake, with a moderate movement, for a minute or two; all the lumps will disappear, it is smooth, all ready for the boiling water; you will see that rubbing or dabbling your hands in it is quite unnecessary. Indeed, you can make it with your best "allpac" on, if you choose, without soiling.

The hands—how people do misuse and abuse these serving members; thrusting them, without mercy, into boiling heats or icy chillness; aye, do some not actually use them for hoes, shovels and tongs, spoons, ladles and forks, little caring that the Creator has given them reasoning powers to construct implements to save and coverings to protect them.

Oh, dear Pipsey, if I had your nice way of telling what I wish to, (writing, I mean,) I would like to give a chapter to show the many ways I have learned to save my hands; first, from necessity, and now because I find it easy and more comfortable.

Dear old friend! you have advised, instructed and benefited us all the way. My oracle! So, when Mrs. R. came to me, troubled because baby Maud, with the aid of a big, sweet apple, had traced indelible patterns on a choice article—a souvenir, made by hands that have laid down their work forever—I was sorry, and said, I'll ask Pipsey. Can you tell what will remove those stains? Yours, EXIE.

GENERAL DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING SOUPS.

LEAN, JUICY BEEF, MUTTON AND VEAL, form the basis of all good soups; therefore it is advisable to procure those pieces which afford the richest succulence, and such as are fresh-killed. Stale meat renders them bad, and fat is not so well adapted for making them. The principal art in composing good, rich soup, is so to proportion the several ingredients that the flavor of one shall not predominate over another, and that all the articles of which it is composed, shall form an agreeable whole. To accomplish this, care must be taken that the roots and herbs are perfectly well cleaned, and that the water is proportioned to the quantity of meat and other ingredients. Generally a quart of water may be allowed to a pound of meat for soups, and half the quantity for gravies. In making soups or gravies, gentle stewing or simmering is incomparably the best. It may be remarked, however, that a really good soup can never be made but in a well-closed vessel, although, perhaps, greater wholesomeness is obtained by an occasional exposure to the air. Soups will, in general, take from three to six hours doing, and are much better prepared the day before they are wanted. When the soup is cold, the fat may be much more easily and completely removed; and when it is poured off, care must be taken not to disturb the settlings at the bottom of the vessel, which are so fine that they will escape through a sieve. A tamis is the best strainer, and if the soup is strained while it is hot, let the tamis or cloth be previously soaked in cold water. Clear soups must be perfectly transparent, and thickened soups about the consistence of cream. To thicken and give body to soups and gravies, potato-mucilage, arrow-root, bread-rasplings, isinglass, flour and butter, barley, rice or oatmeal, in a little water rubbed well together, are used. A piece of boiled beef pounded to a pulp, with a bit of butter and flour, and rubbed through a sieve, and gradually incorporated with the soup, will be found an excellent addition. When the soup appears to be too thin or too weak, the cover of the boiler should be taken off, and the contents allowed to boil till some of the watery parts have evaporated; or some of the thickening materials above mentioned should be added. When soups and gravies are kept from day to day in hot weather, they should be warmed up every day, and put into fresh scalded pans or tureens, and placed in a cool cellar. In temperate weather, every other day may be sufficient.

VARIOUS HERBS AND VEGETABLES are required for the purpose of making soups and gravies. Of these the principal are—Scotch barley, pearl barley, wheat flour, oatmeal, bread-rasplings, peas, beans, rice, vermicelli, macaroni, isinglass, potato-mucilage, mushroom or mushroom ketchup, champignons, parsnips, carrots, beetroot, turnips, garlic, shalots and onions. Sliced onions, fried with butter and flour till they are browned, and then rubbed through a sieve, are excellent to heighten the color and flavor of brown soups and sauces, and form the basis of many of the fine relishes furnished by the cook. The older and drier the onion, the stronger will be its flavor. Leeks, cucumber or burnet vinegar; celery or celery seed pounded. The latter, though equally strong, does not impart the delicate sweetness of the fresh vegetable; and when used as a substitute, its flavor should be corrected by the addition of a bit of sugar. Cress-reed, parsley, common thyme, lemon thyme, orange thyme, knotted marjoram, sage, mint, winter savory and basil. As fresh green basil is seldom to be procured, and its fine flavor is soon lost, the best way of preserving the extract is by pouring wine on the fresh leaves.

FOR THE SEASONING OF SOUPS, bay-leaves, tomato, tarragon, chervil, burnet, allspice, cinnamon, ginger, nutmeg, clove, mace, black and white pepper, essence of anchovy, lemon-peel and juice, and Seville orange juice, are all taken. The latter imparts a finer flavor than the lemon, and the acid is much milder. These materials, with wine, mushroom ketchup, Harvey's sauce, tomato sauce, combined in various proportions, are, with other ingredients, manipulated into an almost endless variety of excellent soups and gravies. Soups, which are intended to constitute the principal part of a meal, certainly ought not to be flavored like sauces, which are only designed to give a relish to some particular dish.

CONTRIBUTED RECIPES.

ALMOND CAKE.—Cup and a half sugar; half-cup butter; half-cup milk (sweet); four eggs; two cups flour; teaspoon cream tartar; half-teaspoon soda, stirred in. If baked well, this will prove exceedingly nice.

CREAM PIE.—Pint of scalded milk; two eggs; half-cup flour, mixed with milk; cup sugar; any flavor that is preferred—almond is excellent. Use cup-cake, or any light cake, slightly warm. Pour the custard over it.

ORANGE CAKE (very nice).—Five eggs—the whites to be used for frosting; two cups of white sugar; four tablespoonfuls of butter; half of sweet milk; one and a half teaspoonfuls of baking-powder; two and a half cups of flour; the juice of one orange. Bake in four cakes. Put frosting between, and sprinkle the grated orange peel on it. Frost the top. Extra.

TEACUP PUDDING.—Three eggs; two cups of sour cream; two of sour milk; one teaspoonful of saleratus; one tablespoonful of molasses. To be steamed in cups three-quarters of an hour. To be eaten with sauce. Half the quantity sufficient for four persons. This is good if made right.

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

THE month of February presents no marked changes in the fashion of our clothing. The modes were settled upon in December and January, and it is yet too early to see any indications of spring styles. The heaviest goods are worn in the outer clothing, which is cut in the form of jackets, sacques and polonaises. We see less of the costume en suite this season than for a number of years, the dressy and coquettish English jackets in cloth and velvet being quite generally substituted in the place of the polonaise of the same material as the dress.

Métallisé, which we have already described in a former number of the magazine, is used for petticoats to be worn with court trains, and for front gores to silk dresses, as well as for trimmings, but it cannot be called a genuine success for entire outside garments.

Very showy jackets and tablier overskirts are made by covering them with a heavy braiding or embroidery in a contrasting color. We saw, in one of our fashionable establishments, a jacket and tablier of gray, braided in a running vine pattern of brown, which was very effective in its appearance.

Bugles have never been so much worn as now. They dot the lace which trims the garments; they are sometimes made to bespangle the garments themselves; they are woven in heavy fringes. It is not uncommon to see a polonaise so literally loaded with them that its weight is really burdensome to the wearer. How foolish this is we need not say. This rage for bugles is likely to be short-lived. Those, therefore, who are making up good garments, with the hope that they may serve them for years, had best by all means avoid them; for when they go out of fashion, which must be shortly, they will be very much out of fashion.

Heavy worsted fringes, and ball trimmings, are used to trim the heavy, clinging, coarse, woven fabrics which are so much in favor this season. The gray, or light-brown and white-mixed feather trimmings are very stylish and very popular, and comparatively inexpensive. They harmonize beautifully with many of the camel's-hair velvets, woollen corduroys, fancy twills and plaids, but their most striking effects are produced by contrasts with royal purples, blues, dark greens and blacks.

Velvets in bias folds, plaits and ruffles, and in various combinations, are used with as fashionable effects as heretofore, and velvet ribbons are also once more in high favor.

The hats most commonly seen this season are of felt. They are stylish, becoming and cheap. They are, for the most part, trimmed simply and inexpensively with velvet and feathers of a tint to match, flowers and laces being inadmissible upon them.

For the hair, knots of ribbon are worn at home, as well as jets, and top and side combs of either jet or shell. Ostrich-tips, wings and flowers are prevailing favorites for full dress, provided the lady has no jewels for her locks.

The biographies of these three men, neither of them of any special note, are rich in recollections and anecdotes of the most illustrious persons of a past generation. The volume, the contents of which have been gleaned from these biographies, is exceedingly entertaining, at the same time that it gives us glimpses into the history and character of these illustrious persons, such as their own legitimate biographies do not afford.

Rhymes and Jingles. By Mary Mapes Dodge, Author of "The Silver Skates," etc. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co. This is a treasury of good things for the youngest, charmingly illustrated, and choice in everything. Life of Rear Admiral Paul Jones. By John S. C. Abbott. New York: Dodd & Mead. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co. This naval hero of a past generation worthily finds a place among the "pioneers and patriots of America." His life reads like romance, so full is it of startling interest and adventure. This is a book that all boys will prize.

Deutsche Rundschau. Herausgegeben von Julius Bodenberger. Erster Jahrgang, Heft 1, October, 1874. Heft 2, November, 1874. Berlin: Verlag von Gehrüder Paetel. Through the courtesy of the New York agent, we have received the first and second numbers of this new German periodical. It is a magazine of the highest class, and contains articles from the pens of the best writers in Germany. It is designed to occupy, in German periodical literature, a position like that filled in France by the "Revue des Deux Mondes." To the students of German, who are rapidly increasing in this country, as well as to the large class of cultivated readers of German birth or blood among us, we know nothing of a similar character that we can more heartily recommend than this magazine. The first number, among other articles, contains a characteristic tale of Auerbach; a forcible essay on the first partition of Poland; by Heinrich von Sybel; an interesting scientific treatise called "Botanic Problems," by Prof. Ferd. Cohn; and also a charming story by Theodore Storm; "Nerina," a tale by Paul Heyse; "Talents and Education," by Edward Larkee; and "The Polar Explorations of Our Time," by Fred. von Hellwald, form a portion of the contents of the second number. Stecher & Wolff, No. 2, Bond Street, New York, are the principal American agents.

Caleb Krinkle. A Story of American Life. By Charles Carleton Coffin, "Carleton." Boston: Lee & Shepard. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co. This is a cleverly-written book, in which the characters are well and contrastingly delineated, the scenes vividly described and the action natural and life-like.

Our Helen. By Sophie May, Author of "Little Prudie Stories." Boston: Lee & Shepard. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

That Queer Girl. By Virginia F. Townsend. Boston: Lee & Shepard. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

These two volumes belong to a series called "The Maidenhood Series," which is now in course of publication. The volumes of this series are all superior. "Our Helen" is a charming story, as all will feel assured of when we say that Sophie May writes as well for youth as she does for the little folks. Of Miss Townsend's abilities as a writer of fiction we surely need not speak to the readers of the HOME MAGAZINE, who were for so many years familiar with her stories. The present tale is an excellent one, and the book has numerous illustrations.

The Exhibition Drama. By George M. Baker. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This volume contains dramas, comedies and farces, adapted for private theatricals, home representations, holiday and school exhibitions. They are prepared with special reference to the needs and requirements of amateur companies, and will meet with a hearty welcome from the public.

The Song Fountain. By Wm. Tillinghast and D. P. Horton. New York: J. W. Schermerhorn & Co. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Bancroft & Co., 512 Arch Street. This volume is specially adapted to the needs of the singing-school and for the day-school in which music is taught. The music is simple yet pleasing, and the collection is such as will find favor with musicians.

The Dorcas Club; or, Our Girls Afloat. By Oliver Optic. Boston: Lee & Shepard. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co. This is the fifth volume of the "Yacht Club Series," and it is a story which will interest girls equally with boys.

Sowed by the Wind; or, The Poor Boy's Fortune. By Elijah Kellogg. Boston: Lee & Shepard. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co. Mr. Kellogg has written three series of juvenile books, which have become exceedingly popular. He now begins a fourth series, to be known as "The Forest Gem Series." Each story will be complete in itself, and all, if we may judge from the volume before us, will be entertaining, instructive and handsomely illustrated.

Little Songs. By Mrs. Eliza Lee Follen. With new illustrations. Boston: Lee & Shepard. It is scarcely less than thirty-five or forty years since these charming "Little Songs" first appeared, and for which thousands of mothers and their little children have ever since been glad and grateful. They are among the simplest, sweetest and best to be found. In this new edition, with its exquisite illustrations and perfect typography, it cannot fail to become more widely popular than ever.

Hazel-Blossoms. By John Greenleaf Whittier.

Boston: James Osgood & Co. A collection of the more recent poems of the author, in a tasteful volume that will find its way into the hands of thousands of his admirers. "The Golden Wedding of Longwood;" "Conductor Bradley;" "John Underhill;" "The Friends' Burial," etc., are among the number. But the chief attraction for many readers will be found in the selection which the author has made from poems left by his late sister, Elizabeth H. Whittier, and which he introduces to the public in some fitting and tender remarks. They show her to have been almost as rarely gifted as her brother.

Materialization of Spirits.

THE recent exposure, in this city, of the "Katie King" deception, should be a salutary lesson to those who are inclined to give much credence to what are known as spiritual manifestations. In all cases where, through pretended mediumistic influence, there is an apparent suspension of the ordinary laws of nature, fraud may be assumed. The ever-present power of God in nature cannot be set aside by weak, foolish or tricky men and women; and whenever it seems to be done we may be very sure that delusion or artifice is present.

The "spirit photograph" humbug, which science soon exposed, has been followed by a grosser deception—nothing less than a pretended materialization of spirit! And what is remarkable, we find men of education and intelligence quick to endorse this later absurdity, and to bewilder weaker minds by attempted explanations of what they regard as a new phenomena—explanations that only show how really ignorant they are of the true relation of matter to spirit.

All the conditions attendant on the various seances at which it is pretended that spirits become visible to sight and tangible to touch, are singularly favorable to deception; and the marvel is that so many sensible people are made to believe in jugglery that is often of the coarsest kind. Not only did this pretended Katie King become materialized as to sight, but she was able, in a few minutes, to clothe herself with such real flesh that it felt solid, soft and warm in your hand—you could actually feel her pulse beat—as one testified! And all this real flesh and blood would dissolve itself away in a few moments! Into such strange delusions were many who witnessed these exhibitions thrown, that they presented this spirit of Katie King (who assumed to be the daughter of an English freebooter, who lived one or two hundred years ago,) with bouquets, crosses, jewelry, oranges, etc., to be spiritualized by her and presented to friends in the other world! The discovery of many of these things in the possession of a young woman who confessed to having played the rôle of Katie, was, of course, a sad disappointment to those who had fondly believed their offerings of love transferred to the other side and in the hands of their departed ones!

We trust that the exposure of this transparent fraud will open the eyes of many to the folly of giving up their reason and senses to such gross delusions.

To show how completely this may sometimes be done, even with persons of more than ordinary acuteness of mind, we quote the following brief statement from an article, by Robert Dale Owen, in the Atlantic Monthly for December. He says:

"When I read that, 'the doors being shut,' Jesus suddenly appeared among His affrighted followers, or that, after talking with two disciples at Emmaus, He 'vanished out of their sight,' I see no more reason for disbelieving this than for rejecting a thousand other historical incidents of an ancient date; seeing that, in a lighted room and with the doors so securely closed that entrance or exit was impossible, I have seen a materialized form, that had spoken to me a few minutes before, disappear under my very eyes, and reappear and walk about as before; and this at a distance from me of seven or eight feet only, and not once, but on five or six different occasions. In each case I had taken such vigilant precautions beforehand against possible deception, that I had no alternative except to admit that these marvelous phenomena were realities, or else to assume that the senses of sight, hearing and touch are witnesses utterly unworthy to be trusted."

And yet the senses of even Mr. Owen, with all his intelligence, acuteness and precaution, were deceived, as he has since publicly confessed. A man and his wife (Mr. and Mrs. Holmes,) and a confederate who personated Katie King, with the simple apparatus of a cabinet, set against a window or door, having a movable panel in the back, were able, night after night, for months, to deceive Mr. Owen and other credulous persons, who paid their money to see, and touch, and talk with departed spirits re-clothed in real flesh and blood! So thoroughly were many of them deceived by these impostors that not a few really thought they saw the faces of departed loved ones in the india-rubber masks that were blown up by Mr. Holmes, who was inside of the cabinet pretending to be in a mediumistic trance, and presented at a little aperture facing the spell-bound audiences!

Mr. Owen, in his article in the Atlantic Monthly, takes the ground that there is no such thing as a miracle—that is, a suspension of natural law; and he is able to accept as true the appearance of our Lord after His resurrection on the theory of a possible materialization of spirit. A much simpler explanation may be found in the declaration of St. Paul, that there "is a spiritual body" as well as a natural body. If there is a spiritual body, then it must have spiritual senses, and all the powers and faculties needed for an intelligent and useful life in the spiritual world, whenever the man's natural life dies and his natural body is resolved again into the elements from which it was taken. So long as man is in the natural world, these senses of his spiritual body are normally closed. But scripture record, and the experience of mankind in all ages, show that, under peculiar and rare conditions, the spiritual eyes of some men have been opened, so that they could see, for a brief period, some inhabitant of the spiritual world. How much easier to believe that our Saviour, after His resurrection, opened the inner eyes of those who saw Him, than that He clothed Himself again with material substance. In this, there would be no setting aside of any natural law; but a simple opening of eyes that had as real an existence and sight-power as the natural eyes. But in a materialization of spirit, if it were actually to take place, there would be a violation of the laws attendant on flesh-making and the building-up of a material, human body with all its marvellous congeries of vital organs, nerves and tissues.

So far, the world has gained nothing as to useful knowledge, or incentives to a higher Christian morality, from any form of this so-called spiritualism. While, on the other hand, its path through modern society is strewn with the saddest wrecks—reason dethroned, homes destroyed and virtue cast down. It matters not as to the truth or falsity of any of its assumed manifestations. By their fruits they must be judged. If spirits do really communicate through mediums, then it is very plain, from the character of the communications received, that, for the most part, those who talk with men are of a low order, and that few of them, if in the flesh, would be tolerated among intelligent people or in good society.

Reader, if you have not meddled with this thing, take our advice and let it alone; if, on the other hand, you have been unhappily drawn within its influences, get out of them as quickly as possible. If you are in search of genuine spiritual truth you will never find it here.

Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

SCARCELY a day passes without a record by the public press of some shocking and fiendish cruelty to helpless little children, at which the heart grows sick. For years we have had societies in most of our large cities for the prevention of cruelty to animals, but, until within a few weeks, there has been no movement towards a society for the protection of children. Gladly do we announce the organization of such a society in New York. It is in the hands of some of the foremost men of that city, and they are evidently in earnest. Among the officers of the society we notice the names of John D. Wright, Peter Cooper, William E. Dodge, Elbridge T. Gerry, Cornelius Vanderbilt, John J. Cisco, Henry Burgh, August Belmont, Theodore Roosevelt, and other men of wealth, prominence and influence.

The constitution thus defines the scope and purpose of this society.

1st. To rescue little children of this State (New York) from the cruelty and demoralization which neglect, abandonment and improper treatment engender.

2d. To aid by all lawful means in the enforcement of the laws intended for their protection and benefit.

3d. To secure by like means the prompt conviction and punishment of all persons violating such laws, and especially of such persons as cruelly ill treat and shamefully neglect such little children of whom they claim the care, custody or control.

Most earnestly do we utter a "God speed!" to the work of this new society. How pressing the need for its care and protection of children may be seen from the following paragraph which we clip from the New York Tribune.

"The number of vagrant and neglected children in the city of New York when the last census was taken, was twenty-four per cent. of the whole number. By these we mean the utterly impoverished class who swarm in idleness about the alleys and tenement houses, or attempt to earn a miserable living by working in factories at an age when a child with a fair chance for its life would be in its mother's arms, or kept close by her side. Over three thousand children, from four to eight years old, were found in different manufactories kept at work from ten to fourteen hours a day. The time of labor has been legally reduced; but the poor babies are at work still, with the thin dwarfed bodies, overgrown heads and yellow skins which make them appear a mere nightmare of childhood."

Trade and thrift are often as cruel to children as vice and evil passions; and from the one as well as from the other they need protection.

But not alone in New York are children treated with shameless inhumanity. Their moans and cries go up from every city, and town, and village in the whole land; and christian men and women can no longer disregard these sorrowful appeals for help and stand guiltless in the sight of God. Let each city, and town, and neighborhood have its "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." If every minister of the Gospel throughout the land would bring this subject strongly before his people, and urge them to take part in a movement for the protection of abused and neglected children, a new public sentiment would speedily be created, and the conditions of thousands and tens of thousands of suffering little ones, be changed for the better.

Ancient Civilization.

THE antiquities found in the Island of Cypress by General Cesnola, and placed on exhibition in New York, are very curious and remarkable. In his explorations, he uncovered an ancient Greek cemetery, and beneath it found an older Phœnician cemetery, in which he opened nearly three thousand tombs, taking from them articles buried with the dead, consisting of pottery, household utensils, glassware and jewelry. The Island of Cypress was, in ancient times, very populous, containing some four millions of people, who represented the highest civilization of the period. Now it has only about a hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants. The articles found by General Cesnola number nearly thirty thousand, and are valuable as illustrating the manners and customs of the various races which have occupied the island. Among them are articles of jewelry three or four thousand years old, and very much resembling the ornaments worn by ladies in our day. The ear-rings have clasps for attaching them to the ear without its being bored. Egyptian customs are illustrated by groups of small statuary similar to those of Rogers's, in which their funeral processions and other events of daily life are represented. All these objects were buried with the dead, and now, coming to the light, are the means by which we of this later age may know something of the habits, customs and domestic life of races and people about whom history gives only a meager account.

Postal Card Abuse.

THE writing of scurrilous, insulting or offensive communications on postal cards, has been one of abuses attendant on our new and cheap method of correspondence. Mean-spirited, ill-natured and spiteful persons indulge in this species of annoyance, which is sometimes very great. The sending of bills and duns is also a common practice with some, where they have a creditor who from neglect or lack of means is dilatory in making payments. All this is wrong, and those who do it render themselves liable to prosecution. In England, this misuse of postal cards is punished by law; and we are glad to see that a suit has been brought in New York against a person for sending an improper card.

The law provides the means for collecting debts which any creditor can use. Dunning by postal cards, or in any other annoying or humiliating way, is not one of these; and creditors who resort to such methods render themselves liable to a suit at law.

The Sister of the Poet Whittier.

IN our notice, this month, of Whittier's last volume, "Hazel-Blossoms," we referred to the poems by his sister, Elizabeth H. Whittier, which are appended to the volume. In his introduction to these poems, the brother says:

"I have ventured, in compliance with the desire of dear friends of my beloved sister, to add to this little volume the few poetical pieces which she left behind her. As she was very distrustful of her own powers, and altogether without ambition for literary distinction, she shunned everything like publicity, and found far greater happiness in generous appreciation of the gifts of her friends, than in the cultivation of her own. Yet it has always seemed to me that, had her health, sense of duty and fitness, and her extreme self-distrust permitted, she might have taken a high place among lyrical singers. These poems, with, perhaps, two or three exceptions, afford but slight indications of the inward life of the writer, who had an almost morbid dread of spiritual and intellectual egotism, or of her tenderness of sympathy, chastened mirthfulness and pleasant play of thought and fancy, when her shy, beautiful soul opened like a flower in the warmth of social communion."

This is tenderly and beautifully said. The specimen of Miss Whittier's poetry which we give below justifies the brother's estimate of her ability.

THE BRIDAL VEIL.

"Dear Anna, when I brought her veil,
Her white veil on her wedding-night,
Threw o'er my thin, brown hair its folds,
And, laughing, turned me to the light.

"See, Bessie, see! you wear at last
The bridal veil, foresworn for years!"
She saw my face—her laugh was hushed,
Her happy eyes were filled with tears.

"With kindly haste and trembling hand
She drew away the gauzy mist;
'Forgive, dear heart!' her sweet voice said;
Her loving lips my forehead kissed.

"We passed from out the searching light;
The summer night was calm and fair:
I did not see her pitying eyes,
I felt her soft hand smoothe my hair.

"Her tender love unlocked my heart;
'Mid falling tears, at last, I said,
'Foresworn, indeed, to me that veil,
Because I only love the dead.'

"She stood, one moment, statue-still,
And, musing, spake in undertone,
'The living love may colder grow;
The dead is safe with God alone!'"

THE GRAND CASCADE AT CHATSWORTH.

CHATSWORTH.

BY MARION KNIGHT.

IN the vicinity of all our larger towns and cities, within a radius varying from five to fifty miles, wealth and taste, of late years, have, with a rapidity that seems almost like magic, been building up for their fortunate possessors thousands of beautiful homes, enhancing the natural charms of some of the loveliest scenery in the world with the exquisite artistic graces which are the creation of the architect and the landscape gardener. Many of these homes, especially those within reach of our greater eastern cities, may even lay claim to a sort of grandeur as well as beauty. Yet, with all that wealth has lavished upon them, and with all the sublime and beautiful accessories with which nature has environed them, how insignificant, how taudry, one might almost say, do they seem as compared with those magnificent seats in which reside the old aristocratic families of England, and of which Mrs. Hemans so melodiously sings:

"The stately homes of England,
How beautiful they stand
Amidst their tall ancestral trees,
O'er all the pleasant land!"

It is of one of the most stately of these English homes, which seem to have grown rather than to have been built, around which cluster the associations of centuries, and upon which generation after generation has lavished the resources of unbounded wealth, that I propose, in this paper, to give some little account.

Chatsworth, the "Palace of the Peak," as it is sometimes called, merits more justly, perhaps, than any other house in England, the epithet of "stately." It is situated in the most beautiful part of Derbyshire, on the banks of the romantic Derwent, about one hundred and fifty miles, in a north-westerly direction, from London. The entire domain comprises an area of about one thousand two hundred acres, and it would be difficult to find anywhere, in the same space, so many natural advantages of hill and valley, wood and water, ragged rock and verdant plain, where beauties of one kind or other crowd together so thickly. When we reflect that all these natural attractions have been enhanced by "every means the most poetic imagination could conceive, and unbounded wealth accomplish," we can easily give credit to the statement of its historian, that Chatsworth "is foremost among the finest and most charming seats in all England." It is the home of William before the year 1706. Its noble owner, William Cavendish, third Earl and first Duke of Devonshire, did not live long to enjoy the beauties his munificence and taste had created, for he died only a year after the completion of the mansion. He seems to have been bent on making it a genuine palace of art, employing the best artists of his time in decorating the ceilings and walls of the various rooms with the creations of their genius. Besides the immense sums lavished upon the building itself, a much larger amount was expended in laying out and adorning the grounds.

In 1820, the predecessor of the present occupant of Chatsworth commenced some great improvements, among which was the building of the north wing, containing, with numerous other apart-

Cavendish, seventh Duke of Devonshire, one of the most enlightened and liberal-minded of the English aristocracy. The present name, Chatsworth, was doubtless originally Chetelsworde, from the name of one of its Saxon owners, Chetel.

When William the Conqueror ruled England, Chatsworth belonged to the crown. After passing through various families, early in the sixteenth century it came by purchase into the possession of the Cavendishes.

The magnificent pile of buildings which now forms the family mansion at Chatsworth, a view of which is given on this page, was commenced on the 12th of April, 1687, under the direction of the famous architect Talman, who had, on at least one occasion, the supervisory assistance of the still more celebrated Sir Christopher Wren. Though immense sums of money were expended, the whole edifice does not appear to have been finished ments, those known as the sculpture-gallery, orangery, banqueting-room, and pavilion. The grounds and gardens, also, were very materially remodelled and improved under the direction of his head gardener, the late Sir Joseph Paxson, the proprietor of the famous Crystal Palace.

There are four principal entrances to Chatsworth, which, by the way, with its park and grounds, is thrown open to the people, under certain necessary restrictions, with a freedom and liberality entirely unknown in this portion of the world. By whichever way the visitor may enter, he will have a rich treat, indeed, of scenery to interest him on his progress to the mansion. Arrived at the house, he will, after proper application for and obtaining of the necessary permission, be ushered through the exquisitely beautiful gates shown on the accompanying engraving.

Admitted to the princely mansion, the visitor passes through the sub-hall, a spacious apartment, the ceiling of which is enriched by a copy of Guido's "Aurora," painted by Miss Curzon. A statue of Domitian, and busts of Homer, Jupiter, Socrates and others, are among the objects of interest in this room. Passing on, we presently come to the great hall, a noble room, sixty feet in length by twenty-seven in width, and of the full height of the two principal stories of the mansion. The floor is laid in a striking geometric design, in mosaic, of black and white and veined marble, highly polished. The ceiling and walls of the upper story are covered with masterly paintings, representing scenes in the life of Julius Caesar. In this hall, the visitor is usually requested to remain a short time, and to inscribe his name in the visitors' book.

Space, however, will not permit us to enumerate, much less describe, the many rooms of this princely mansion, and the innumerable treasures, both rich and rare, with which they have been stored. Though not all are accessible to visitors, sketch-gallery, containing, it is said, the choicest and most extensive collection of original drawings by the old masters in any private gallery in the world, we come to the grand vista of the state apartments. Admiring the beautifully painted ceiling and unequalled wood-carvings of the state dressing-room, we linger awhile in the old state bedroom, with its rare and unique wall ornaments of embossed leather, its beautiful collection of vases, beakers and other choice articles, and its ancient and noble embroidered canopy, a state chair, the work of one of the early countesses of Devonshire. This canopy is of crimson velvet, exquisitely covered with needle-work in gold and colors, in groups of figures, trees, animals and insects—here a goat, a stag, a fox, a rabbit, a pig, dogs, a horse, an eagle, and a swan; there butterflies, flies and innumerable other devices around; while inside the top a group of three figures within a border is in the centre, and the rest dotted with animals, flowers, etc., with a border of figures and foliage.

a part of each of the three stories of the building is, under certain regulations, permitted to be shown to all comers. Just glancing through the Passing through the state music and drawing-rooms, rich in ornamentation, we come to the state dining-room, where we find one of the most exquisite bits of wood-carving, perhaps in the world. It is over, across the top, and down the sides of the fire-place, and consists of dead game—heron, pheasants, etc., at the top; over and around these a net is loosely thrown, which, hanging down the sides, forms a groundwork of festoons, on which hang pheasants, woodcocks, grouse, partridges, snipes and other birds, so life-like and natural that it is only by the closest scrutiny that one can discover that they, with the net and all the mouldings, are carved out of solid wood.

Passing hurriedly through a number of apartments, all of the most attractive character, we enter the library, ninety feet long by twenty-three in width, and one of the most elegant, best arranged and most perfect libraries in existence. The ceiling is white and gold, and is adorned with three large and five smaller circular paintings.

Gibson; besides numerous other no less masterly groups, single figures, busts and beautiful bas-reliefs.

In addition to the rich and valuable collection of statuary and busts in the gallery specially devoted to the display of objects of this character, there are numerous other beautiful specimens of the sculptor's art in various other parts of the house and grounds. For instance, in the dining-room there are two exquisitely chiseled chimney-pieces of white marble, each of which has two life-size statues on either side of the fireplace. Two of these figures are by Westmacott and two by Sievier. The billiard or music-room, and the grand drawing-rooms, which form one continued suite, also contain matchless collections of works of art, mostly paintings, among which are gems from Claude, Murillo, Salvator Rosa, Titian,

SCULPTURE GALLERY

The bookcases are of mahogany, and are divided into presses by gilt metal columns, from which stand out the brackets supporting the gallery. The library contains one of the richest and rarest collections of books and MSS. which any house can boast.

We next enter one of the "glories" of Chatsworth, the sculpture-gallery. It is one hundred and three feet in length and thirty in width, of proportionate height, and lighted from the roof. We need give the names of but a few of the art treasures in this apartment to show how precious a collection it really is. Here are a sleeping Endymion, his dog watching at his feet, by Canova; a fine statue of Venus with the apple, by Thorwaldsen; the Filatrice, or Spinning-girl, by Schadow; a statue of Cupid playing with a butterfly, by Finelli; a statue of Achilles wounded, by Albacini; a splendid group of Mars and Cupid, by Gospar Poussin, Da Vinci, Parmigiano, Watteau, Teniers, and numerous other celebrated artists of the older and more recent schools.

The furniture of the grand drawing-room is of the most sumptuous character, and every elegance which the most perfect taste can desire, or the most liberal expenditure secure, adds endless charms to the room.

From the south windows of this suite of rooms a magnificent view of the grounds is obtained. Immediately beneath is the spacious lawn, bordered with raised parterres, festoon flower-beds and sculpture; in the centre of the lawn is a basin with a central and four other fountains; further beyond, a lake, with the "Emperor" fountain casting up its waters to an enormous height, and skirted on its sloping sides with majestic forest trees, and with grassy slopes and statuary; and the park stretching out to the right. The fountain to which allusion has been made, is one of the great attractions at Chatsworth. It throws up a thick jet of water no less than two hundred and sixty-seven feet in height, which, spreading out as it falls, forms a liquid sheet of spray, on which the sunlight often produces an exquisite rainbow. The enormous quantity of two hundred and twenty tons of metal, we are told, was required in the formation of the pipes for this gigantic work. The water is said to leave the pipe with a velocity equal to a hundred miles a minute! Near it are other fountains of great beauty, and when all are playing, the effect is beyond all description.

From the east window of the drawing-room the view is equally fine, but of different character. Here is seen, in all its beauty, the wonderful cascade shown in our engraving on page 143. The waters of the "Grand Cascade," as it is called, fall, as will be seen, from the summit of the dis-lower story is wainscoted throughout with cedar, which, besides its beautiful rich hue, gives a peculiar yet grateful perfume to the place.

Before quitting the mansion, we will give a hasty glance at the west library and the leather-room. Elegant and chaste in their fittings and decorations, nothing could possibly exceed the purity of taste displayed in them. The ceiling of the library is delicately frescoed in arabesque foliage and groups of figures in rich colors; and the spaces between the book presses are similarly decorated. Among the decorations of the ceiling are beautifully-painted medallion heads of Virgil, Cicero, Horace, Livy and others. Over the book-cases are also medallion portraits, supported by figures and foliage, of famous poets, with appropriate sentiments. Thus, over Shakspeare, we have "Exhausted worlds and then imagined new;" over Milton, "A poet blind yet bold;"

tant wooded heights, and then sweep along a lofty arched aqueduct, from the end of which they are precipitated with great violence, and are then carried underground to the temple, at the head of the cascade. Here they rise to the domed roof of the temple, which becomes a sheet of water, and, rushing through the various carved channels prepared for them in the groups of figures, etc., come tumbling down the irregular steps of the cascade to the head of the broad walk in the middle of the grassy slope, where they disappear under the ground, and are no more seen.

The orangery, the ball-room, the chapel and many other apartments of this magnificent pile, are all eminently worthy of description. Though there is scarcely a corner in any part of the mansion that is not rich in wood-carvings, the great glory, artistically speaking, of the chapel are the splendid specimens of this species of ornamentation with which it is so lavishly adorned. The Byron, "The wandering outlaw of his own brave land;" over Scott, "The Ariosto of the north," and so on. The doors of this and the adjoining room are so arranged with imitation book-backs, that, when they are closed, it is impossible to see any means of egress or ingress. The books on these doors have fictitious names, many of them the invention of Hood. Of some of the more amusing we give a few specimens, though poor Hood does not seem to have been in his best vein when he wrote them, if we are to judge from the examples given us. We have, for instance, "Inigo Jones on Secret Entrances;" "Maradam's Rhodes;" "Eterhagy on Spring Fogs;" "Horne Jooke on Catching Cows;" "Bramah's Rape of the Lock;" "Dyspepsia and Heartburn, by the Bishop of Sodor," and others still more wretchedly witty.

The grounds and gardens of Chatsworth, says Hall, from whose account I have been condensing, are marvels of beauty, and are, indeed, in many respects, matchless both for their picturesqueness, their elegance and the skill with which they have been laid out. Leaving the mansion from the door of the orangery, we find ourselves in front of what is called the French Garden, with its forest of pillars surmounted by busts, its grand old Egyptian figures, its Chinese beakers and vases, its sculptured figures and groups, and its raised parterres. Near at hand are conservatories, green-houses, and camellia and orchid houses, with their endless store of beauties; while here and there one sees an antique tomb, or sculptured figure, or groups of statuary, adding to the charms of the place.

Turning to the right, on leaving the orangery, we find ourselves on a broad gravel walk, more than a quarter of a mile in length, and leading to a height, shaded by lofty trees. The view from this spot is truly grand, embracing the mansion, the gardens, the lakes, basins and fountains, the Inside, this splendid structure is two hundred and seventy-seven feet long, one hundred and twenty-three in width, and not less than sixty-seven feet in height, in the centre. Its shape is that of a trefoil. The entire building is of glass, constructed on the "ridge and furrow" principle, with iron ribs. About seventy thousand square feet of glass are used in this gigantic structure, and the iron sash ribs, alone, it is calculated, would, if laid together lengthwise, extend not less than forty miles. Through the centre is a carriage-drive, wide enough to allow of several carriages being driven along it at once. A light and elegant gallery runs round the entire interior, and is reached by a staircase concealed in the rock work. It is said to contain every conceivable variety and beauty of vegetable growth, from the smallest aquatic plants up to the most stately palm-trees, and from the banana down to the papyrus and the delicate ferns, all flourishing in native luxuriance and in endless profusion. Beneath the conservawoods and shrubberies, the park and the river, and the distant country on all sides. From here, too, paths lead in various directions—this one into a delightful little dell, or into a fernery where ferns and heaths grow in wild profusion; that, into another dell of rhododendrons, or among heathery banks and masses of rock, surmounted by groups of statuary.

From the French Garden a broad path to the right leads on to the Great Conservatory, passing on its way the Grand Cascade, of which we have already had occasion to speak, the Willow Tree and other interesting spots.

The Great Conservatory is one of the wonders of Chatsworth. Besides its own attraction as the finest conservatory in England, if not in the world, it possesses an historical interest as being the first of its kind ever erected, and as being the original from which was derived the idea of the famous Crystal Palace of the Great Exhibition of 1851. It was erected by Sir Joseph, at that time plain Mr. Paxton, and in the employ of the Duke of Devonshire, as general manager of his parks.

tory, a railway, for carrying fuel and other requisites, runs round the entire building.

Of the truly elegant and, indeed, wonderful gardens and parterres on the west and south fronts of the mansion; of the vast kitchen gardens, the largest and most perfectly arranged in the world, perhaps; of the Victoria Regia House, with its gigantic lily, which was first grown and first flowered at Chatsworth; of the Pine-houses and the Vineries, and the thousand and one other attractions of this more than princely seat, we have not space to speak; and shall, therefore, conclude our paper with a brief description of the famous Willow Tree, one of the most striking and ingenious of the waterworks with which Chatsworth is so abundantly supplied. It consists of a weeping willow, some twenty feet in height, formed entirely of copper and lead, and colored in imitation of a real tree. It stands in a charming little circular dell, overhung with forest-trees, and surrounded by banks and rockeries covered with luxuriant ferns and other plants, itself rising from a central rock-work, around which runs a path. At the entrance to the dell are a vase and fountain, and at the opposite side is a leaden statue of Pan, holding his pipes in his hand, and having a goat at his feet. From each leaf and stem of this remarkable tree the water, when turned on from a small cave hidden in the rock in front, rushes out in a rapid stream, and thus forms a novel kind of shower-bath to any luckless visitor who may happen to be beneath it. At the same time, a number of jets rise up from hidden pipes all around the dell, and these streams being directed angularly upward toward the centre, while those from the tree fall in all directions downward, there is no way of escape without being caught in the heavy shower.

"I wish you'd keep your nose clean," was her answer, as she took up the wrong side of her new linen apron and gave the dear little offending snub-nose a tweak and a twist that brought with it a prolonged "ow-w-wh!" "I hope Ase Brown will teach you, among other things, to keep a clean nose and to lift your feet when you walk. Boys who drag their feet, and stub their toes, and shamble along, like you do, never amount to much—there's not much grit in them," and the bustling little mother rolled down her sleeves, stuck her horn comb tighter into the close, little twist of coiled hair on top of her head, pinned her handkerchief snugger across her bosom, and

THE WILLOW TREE.

FIFTY YEARS AGO; OR, THE CABINS OF THE WEST.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

No. 3.

YOU will start to school to-morrow morning; you are five years old now, and you know all your letters, from A to Izzard, 'ceptin' K and Q an' some o' the onimportant ones," said a mother to her little boy, more than fifty years ago.

The child looked up and said: "I'd ruther not go, mammy; I'm 'fraid o' bears."

"No bears 'tween hire and the school-housen; don't think o' such a thing," was her reply, looking down at the sweet-faced little fellow who sat astride of a roughly-hewn short bench. He had a tow string tied to one end of it, which he used for a bridle.

"Wish I could make my hoss go, I'd ride to school, then, wouldn't I, mammy?"

precisely between her shoulders, and telling the boy Billy not to 'wake the baby, she climbed up into the loft by way of the ladder that stood in the corner.

They were very poor. The cabin stood in the woods on a knoll overlooking the country toward the south. The husband, Aaron Crosby, was, among Yankees, styled a "handy man"—that means a man who knows a little of everything—one who can repair a watch as well as make an ox-yoke; one who is never at a loss because of his ingenuity and his inventive genius.

On this cold November day of which we write, Aaron was in the woods getting out timber to work up in the winter. He was laying in a store of hickory saplings of which to make splint brooms, willow and black ash to make baskets, and white wood, or poplar, to make butter bowls and bread trays. He was invaluable in the new neighborhood, this handy man was.

Before it was time to get dinner, Billy tipped his horse over on one end of the sugar-trough, in which the baby lay asleep, and the little cherub came rolling out very suddenly. He enlivened the occasion by the usual demonstrations, and the mother came down the ladder, two rungs at a time. Billy was soundly cuffed, the bridle broken off his horse, the horse banished into the bleakest corner and the baby soothed by the restorative common in such cases.

"I hope Ase Brown will take the kinks out of you, my lad," said the mother, as she gently wiped the tears off the baby's face on the wrong side of the linen apron.

"Maybe I'll take a notion not to go to school," said the boy, as he stood with his back up against the stone jamb beside the ample fire-place.

"William Crosby! William Crosby! do you dare! If I had this child in the troughft, if I wouldn't warm your good-for-nothing jacket, you little vagabond, you! You'll go to school, sir—and you'll be a man, sir, some time, an' you'll be a good scholar, an' if you're not it'll be your own fault. You shall have good enough learnin' that you can be a 'squire some day, an' keep book instid o' havin' a notched stick like some poor, miserable creeturs have. Lord helpin' me, none o' my children shall ever be obleeged to make their mark instid o' writin' out the name o' Crosby, fair an' square," and the mother, poor, little, excited body that she was, jerked her head with sundry jerks that meant business.

The little boy leaned on his elbow the next morning at the breakfast-table, first toying with the brown linen table-cloth of his mother's own making, then with the bit of coarse corn-cake which his little teeth had daintily nibbled on one side. He was thinking. He leaned his head back and looked up, and then said aloud: "'Fraid I can't get up on the pole when I go to school; will any body help me up on the pole, mammy?"

"For the land's sake! Aaron, what does the young un mean?" asked the mother.

"Don't they all set on poles, in rows, like chickens, say?" said William, as he twisted the corner of the scant table-cloth vigorously.

"No, they sit on benches," replied his father, laughing; "the little ones on low benches and the big scholars on high ones."

"Does the master sit on a pole?" was the next inquiry.

"No, he walks about, and carries a cudgel, and does his duty," said the father.

"Must I do my duty, too?"

"Yes."

"Maybe I won't know how," was the puzzled rejoinder.

"Well, he'll show you, 'f you don't; trust Ase Brown for that, any time," replied his father.

William rubbed his hand on his forehead and sighed.

After breakfast, the child's face was washed the second time, and his hair combed into the fashion which, fifty years ago, was called "the wig." It was little matter how it looked behind, or about the ears, so the wig was there—a heaped up standing peak above the forehead. If the hair was coarse and wiry, it was easily made into one.

William's wig was so successfully made that morning that his mother could hardly bear to spoil her handiwork by putting on his cap. The cap was made somewhat in the shape of a funnel, of woollen yarn, knit, of various colors, in rings that went round and round. On the very point of it was a little tuft of fringy yarn imitating a gay rosette. The cap was drawn on over the head.

Nearly all the boys and men in those early days wore these unsightly and ugly things on their heads; they had the merit, however, of being very warm and comfortable, though they gave the wearers the appearance of wild savages.

The child's dinner consisted of little corn-cakes split open and spread with a thick, brown butter, made of pumpkin, stewed down in the extracted juice of this abundant fruit. These were wrapped up and put into a calico work-pocket with a string in it, which he slipped upon his arm. Children were rarely permitted to have primers or spelling-books until they were old enough to take care of them, and not tear them or make "dog's ears" of the corners of the leaves. Instead of a book, the child was furnished with what was called a paddle. It was a piece of a clap-board of the usual width about a foot long, whittled into the shape of a wide paddle with a broad handle to it. On the smoothest side of this was pasted the alphabet, both the capitals and the smaller letters, and the pupil used this instead of a book.

We will describe this school and school-house because one is a duplicate of all the others in the far West in those early days.

In the early settlement of the country there was no law providing for common schools, no tax levied or other funds provided for the payment of teachers. Hence, all buildings for the use of common schools consisted of some old evacuated dwelling, or, if built for that purpose, had to be done by voluntary contribution of citizens immediately interested. If a new school-house was built, it was usually about sixteen by twenty feet, from seven to eight feet high, and built of round logs in perfect log-cabin style. It was covered with boards split out of large oak trees, about four feet long, from eight to twelve inches wide, and about one and a half inches thick. These were laid on without nailing, but confined to their places by small logs laid on each course of boards. To stop the crevices between the logs, pieces of wood were driven in, called chinking, and on this a thick clay mortar was put, which was called daubing; this was generally done inside and out. If they wanted to make the house a little nice, they would hew off the logs on the inside after the building was put up. The floors were laid with timbers called puncheon, which were usually from eight to ten feet long, split out of large oak trees, made as broad as the logs would admit, and about four inches thick. The door was also made of these same puncheons, only not so thick; it was hung on squeaking wooden hinges, and fastened with a clumsy, clattering latch made of strong hickory. A leather string was fastened to the latch on the inside, and thrust through a hole in the door; by pulling on this string from the outside the rude latch was raised. The windows were made by cutting out one log on each side, nearly the whole length of the building, and then closing by putting in small upright sticks in the form of sash, and pasting greased paper over them to cause it to admit the light more readily.

As stoves were unknown in those days, a fireplace was used instead. These were made by cutting out a hole in one end of the building, in some cases large enough to admit a two-horse wagon to pass through the cavity. On the outside of the house, and connected with this, the chimney was built of sticks and mortar, sometimes lined on the inside with stone and mortar immediately adjoining the fireplace. In front of the fireplace was a large space left in the floor called the hearth, which was usually covered with flat stones, and hence the old phrase, "hearthstone."

Seats were made of split timber, with legs in them so long that none but long-legged men could touch the floor with their feet. This had one advantage at least—the pupils could make no noise with their feet; but whatever good was attained by this was counteracted by the far greater evil of causing the scholars to sit in this unpleasant posture during the hours of school. The larger and more advanced pupils sat on very high seats that extended the length of the house on both sides; they sat with their backs toward the teacher, and leaned their elbows and laid their books and slates on wide puncheon shelves that were intended for writing-desks. These were fastened against the walls by timbers at the ends. They wrote with pens made out of the quills of geese and turkeys, and used ink made from soft maple bark and coperas. Sometimes a little maple sugar was put into the ink to make it "give a gloss" to the writing.

Ink made with good whisky instead of water never froze in the coldest weather. The first families always made their own ink, and they always put in sugar and number one whisky, and strained it through a linen cloth. A young man who could make good ink generally carried his head very high, and was the envy and admiration of the whole school.

The building of the fire during the winter term was no small item. Every evening a young man was appointed by the teacher to make the fire early the following morning. A huge back-log was rolled into the school-house, and by the aid of handspikes was rolled, and shoved, and worked along, sometimes with great difficulty, up to the hearth. Then a nice bed was made in the ashes, and the great log, trundled over into it, settled down in its place—the cold ashes snugly filled into the space between it and the wall behind it—pressed closely in front of it, and that part of the mystery of making a good woodfire was finished. Two good-sized stones served as andirons, and the fore-stick was laid on them, then kindlings placed between the logs, then chips, small sticks, large ones, chunks and knots, and the remaining odds and ends of the yesterday's fire, and it was ready to start. There was no match to touch it, as of now-a-days; and if no living coal could be found, the builder hurried off to the nearest house and brought a brand between two sticks. Generally, however, the remains of yesterday's back-log had been nicely buried in the hot ashes, and the fire had kept all night, and came out in the morning a bed of glowing coals.

But how much of the heat of such a fire must have gone up that wide chimney with the roaring red blazes! And such blazes! How they leaped, and cheered, and crackled! How they flamed, and danced, and glowed! How the little blazes that burned blue and steady, glowered because the ranting, prancing one in the centre was so mighty and so magnificent, and drew all others into his charmed power!

The teacher, or the "master," as he was called in those days, was generally a man of the neighborhood—the best scholar they had among them—one who could "read, write and cipher," keep good order in time of school, handle the rod with dexterity, and one who didn't "feel above his business." He boarded round with his patrons, a week in a place; attended all the singing-schools, corn-huskings, pumpkin-paring-bees, often went with the boys coon-hunting at nights, showed them how to make "dead-falls" and traps to catch wolves, how to make turkey-pens, how to imitate the call of a turkey, how to tan deer-skins, how to make caps, and mittens, and leggings, how to mend shoes, to make ax-handles, bend the bows for ox-yokes, train calves, break colts, make hand-sleds, write back-hand, and running-hand, and German text, to play cards, a new grip in wrestling—and, in short, the master was the "master of the situation."

Sometimes a cousin or uncle would come from the East to visit his relatives in the far West, and in a case of this kind he was the man to "keep school," and he was soon persuaded into writing his article of agreement, which was carried from house to house until the requisite number of scholars was obtained.

I have in reach of my hand one of those old articles, written fifty years ago. It is too lengthy to give here. I read that the poor young man pledged himself to teach so many hours a day, and so many days for a month, to keep strict order during school hours, and to receive for compensation ten dollars a month, and he boarded among the scholars. He was to take his pay in wheat at fifty cents a bushel, oats at twenty, and corn at twenty-five, to be delivered by or before the first day of the following May, at two mills, many miles apart, which were designated in the article. At the end of three months, his employers were so well pleased that they hired him another month, and increased his wages to eleven dollars.

Young men of now-a-days would derisively whoop over such an incident.

The poor young man died, lamented and beloved, thirty-five years afterward, worth over a hundred thousand dollars.

Oh, these lowly cabin school-houses in the wild backwoods have sent out from under their mossy old roofs the men who have been, and are yet, the very bone and sinew of our nation! Our best and noblest men budded and blossomed, and grew strong physically and intellectually, under these lowly roofs. The dignity of their manhood waxed noble and great under the difficulties that bore down upon them and seemed to hedge them in. It makes the sparkle steal into my eyes when these homely but trite lines come sweeping up to me:

"For many a lad,
Born to rough work and ways,
Strips off his ragged coat, and makes Men clothe him with their praise."

I have no doubt but the best men whom the world knows, men who live in ease and luxury now, see in their dreams very often the old cabin school-house, with its dingy walls, the green playground, the beautiful purling spring, the black swamp, in which grew the flags and the pepper-mint, the swing-tree, the alders and willows, and the pretty hazel thickets in which the trusty birds builded their nests, but never hatched their young.

No wonder that Billy Crosby, new pupil, five years of age, pulled back when his father stepped inside the door of the school-house, and looking down with pride upon his little son, took hold of the knit cap by the tasselled peak and drew it off. It was no little thing to stand there the target for so many staring eyes. William's first inclination was to bawl right out; he was astounded, nothing looked as he had imagined it would. He twisted his head, and thought of his mother, and very indefinitely it came to him that he must be a great and a good man, and that this was the beginning, so he swallowed the uprising sob and caught his breath, and, baby as he was, he began to feel brave.

The master came and patted him on the shoulder and straightened up the pretty brown wig that had laid down to accommodate the knit cap, and said: "Glad to see you, William, you're going to be a man, some day, and now sit here and study your paddle, and don't look up at all."

Upon the high seat was the little midget swung like a bundle of dry-goods, and down went his steady gaze upon the familiar alphabet before him. Some one tried to softly open and close the wooden-hinged door, but its creak was like the squall of a catamount, yet William dared not look up, although his sinking heart felt that his father had just gone out, and he was left there among strangers. No, not among strangers, for the big boy behind him on the high seat, studying fractions, was none other than one of Broady's boys, that one who gave him a handful of red thorn berries, one time. While the master was punching the fire, William sneaked up a hurried glance, and sure enough the boy was Reason Broady.

"Ho!" he thought, "I'm not afraid! Reas. will take care of me!"

Reas. smiled and looked approvingly at the boy and his wig, and slipping his hand into the pocket in his linsey trousers, drew out and gave him a whole handful of nice pumpkin seeds to eat "on the sly."

In describing one of the schools of fifty and sixty years ago, in the West, we give a general description of all.

The teacher walked about nearly all the time with a stout cudgel or heavy switch in his hand, saying: "Too much noise!" "Better order!" "Less whispering!" "Tend to your books!" "Come, come!" "This won't do!" and, sometimes, especially if he had been out on a spree the night before, and was ill-natured from loss of sleep, then he was very apt to get out of patience and go the whole rounds with his rod, whipping indiscriminately all who occupied the front seats. This was done with a hearty good will, and quite after the manner that a man would whip a team of balky horses. This was the way Asa Brown did, and he meant it to act as a tonic.

There were not less than forty pupils congregated in this new school-house in the wildwood, fifty years ago. There were the Bailsys, and Halls, and Henrys, and Wilsons, and Carnahans, all from Pennsylvania; the Bennetts, and Stewarts, and Moultons, and Whipples, from Maryland; the Cliffs, and Patties, and Harmons, and Kellers, and Hols, from Virginia; and more than a half dozen families represented from the State of New York; while all the dear old New England States, in the far-distant East, were well and creditably represented.

A practised eye could detect, in less than one day's time, the native State of nearly every one of these rosy, hardy young pioneers. The young men who hailed from Virginia, wore, almost universally, red linsey hunting-shirts trimmed with blue fringe; or, blue linsey, trimmed with red, or red and green mixed, fringe. And our grandparents tell us that, after one became accustomed to the garment, it really looked pretty, and jaunty, and becoming. But we cannot be made to believe this when we think of the little clinging tails, short, and adorned with narrow fringe, and the broad cape that extended even over the shoulders.

The young Virginian's vernacular betrayed his nativity; for "poor" he said "pore," for "ear" he said "year," and other words indicative of whence he came. There was a cordial heartiness in the greeting of the buxom lads and lasses from Pennsylvania, with their "tuck" for "took," "shuck" for "shook," "barl" for "barrel," "marr'd" for the softer pronunciation of married, that gave unmistakable proof of the royal old State from whence they immigrated. Those who came from "my Maryland" told the fact even when they pronounced the name of their dear native State, "Murryland." The pupils from "York State" were very different from the rest. They brought with them more refinement than any of the others—more cute ways; they knew different plays and kinds of amusement that the rest had never heard of. Those from the three States above named rather sniffed at what they considered an innovation, some things rather weak and feminine, not brave and manly enough to please them.

But, if there was any aristocracy at all, I must confess, even though it comes home to myself, that I believe the New Englanders brought it with them. I think their noses turned up one degree higher than their neighbors' noses. My old aunt will say to me, with sundry smirks of satisfaction: "My best dress in those early days was made of one of my mother's, a pongee, or a crimson cam-let, or a plaid merino. My grandfather brought it home from a sea-faring trip."

But all this amounts to nothing; what good did their pongee or camlet dresses do them when the greased paper windows of the school-house were badly torn, and they were appointed a committee to repair them, and could not possibly do it because they had no wheat flour to make paste. Who ever heard of yellow meal paste, and especially when the coarse meal was made from corn pounded in a mortar, at home, and that mortar one of the hollowed-out stumps that stood in the front door-yard.

No one State furnished pupils who were any apter than another. Massachusetts, the mother State, had done generously by her children, perhaps she had given them more polish than the sterling States of Virginia and Pennsylvania had bestowed upon theirs, but not an iota more of native talent, integrity and good sense.

How the pioneer boys from New England were laughed at when they had to hurry home in the evenings to "pail the keows," or to "help sis do a churnin'," before they could go to the jolly spelling-school. None but Yankee boys ever did this until—well—well—when they intermarried, and love, that mighty potentate, made all burdens turn to pleasures—transformed all these old, old habits over into a perfect newness and delight.

A motley assemblage were convened inside the walls of that log-cabin school-house. Here was a boy wearing a roundabout made by cutting the skirts off from his father's high-collared, short-waisted, well-kept wedding coat. The skirts were still doing valiant service made over into a vest. Here were two boys in buckskin pantaloons that had been wet and dried on them, and fitted to the skin; here one with a gay coat made of some queer material, adorned with dabs of bright paint of different colors—it was a coat bought from the Indians, and they had got it of some French traders; here a couple of young men in white linsey wamusses, made in a hurry and not yet dipped into a dye of butternut bark, for the plucky little mother was determined that they should not miss one day of school; two little boys in tight little trousers, made out of their grandmother's fine woollen shawl with the fringe running down the outside seams in the legs. This last rare bit of adornment was duly appreciated, and the lads felt of, and caressed their fringe, even as quite young men of now-a-days pet a feeble moustache. Here was a girl clad in a scant dress of coarse cotton and wool, a home-made fabric that had been honestly dipped in a dye made of the yellow flowers of the golden rod; another girl wore a brown linsey, made too big in the clumsily-fitting waist, but lapped over behind, and pinned with thorns. Her hair was likewise braided into six tight, snug braids, which were then done up into six little bobs and fastened in place with thorns, instead of pins. Another girl wore a linen dress, and a woollen apron, and a dress-handkerchief pinned closely about her neck. Yellow horn combs were very common among those who were well-to-do and could afford them. Cowhide shoes that came not quite up to the ankle, tied with wide, stout, white buckskin thongs, were a luxury among the young women. It was no new thing for a family of four or five women to own but two pairs of shoes among them.

At noon the boys and girls would all play ball, and "prisoner's base," and "black man," with a freedom and a hilarity that was good for health and for sociability. The little ones played "tag" and "toss," and those of the girls who had exalted notions of what belonged to young womanhood, stayed in the house and knit mittens with "her-ring bone" about the wrists, and fringed them with thrums of various colors; or they knit stockings with fancy open work about the tops, and toed them off with white yarn. Some of the smart ones knew how to knit double heels, and clocks to decorate the ankles. This latter work was, I believe, generally, or more specially adapted to hose knit of cotton or snow-white, bleached, flaxen thread. Pretty little accomplishments like these were reckoned as something very nice in those early days.

As the years went on, Aaron Crosby continued making bowls, and baskets, and brooms, and his little chippy of a wife chirped to the new babies, and improvised songs for them, as she banged the loom and sent the shuttle a-flying, and laid out on the grassplot her honest webs of linen. Her little wheel buzzed long after the babies were tucked away in the trundle beds that Aaron had made out of dogwood poles and elm bark. Sometimes she sang hymns as the flaxen thread glided through her deft fingers; and sometimes, when weary with her many burdens, and bowed down under the trials that beset the wife of a poor pioneer, why then the poor dear scolded. She was a noble woman, and deserved to wear a crown—noble because of the beautiful and sensible aspirations she cherished for her children. "Vagabone" was the worst word she ever used. We suppose vagabond was her very lowest conception of worthlessness and meanness. She kept her boys at school all the time; no privation could hinder her from this; and when fortune smiled sweetly on Aaron, as it really did in the years to come, then the Crosbys removed to another home, where golden opportunities were theirs, and where the best of educational advantages met them.

William became a printer, then an editor in a city, where he had hosts of friends; and it gives us immense satisfaction to say that a good many years ago we read in the papers the name of the little boy Billy as the Hon. William Crosby. And later, we read of the appointment of this son of that plucky little mother as minister to some foreign country; and then, years after, there was a hail of good cheer among the leading papers of one of the States of the old-time West when the Hon. William Crosby returned to his native land crowned with honors.

In my quiet home I rubbed my hands gleefully, and my eyes were misty with joy over this poor boy, the pride of a true mother—the lad who had climbed the dizzy heights, who stood a victor over poverty and adversity—one who had "stripped off his ragged coat, and made men clothe him with their praise."

One day last fall my father laid down the papers containing the results of the election, and as he wiped his glasses he chuckled and said: "Blood will tell. Now here's Mr. —, the congressman elect from the —th district, he is related to Aaron Crosby's wife. It does beat all! I am so glad to see the honors gathering about that little, wide-awake woman. I tell you it's a fine thing to have good blood and a pure line of ancestry! I'd rather have it than to inherit a kingdom and a throne."

I felt my eyes snap as I responded: "Aye, aye, father."

SWEETHEART and precious wife,
Lean closer, prithee, in this solemn eventide,
'Tis lonely pressing down the chilly slope of life—

Lean closer to my side.
Behind us roars the world with all its strife
Of human passions, clamoring and unsatisfied;
Before us, still and wide,
Mysterious, and beautiful, and grand,
Rise the blue mountains of the immortal summer land.

Heart's love, and dearest dear,
We walk the sad, brown fields, through dry, dead hopes, wind-whirled,
In this December of our life's long wedded year,
Plucking the leaf frost-curl'd,
And looking with calm faith upon the sere,
And shrunken bud, wherein we know lie softly furled
The spring flowers of a world
Which we shall enter shortly, finding there
The good we miss, the truth we seek, the life we dare.

Is't thou, my bosom mate,
Or I, who first shall cross that still, white border line,
Leaving the other sad, and lone, and tired, to wait
Love's tender, beckoning sign—
Love's hand outstretched to undo the grave's dark gate,
And lead the longing captive into life divine?
Ah, we who have together drank the wine
Of joy, and drained the bitter dregs of woe—
Can either stay in peace, and let the other go?

How could it be, my sweet,
For us, who have walked together since the morn of May,
And borne as one the toil, and sweat, and pain, and heat,
And burden of the day—
And watched for the return of wandering feet,
And bowed in anguish over precious confined clay—
How could it be, I pray,
A joy to sit in Paradise, if so,
The joy we might not share, as we have shared our woe?

Dear love, souls that have grown
As ours, with fiber upon fiber intertwined,

Each drawing on the other freely as its own—

Soul within soul enshrined—
Cannot be rent, and one sent forth alone,
But it will seek, through the wide universe of mind,
Restless, till it shall find,
And bring into its own exalted state,
The dearer self, the longing and the longed-for mate.

Lean closer, dearest friend,
Our shadows to the eastward lengthen more and more,
Our earthly day is wearing downward to its end,
And from the other shore
Come strange, mysterious tokens that portend
A change—a flood of glory that shall ere long pour
Through the dissolving door
Of fleshly sense that shuts our spirits in;
Lord, we but wait. Forgive our debts, remove our sin!

CONCERNING WOMEN.

BY JANE O. DE FOREST.

EVEN the most conservative and prejudiced people can but admit that this is emphatically the woman's century. The rapid advancement which she has made during the last fifty years in literature, science and the arts, is, indeed, wonderful; yet it is the active, living present and the glad future to which we turn with eager, hopeful faces for a final and full release from all that hitherto has held her in subjection. If our revered grandmothers and great-aunts could read, write and cipher, their education was deemed complete; to-day, many of our leading colleges throw open their doors to young women. A quarter of a century ago, the obstacles in the path of a would-be medical student among women were almost insurmountable; now, there are not only successful medical colleges for women, but also numerous institutions where women are admitted on equal terms with men, to study the "divine art of healing." When women first began to practice as physicians, they had ignorant prejudice to overcome. Their advent was too often hailed with sneers, and even slander, by men who selfishly sought to monopolize the profession; now, they not unfrequently attain popularity sooner than physicians of the other sex.

As artists and sculptors, women occupy a very prominent position at the present time, though the envy of brother artists still seeks to keep them in the background, and often refuses to accord a rightful merit to their works.

As authors and journalists, women are no longer obliged to hide behind masculine nom de plumes in order to obtain a proper recognition, but find themselves welcomed and esteemed in the front ranks of literature.

As orators, many of them take their places with the most successful of men, in fact, there are two women in this country who, in the number of their lecture engagements, have no equal among men except the ever-popular Gough.

Thirty years ago, there were, comparatively, few lady teachers, and these either carried on "female" (!) seminaries or taught the primary departments of the city schools, or the little summer schools in the country. It took a long time to convince conservatives that it was right and proper for women to teach and often "usurp authority" over full-grown men, but we now find them filling the positions of ward-school principals and even principals of high-schools. In some towns women have been selected as superintendents; in several of the Western States they occupy the position of county superintendent. In Cleveland, Ohio, one of the supervising principals is a young lady of great talent and culture.

In various departments of business, as telegraphy, phonography and the like, women have recently been meeting with increasing success. In stores and post-offices the "lady clerks" are no longer objects of surprised condemnation. "The law and the gospel" are claiming their votaries, much to the sorrow and disgust of some, and the exceeding joy of others.

The old restrictions to woman's fullest development are, however, by no means all removed, for in many of the vocations in which women are winning success, they find obstacles which are never met with by men. Prejudice against innovations, time-honored contempt for the capabilities of women, narrow-minded and even ridiculous views in regard to woman's "proper sphere" and the untiring opposition of many envious men who wish the monopoly of all the lucrative employments of life, are among the hindrances to be overcome by self-supporting women.

The old barbaric idea that they should be underpaid because of their sex, though gradually losing ground, still holds great sway over the public mind. Women lecturers are not yet welcomed as are men of the same profession, for instead of half the speakers in the lecture courses of our cities and towns being women, it is considered an extreme mark of condescension and appreciation, if the committees fill one-third the appointments with women; the usual rule is, one lady orator and six or eight gentlemen. The "patient public" must submit to be bored by awkward, prozy Englishmen, who hasten over to this country every season to relieve us of our "spare cash," and certain of their American brethren who, having achieved a little notoriety as poets or novelists, rush upon the platform and, for a season or two, secure from deluded associations their fees of one or two hundred dollars a night, yet causing innumerable growls among those very conservatives who are so fearful of extending "the list of women."

As preachers, women have, by no means, had anything like equal opportunities with men; but the success of Mrs. Margaret Van Cott and Sarah Smiley is sufficient to warrant an expectation of a rapid growth of the kingdom of Christ when women are permitted to come up to "the help of the Lord against the mighty."

During the late temperance crusade, women have come to the front and learned important lessons concerning their own capabilities and necessities. As a "training school" for women, the temperance movement will prove of immense benefit, even if its effect upon drinkers and drunkard-makers is only temporary.

The clergy, so many of whom have heretofore sought to keep women in a subordinate and half-Pagan condition, notwithstanding that the very essence of the Christian religion teaches equal rights for all, without regard to race, color or sex, have almost uniformly been active in urging women on in their prayer, praise, exhortation and entreaty! This momentous work, so very "public" and so much "seen of men," has been found a cultivator of all true, womanly virtues, for, instead of detracting from that modesty and reserve so charming to womanhood, it has given to many a strength of purpose, a wider view of the needs of humanity and especially of their own sex, and has developed an ability to plan and a determination to execute those plans in a manner hitherto exhibited only by a few brave, energetic women who have found themselves scouted therefor as "strong-minded."

The so-called "woman's sphere" is widening with such rapidity that everywhere we find old fogies rubbing their eyes in approved Rip Van Winkle style and stretching out their hands with dismay, so that, if possible, they may hinder the onward march of truth and right. Their frantic gestures and loud outcries are at once pitiable and comical, for, however much we may regret that any should remain the victims of a narrow-minded conservatism, yet, in the light of the present day, the spectacle of these moral mummies with their old, dried-up creeds and social formulas, are quite as unseemly and ridiculous as they would like to prove the friends of progress and reform to be. Greater opportunities will bring with them greater responsibilities, and women will need, more than ever before, healthy bodies and well-balanced, cultivated minds. If this advancement of women to higher and wider fields of usefulness, secures that careful physical and mental culture, which has so often been sadly lacking among them, what an unspeakable boon it will prove to the entire human race. To be sure, the learned (?) Dr. Clarke sought to show that the highest mental training and physical well-being are incompatible for women, but, after the demolition he has received by the pens of Mrs. Duffey and others, it is quite unnecessary to renew the discussion. It is enough to know that the majority of the best educated American women are superior in their health and powers of endurance.

A thoroughly cultivated woman, one with high aims and earnest hopes of achievement and a wish to make the world better by having lived in it, will not torture her body by wearing her clothing tight and improperly suspended. Science has already taught her that plenty of breathing room and undisplaced vital organs are absolutely essential to the highest intellectual attainments and effective effort, and by physiological dressing she avoids the principal source of the numerous ills with which women are afflicted. One of the most urgent of the present needs of women is a knowledge of physiology. Comparatively few of them can attend lectures upon the subject, but all can, and should, read instructive books. I know of none more valuable than "What Women Should Know," by Mrs. E. B. Duffey, whose name is so familiar to the readers of the HOME MAGAZINE. It is written plainly, yet with the utmost purity of tone. I had long felt the necessity of such a book, prepared by a woman, and would gladly see it in the hands of every woman in the country, old or young, married or single. I mention this exceedingly valuable and readable book entirely without solicitation, believing that its careful perusal cannot fail to benefit all women of sense.

Again, women should keep themselves well posted in regard to all passing events of importance; they should know what is going on in the religious and political worlds; but they cannot unless they continually read several of the best newspapers. There has been a grand reform among women in this respect since the commencement of the rebellion, for then it was that the masses of women began to feel their equal right to the news of the day. Yet there is still a great multitude of American-born women who read but little that is of any service as a mental diet. The trashy "story weeklie," which should be written with an a, form the sum total of the reading of very many of the sisterhood. I am very far from condemning all fiction, but the ridiculous twaddle which is sent out from many of the large cities to be eagerly devoured by thousands of people should at once receive the condemnation of all intelligent women. By this means, they will themselves be led to select a better style of literature, and also prevent their children, both boys and girls, from acquiring a taste for inferior mental food.

Nothing is more entertaining than the conversation of a bright, well-educated, reading woman; the freshness of her youthful looks may have departed, but the brilliancy of her ideas, set in well-chosen words, soon leads her hearers to forget any loss of youthful plumpness, or graceful outlines of form and face. In fact, there is no better preservative of good looks than active, well-stored minds.

It has been my good fortune within the last few years to meet with very many of the most talented and highly cultivated of my countrywomen, and with few exceptions I have found them endowed with more than ordinary physical beauty. The old saying, "Why she is too pretty to be smart," will soon be classed among other silly sayings of ignorant people. Intellectual endowments and manly beauty have never been thought incompatible, for, in fact, our greatest men are usually blessed with fine physiques; but from time immemorial, girls and women have been taught that a pretty face and fine figure were the only needful possessions for their sex, and that it was unnecessary for any but irredeemably homely women to cultivate their minds. Having thus been taught, it has not been surprising to find those whom nature had given fine minds as well as handsome faces, devoting the whole of their attention and solicitude to the best methods of enhancing the beauty of the latter, without any thought of the necessity of culture for the former.

Thank Heaven that these pernicious views, savoring of Oriental harem life, are fast giving place to those of an enlightened common sense. It is true that there are women of very limited brain-power who have a kind of doll-like beauty in early life, but they soon fade, and their minds and faces are equally uninteresting, while the handsome, intellectual lady, who has cultivated both mind and body, usually retains her physical beauty till long past the prime of life.

"I don't see that you grow old any," said a gentleman to a lady friend, whom he had not met for some time.

"Well, not very fast, I think," she replied, no-wise flattered by words she knew were true and spoken with sincerity; "for I have something else to interest me in the world beside washing dishes. I certainly do a great deal of that kind of work; but most women have nothing more elevating for subjects of thought, and while yet in early life their faces become wrinkled and colorless."

There is nothing more ennobling to the mind, and hence beautifying to the face, than a life of generous activity, which seeks the widest culture, and strives to aid "our poor humanity" upward to a broader, truer civilization. Women whose thoughts and aims are circumscribed by their own little rounds of every-day duties, whose reading never goes beyond the "weekly" story papers and cook-books, whose chief topics of conversation are the neighborhood scandals and bickerings, the beaux and the latest styles, and who, as is probable, scout all ideas of "woman's rights" and outside duties, must not be surprised to find themselves soon doing duty as wall-flowers in society, and becoming faded and insipid "old women" at forty.

No woman with well-stored mind, good literary tastes and benevolent activities, will often be found a victim of ennui. To her life will not be a holiday, and she will feel most keenly the sorrows and bereavements which are the lot of all. Yet, looking abroad over our beautiful world, she will find so much that is cheering, will see so many noble characteristics of humanity, and will so strongly feel the necessity of speaking brave words in defence of the right and vigorously denouncing the wrong, that she will have no time or inclination to dwell much upon the "might have beens," to depreciate her own lot in life, or to conjure up a variety of bodily ills.

It will, indeed, be a foretaste of millennial glory, when women, no longer hampered by musty old creeds concerning their "proper sphere," shall be given opportunities for the fullest development of all their powers of mind, and shall be encouraged to take whatever position in life they can fill with the greatest ability and satisfaction. Therefore, all hail! to the present days, whose events are stirring them out of their almost hopeless torpor, and thank God for Woman's Rights Conventions, Congresses for the Advancement of Women, and Woman's Crusades against Intemperance.

Let no man be too proud to work. Let no man be ashamed of a hard fist or a sunburnt countenance. Let him be ashamed only of ignorance and sloth. Let no man be ashamed of poverty. Let him only be ashamed of dishonesty and idleness.

TO A PRETTY STRANGER.

I DO not know you, lady fair!
 Perhaps I never may,
 (For Fate can seldom drop so rare
 A treasure in my way).
 Still memory may take delight
 In trying to recall
 The comet of a shiny night—
 The Beauty of a Ball.
 To hear the song—to see the dance
 In which you flitted by—
 To summon up that haughty glance
 Before the mental eye—
 Such sights and sounds I shall esteem
 A privilege, though small;
 And you shall reign throughout my dream,
 The Beauty of a Ball.

You feel, I fancy, very proud;
 Or, maybe, very vain:
 You find the homage of the crowd
 A pleasant thing to gain.
 But say,—is yours a happy state?
 I cannot guess at all
 What sentiments may animate
 The Beauty of a Ball.
 My lady fair! your winning ways,
 Your figure, face and dress
 Will haunt me many, many days,
 In all their loveliness.
 But should we meet—where'er it be—
 (Park, fête or banquet-hall,)
 You have no name but this for me—
 "The Beauty of a Ball."

GIRLS, HOMELESS AND FRIENDLESS.

BY MARY GAY ROBINSON.

(From the Methodist.)

OF the large five-story brick houses in St. Mark's Place, New York, No. 27 has a special interest. It is the Girls' Lodging-House, established and supported by the Children's Aid Society.

The modern improvements, making the great house convenient for its present use, have all gone up skyward, as the third story and the fourth and fifth stories in the French roof are new, and arranged as dormitories filled with single beds and as many small lockers or closets extending the length of the rooms. In the rear, from the top-most story, the fire-escape descends to the ground.

The spacious parlors, and the usual elegant apartments of a first-class New York house, here serve as reception-room, with piano, pictures, books, Brussels carpets and lace curtains; the back parlors as the sewing-machine class-room, where are twenty-five machines arranged in rows, and a large cutting-table. Here pupils come in from outside, and learn to operate on all the machines that are in common use in our factories and stores.

On the second story is the sitting-room of the house and the matron's room, and above that the dressmaking department, opened last spring. Any young girls who show a capacity for learning this trade are given board and home for three, four and six months, and a competent dressmaker has charge of them. We were shown elegant dresses in process of completion, of merino, diagonal cloth and poplin; the room was well hung with all the latest patterns, and the most fashionable lady might here leave her fabrics with assurance that they would be made up in the latest style and in perfect taste.

Seven young lady apprentices are now learning their trade, and all they need is the regular patronage of the lady friends of the institution to keep the department successful and remunerative.

The work of the whole house is done by the inmates, with the exception of one hired laundress, who can show the novices how to do their work in better style. Girls with no money come and work for their board till situations are obtained for them, and almost as soon as a girl is well trained she is in demand for a situation that is sure to offer.

An advertisement is kept in the Sun that there is such a place, policemen who find girls wandering on the streets send them here, and cards are distributed through all the station-houses of the city, that all who need a refuge may find it. The night is cold and stormy, half snow and rain. As we talk with the matron, the bell rings, and a woman is ushered in—a hard case, a drunkard by the look of her face and breath. She brings a note from a kind-hearted gentleman who knew the matron.

"Where did you come from?"

"From Boston; the lady died I worked for."

"Have you any money?"

"No, marm. I sent my money home to my sister, who is a widow with four little children."

"How old are you?"

"Eighteen, marm." (She looks to be twenty-five or thirty.)

"Well, you may go up-stairs, take off your things, and dry yourself by the fire."

"We must not turn them away such a night as this; but she is a hard case; we can't keep her long, she may harm the others."

The procession of Lcs Miserables is quite long. The door-bell, like a funeral knell, keeps striking "one more unfortunate." Time after time its summons is answered. And here come a family group—a woman forlorn in looks, like those that sit on the sidewalks with a baby in lap and the empty hand held out; and this one has a baby, peaked, shriveled, face all forehead, a few stray locks of hair on its head, pale as the ghost of a baby; but the kind matron says, "pretty baby!" "pretty baby!" to please the poor mother; and two little boys complete the group, sent here from the society office, while the father and an older boy are sent to some boys' lodging-house.

Over fifteen hundred young women, homeless, friendless and forlorn, passed through this house last year. And who are they? Mrs. Hurley, the experienced and devoted matron, will picture a few of them for us. One is a pretty, blue-eyed little girl of eleven, who was thrust out upon the street. Her story was: "She asked for something to eat, and they licked her awful, and put her out on the street." She wandered into an industrial school, and the teacher sent her to the lodging-house.

"One night last winter we were aroused about midnight by a terrible knocking at the door, and looking out saw a girl and a man on the stoop and a crowd on the sidewalk. She was a young girl of sixteen, who had been found by the good man who brought her, sitting on a doorstep crying. This was her story: Some young man in his summer visit to the country had made love to her, and had promised to marry her if she would come to the city. She had fallen desperately in love with him. Knowing his name, and that he lived in Fourteenth Street, New York, she had slipped away from her home and come to the city to find him. Wandering all day long through the streets, night overtook her, and she knew not where to go. Happening to fall into good hands, she had been brought here. We found she was an orphan of respectable parentage, with an aged grandmother and a guardian. We wrote to her friends, and the grandmother came and took back the rescued child, grateful for our care."

Another in the procession:

"A young girl and her brother came on from South America. Their parents and relatives were dead. A gentleman took them West, and in a few years the brother died. The day he was buried, the sorrow-stricken sister took the cars, and when the conductor came and asked where she was going she did not know."

"Are you going to New York?"

"Yes."

"Arrived here, she wandered the streets, and, in search of work, went into an intelligence office."

After paying a dollar, she was promised a good situation, questioned as to her home and friends, and placed in an inner room to wait. Late in the afternoon the man offered to give her a note to a lady who would keep her for the night, and sent a boy with her to make sure she would not miss the way. On reaching the house, she was shown to a handsomely-furnished room, in which were seated two ladies. One seemed to be an invalid; the other took the note and read it, and asked her to lie down and rest while she had tea prepared for her. But as soon as the older lady left the room, the other started up, and, with impressive words and earnest gestures, bade her go quickly from the house. 'Go! go! for your life, go!' 'I flew down the stairs, and, opening the door, I dashed out and fled along the street to a park, where I sat down and cried till a policeman came, who, finding I had no place to go to, sent me here.'

"This is but a specimen," says the matron. "This great city is full of traps for the destruction of young girls; and on the part of our young girls there are two causes why these traps are so successful—laziness and love of dress."

"At this lodging-house we give meals and lodging in return for what the girls can do about the house. We have fifty-three beds, and last winter, for a time, we were more than full; but usually we have only about thirty or forty lodgers. Some who come pay one dollar and a half a week, and go out and look for work. Servant girls come here between service and stay till they find places. Shop-girls stay till they can earn money to get a boarding place; and nearly all our lodger are domestics, doing the entire work of our large house, which we consider a training service, though we are not able to teach special departments of work, as cooking and laundry work, to any great extent. At Christmas we have a turkey dinner, mock mince pie, roast beef; at tea extra cake and apple-sauce, and in the evening a reunion, to which we invite all the girls we know; at Christmas Eve, Santa Claus comes with a present for every girl in the house."

"Every Sunday we have services—in the morning a Bible class, in the evening addresses from gentleman from Dr. Tyng's House of the Evangelists; and every second Sunday Mr. Brace conducts the service."

At No. 47 East Tenth Street, we find a large house with the sign, "Free Training School for Women." The training is done by ladies who volunteer their services, and are there during the day. There is a cheap restaurant in the basement. A man comes every week and gives lectures on cooking. Working-girls are taught three days in the week, and ladies two days, and servant-girls come here to find places. They also teach sewing, dressmaking and telegraphy. Mrs. Hodges and Miss Carson have the school in charge. When we called, the ladies were gone for the day, and there was no one who could give much information.

In Seventh Avenue, corner West Thirteenth Street, is the Home for Friendless Girls.

This is doing a good work, and one much needed. The matron tells us: "We receive girls and young women from ages of ten to twenty-five, keep them one month while they do the work of the house, and then we send them to Christian homes in the country. They come here from the hospital, cured, but not well enough to go to work. We have a great many applications from women from twenty-five to sixty years of age. We have to say, 'No.' There seems to be no place for them. We have taken a few girls, who receive low wages, as boarders. There are three sewing-machines in the house, and we teach all who want to learn to use them. We average twenty-two in family, and they are coming and going all the time; those who remain and those who have come in during the year number one hundred and seventy-seven."

All these institutions appeal to the Christian public for aid to carry on their much needed work.

MAKING A HOME IN THE WILDERNESS.

BY MARY H. THORNE.

MY father was married in the year 1820. About the same time, his father, a small farmer in one of the eastern counties of the then new State of Ohio, in company with some of his neighbors, concluded to sell out, and move farther west, in order to buy land for his children.

The country along the Ohio River was being rapidly filled up, and settlements were forming up the creeks. But, a short distance back from the watercourses, it was all unbroken. There was no danger, at that time, from wild men or wild beasts; the one great obstacle to be overcome was the heavy forests. Into that grandfather and his friends moved. In the first settling of the State, there had been a trail "blazed" from Cincinnati to Portsmouth. It had been "cut out" and "worked" where the stumps would allow it. It was known as the "big road;" there was no other near but paths and "blazes." Grandfather bought land adjoining this road. Father stayed with him until he had a house built and a clearing made; and then, with nothing but his hands and his axe, he went into the woods to make himself a home.

Grandfather had expended all his means in buying land, and had no more to give. And with a feeling still held by some, he seemed to think it would not be safe to trust his children with absolute control of the property he gave them, so he only gave father a "title bond" for his land, with a provision that he could never sell it without his consent; and on those conditions he, a boy not more than twenty, went into the woods, cut the timber off a spot for a yard and garden, built him a cabin and moved in, before his first child was born, in the fall of 1821. Their possessions were small, but hope was large.

They had but one bed, but father bored holes in the wall in which he inserted the ends of two poles, at the proper distance away he fixed two forks to receive the other ends, a pole for the side, some clap-boards for a bottom; his mother gave him linen for a "tick," which he filled with straw; then mother took feathers enough out of her bed to make a pair of pillows, and—they had a spare bed. The rest of their furniture was all equally primitive.

And here they toiled for years. Father had no team, and was compelled to "crop" with some neighbor who had land enough cleared to take a "cropper," that is, a hand who would attend a crop and take a part of it for his pay.

When not employed on his own ground, he worked by the month or day for any one forehanded enough to hire, and so procured those things for his family that he was compelled to buy; and every hour possible, toiling at his own homestead, deadening, chopping, burning, with mother's help, each year widened the area of his own arable land. But it was slow work. Mother was dissatisfied and he was discouraged, when an event occurred which changed matters for them greatly.

Southern Ohio was not surveyed and laid off in sections, like other western lands, but had been granted to officers in the Revolutionary War, as a reward for their services, and they had had them surveyed and their grants located, (loosely, indeed, sometimes two, or even three, claims being "laid" on the same land,) and they, or their heirs, had agents through the country to sell their lands to settlers, and to attend to their interests generally. The man who had the care of the lands in this particular neighborhood, lived in a town near where father was raised, and had known him all his life, and, of course, when he came to see after his employer's affairs, he stayed among his old acquaintances. He was a shrewd man, and it did not take him long to find how things were going with every one around him.

Among these was the man whose land joined father's on one side. He had bought of the same agent, and had been one of the first men, if not the first, who had settled in the neighborhood, at least, he had the best improved farm in the settlement.

It was the custom, at that time, to sell the land to settlers, taking what they could pay down, and allowing them almost their own time to pay the balance, with a low rate of interest, the agent holding the deed, and giving the buyer a title-bond, assuring it to him when he filled the conditions of it. Falling in these, the land was forfeited to the original owner. This man had bought in this way, and built a cabin and a stable, cleared up at least three fields, planted an apple-orchard of good fruits, which, with some pear and cherry-trees, were in full bearing; and had dug a well. After doing all this he had become discouraged and was going to give it up.

General B., the agent, was staying at father's when he learned this, and he proposed to him to sell his little home and buy this. It looked like an utter impossibility, but mother was eager to try. Of course, on the tenure which father held his land, he could only sell it through or to his father, who, at first, refused to listen to any proposal of the kind; but, after days of importunity, mostly from General B., he offered to take back the land at a nominal price, but not a cent in money to make the necessary first payment. Finding him inexorable, the agent proposed to father to take the place, giving his notes, and taking the bond, he waiving the payment down.

It was generous of him, but he told mother "he was bound to give Eli a chance," and he was not afraid to trust him. His father's hardness hurt father's kindly heart cruelly. But, perhaps, it was best. He got a horse (he had managed to get one before), and some farming utensils, a cow, a few sheep and some hogs, and he had now as much cleared land as he could attend to. He moved to his new home, building a new cabin close to the old one, and there I, his first girl, was born.

It took long years of toil and saving to pay for that home, but it was a happy one, for all that; the soil produced well, but there was no market near for years, and money was hard to get, and men used to go "down to the river to harvest," and "down the river to cut cord-wood," or to the "salt-works," to get money to pay their tax, buy leather and salt, three things that could not be done without money. Father never did but the first, but he toiled early and late, planting and sowing, and each year clearing a little more ground, my brothers helping, with their little might, and even mother, after weaving or spinning all day, would go out and gather brush or pick trash to burn till late bed-time, and we all knew that no money must be spent for anything. But, in those times of home-spun, a thrifty woman could do much, and mother was that, truly. Not only was her family always comfortable, but in the villages for miles around, Mrs. —'s jeans, white flannels, linen coverlets and counterpanes, were as well known as some mills are to-day, and though they did not bring money, they did bring a great many comforts, and, for those times, luxuries.

After a time, there was a mill built on the "big creek," six or seven miles away, to do merchant work. Before this the settlers had depended on hand-mills or horse-mills for their bread, but now these men not only ground grain for bread, but bought the surplus, and all the pork in the country, at a low figure, to be sure, but they paid the money for it. That was an era for that section of country, I can tell you. And then came a memorable year, when an enterprising farmer on the river concluded to build a flat-boat himself, and pack his own pork and take his own flour to New Orleans, the only route to the seaboard or the east at all accessible to us at that time; and he announced that he would finish filling his boat, on commission, for such farmers as would trust him with their produce, and father gladly availed himself of the opportunity. And then came a season of working and saving such as we had never known before. As mother said, "every edge had to cut." There was a couple of beeves fattened and killed, all the pork that could be spared was packed, and all the wheat, but just enough for a Sunday loaf, or a mess of warm biscuit, once in a great while, was ground and sent off.

But it was all repaid when Colonel N. returned, and father received money enough, as he joyfully declared, "to swing him clear of the world." And the very next day he put on his many-caped big coat, and mounted "Doctor" and rode twenty miles to D. to make the last payment on his land and receive the longed-for deed which secured his home to him and his children.

I would like to tell the readers of the HOME something of the amusements of those times, the "rollings," the "raisings," the "flax-pulling," the quiltings, the apple-cutting and the sugar-making, the schools, and, above all, the campmeeting. But my article is too long already. The young of the present day can scarcely be made to comprehend the hardships and privations of those who, through them, conquered the wilderness and made of it HOMES.

The Story-Teller.

RACHEL DILLOWAY'S SON.*

BY MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR.

CHAPTER XXI.

"SEE there—and there—and there—and there," said John Farrington to Mrs. Dilloway, one morning in the following spring. "Did you ever see anything so pretty and graceful in all your life?"

"Not in the shape of designs for calico-printing, certainly," was the lady's answer, taking up one drawing after another, and examining it critically. "They are very beautiful. Where did you find them?"

"They came to me last night, by mail, from Linborough. Mrs. Dilloway, if I am any judge, they are the best designs we ever got hold of. It is a new hand, too—so, fresh and unhackneyed. Do you notice? Not one of the old, stereotyped lines and curves. This arabesque in black, green and gold is like nothing in the heavens above or the earth beneath. Yet how graceful it is."

"This is even prettier," said Rachel, taking up another—a gray ground over which ran the pale pink of the trailing arbutus, with here and there a delicate plummy fern—"It is like an April day."

"Who sent them—did you say?" she asked, a moment after, as Mr. Farrington still continued to gaze at the drawings in a brown study.

He drew a letter from his pocket. "This came with them," he said.

It ran thus:

"Linborough, March 7th.

"AGENT OF THE CALICO MILLS AT WOODLEIGH:

"SIR,—I take the liberty of sending you some designs for calico-printing. Will you be so kind as to tell me if they are good for anything? I am not quite sure on that point. Perhaps a design may be pretty, and yet not be practically available. If these should happen to be such as you can use, I trust to your honor to pay me whatever they are worth.

"Very respectfully, yours,

"Unsophisticated, at all events," said Mrs. Dilloway, with a low, musical laugh. "Is 'R. L. Sterling,' a man or a woman?"

"Some young fellow, I imagine," replied Mr. Farrington. "The handwriting might be masculine or feminine, either one."

He took up the letter and read it over. "One thing," he remarked, tapping it with his fingers,

"looks as if it was a woman's work. The writer addresses me as the agent of the 'Calico Mills at Woodleigh.' Now any man, among men, would have known that these were the Dilloway Mills. Whereas, it might be quite possible that a woman should know nothing more than that there were some mills down in Woodleigh, where they made calico. But that's neither here nor there. This person—we will say he for the sake of convenience—does not know his own strength now, but he will not be long in discovering it. And that is what I came up to talk about. I would not have the Nascomas get hold of him and his designs for anything, Mrs. Dilloway!"

Rachel laughed.

"Afraid of your rivals?" she asked, lifting her eyebrows. "But I give you carte-blanche, Mr. Farrington. Secure your prize, if you can. Pay him so well that he will not be tempted to carry his wares to another market."

The next day, when Daisy returned from school, she tossed a letter into Rose's lap.

"Open it quick, Rosy-posy," she said. "See! it is from Woodleigh. Isn't that where you sent your designs?"

Rose's heart seemed to stop beating, and she held the letter in her hand for some minutes before she removed it from the envelope. She was weary of thinking and planning. The late winter months had but confirmed the judgment of those that had gone before. Something besides flower-making must be found for a permanent resource. And she had tried so many things, and formed so many projects, only to be disappointed and to come back to her pansies and rose-buds again!

One day, she had been quite ill, and had lain on the little chintz-covered lounge for many hours; during all of which her busy brain had insisted upon resolving itself into a committee of ways and means. It had added, and subtracted, and multiplied; it had called the short roll of the two or three paintings, the pair of bronzes, the quaint vases and other ornaments—the souvenirs of better days—all so closely associated with her mother's memory. Would the time ever come—was it not surely drawing near—when she would be forced to sell them for half their value? And who could ever prize them as she and Daisy did?

She got up, at last, with a desperate resolve to interest herself in something so absorbing that it should, for a while, drive away these persistently intruding thoughts. What should it be? What if she were to get out her box of water-colors and paint a little while? She had not touched her brushes for so long.

She wished she had some wild flowers to copy.

* Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1874, by MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

If Aunt Jane would only let her have some sprays of the trailing-arbutus that was blooming in the hanging-basket in her south window.

Coming back presently with a few of the pale pink clusters—which were all the more delicate for their indoor growth—and two or three minute fern leaves she had found lifting their dainty heads among the mosses, she was soon absorbed in the pleasant task of painting them upon a bit of card-board.

Aunt Jane came softly into the room and stole up behind her.

"You do beat all!" she exclaimed, adjusting her spectacles for a nearer view. "I wonder if there's anything pretty you can't do? That picture makes me think of a brocade-silk scarf my husband brought me from the Indies the spring before our John was born—more'n forty years ago. 'Twould make a dreadful pretty calico now, wouldn't it? Just them colors and all."

It was not precisely the kind of praise Miss Rose Sterling had been accustomed to receive from friends and teachers. But after she went to bed that night, and the old perplexing questions began surging through her brain again, Aunt Jane's words recurred to her.

Why not? Somebody made the designs for all the new prints. Somebody made very poor ones, too, sometimes; if she might judge from the ungraceful monstrosities often displayed in the shop windows. And had not Mons. Verat once told her in his broken English that she had a gift for designing? Had he not often called her the most promising of his pupils?

She was up with the dawn, eager to try what she could do. All that day, and the next, and the next, the room was strewn with bits of paper and card-board, covered with designs of all sorts, and in all manner of colors. It was harder than she had thought it would be, to satisfy herself. But at length she finished half a dozen, and—as we know—sent them to the "agent of the calico mills at Woodleigh." For Aunt Jane had told her there were mills at that place.

"Open the letter—do, Rose!" said Daisy, looking at her sister with wondering eyes. "What are you waiting for?"

It was opened at last, with trembling fingers; and two new, crisp bank-notes fell into Rose's lap. She picked them up, her cheek flushing.

"Why, little Dot!" she cried, as her eye caught the amount. "Why, see here, child!"

Then, in a sudden passion of tears, she covered her face with her hands.

Daisy hovered about her in a state of consternation. She could not comprehend the joy that put on the garb of grief.

"What is it, Rose?" she whispered. "Isn't it as much as you expected? What does it mean, Rosy?" and she strove to remove the clasped fingers and get a glimpse of the sweet, flushed, tear-stained face.

Rose caught her to her heart, without speaking, while she ran her eyes rapidly over John Farrington's letter.

"It means rest," she cried. "It means time to live, and time to grow. It means that we need not lead scrimped, narrow lives all our days; and it means that you can be educated, Daisy! It means that I can earn more than a bare living; and that we two will not have to be separated. Oh, I thank God!"

"Was it as bad as that?" asked Daisy, in low tones of wonder and alarm. "Did you fear that, Rosy?"

"Yes, I feared that, Daisy. I feared that the only way by which I could give you such an education as mother would have wished, was to break up our little home here, and go away somewhere, where I could earn more—but how or where I did not know. Why, Dot, I could not have earned this," picking up one of the bills, "in a whole month of flower-making!"

Daisy was reading the letter.

"The Dilloway Mills," she said. "That young man's name is Dilloway. Do you suppose they are his?"

"His? No. He is a student in college, you say. I suppose they might belong to his father."

"He hasn't any father. You see I have to be polite to him, Rosy-posy, when he brought me home and was so kind and everything—and one day he told me his father was dead. I don't know what we were talking about. It just happened so. I wish you wouldn't look at me so, Rose!"

"You are a very sensitive little Daisy. I thought a cat might look on a king."

"But—Rose—"

"Well, dear. But what?"

"He's just as good as he can be—and a real gentleman!" the child exclaimed, vehemently; "and he has been so kind to me! I don't feel as if we had treated him very well, Rose."

A little shadow swept over Rose's face.

"Why, Daisy?"

"He wants to call here, I know he does," she said. "He has just as good as asked me if he might, ever so many times. And I had to make believe I did not understand him. I wish I might invite him, Rose."

Rose shook her head, while the shadow deepened.

"I wish so, too, darling; and we might invite him if dear mamma was alive. But, living as we do—we two young girls together—we cannot receive calls from gentlemen. I don't see how we can ever have any society, Dot, until you are a young lady. By that time, maybe, I shall be old enough to be your chaperon. That's one comfort, isn't it?"

Daisy was right. Ever since that wild December night, when Roy had found her in the storm, he had been haunted by a tantalizing picture of the bright little parlor, with its soft tints and glowing fire, of which he had caught one glimpse through the open door; and of the lovely, eager, half-smiling, half-tearful face, with its crown of sunny hair, and its large, soft eyes, that had for one moment looked into his own, ere he bowed and vanished into the darkness.

But it was equally true that Aunt Jane's "linter" and its occupants might have been at the antipodes for all the progress he made toward any farther acquaintance. Since that night, Rose had, indeed, if she chanced to meet him, which was not often the case, recognized his presence by a courteous acknowledgment; and on the first occasion of their meeting she had thanked him warmly for his care of Daisy. But that once done, her quiet, womanly reserve raised a barrier between them that he found it impossible to pass. If his own nature had been less refined, less sensitive, he might not have perceived this barrier which was so intangible, so airy; or, perceiving, he might in his rude strength have overleaped it. As it was, he could have entered Buckingham Palace far far more easily than he could have intruded upon the cloister-like seclusion of Rose's home.

CHAPTER XXII.

COMMENCEMENT-DAYS have been so often described, that any mention of the one which placed the final seal upon Roy's college life, seems almost superfluous. Every summer, from June to August, we hear the "old, old story" repeated over and over again. And yet, like several other old stories, it is always new. To each individual graduate and his own circle of friends, the day is just as solemnly joyous, just as momentous, as if no other man had graduated since the world was made. So, as a large part of Woodleigh is going to Linborough to hear Roy's valedictory, I think we must go, too.

Mr. Forde has the honor of being one of the trustees; and there has been no commencement-day for more than a dozen years, on which his portly figure and calm, benignant face have not appeared upon the stage. Of course, he will be there to-day. So will John Farrington and Molly—who is known no longer as "Molly," but as Mrs. Farrington, the handsome, dignified wife of the agent of the Dilloway Mills. She has kept even pace with her husband, and grown with his growth. Janet's best silk gown has been made over for the occasion, and she is in a little tremor of excitement as she brushes Andrew's black broadcloth suit, and ties his new cravat with her own helpful hands. They are old people now, and do not leave Woodleigh often; and to go to Linborough is quite an event. But is not Master Roy going to speak before the governor, and all the grandees, and the great church-full of people? And shall not they be there, to see and to hear, when the mistress herself suggested it, and said the young master would be glad to have all his own friends near him on that eventful day? Andrew put all his heart into my lady's posy that morning.

Katy is going, also. Not one shall be wanting, Rachel says, of those who have especially loved and cared for her boy.

As for Rachel herself—O mothers! you know all about it; and the rest of you, who are not mothers, would not know if I were to talk till doomsday. So what's the use? But I must tell you how she went the night before, with her little basket in her hand, over the well-worn "cross-lot" path to the graveyard on the hill. She had such a sense of tender pity for him who had lain there so many years, and who had never once, with mortal eyes, beheld the son whose opening manhood was so full of promise and beauty. It seemed to her that even Heaven could not make amends for that; and she laid her little gift of flowers on his grave with such a yearning wish that he might see their boy to-morrow. And yet—as it had done through so many long years—as it would do, she believed, until the day of her death—her heart made its silent protest in the bitter sprig of rue. She had long since ceased to hope that the mystery that darkened between them would ever be lifted.

The Woodleigh party took the early train for Linborough, reaching the city just in time for the exercises at the church. Rachel asked one of the be-ribboned ushers to give Janet and Andrew seats well forward, where they would be sure to see and hear. But they both demurred.

"Nay, nay, my lady," said Janet, much to the young man's amazement. "We will na be pushing ourselfs forward wi' the gentry folk. Indeed, we would na be comfortable. If the young gentleman will but gie us a seat in some by corner, where we can just get a wee blink o' the young master when he comes on to make his speech, that is a' there is about it."

The "grandees" were all there, the governor and his staff, grave judges, stately senators and the great host of the alumni, who had come up to pay their yearly vows at the shrine of the Alma-Mater. There were men there whom the whole world delighted to honor; men, the prestige of whose lives was a constant stimulous and incentive to the younger lives who were following them afar off. The eye grew weary with looking. But of all the honored names in that presence, there was not one more honored or revered than that of Robert Dilloway. Some untoward accident had detained him; and when the procession, headed by the president in his flowing robes of office, entered the church, Rachel's eyes sought him vainly. She did not happen to see him when, fifteen minutes afterward, he quietly reached the stage by a back entrance. She did not even understand it, when a low murmur and rustle ran through the vast audience, swelling louder and louder till it culminated in a tumult of applause and welcome—did not understand it at all, till, with a certain lifted look upon his fine, thoughtful face, he silently bowed his acknowledgments. Roy—poor fellow—felt as if his name was likely to be a disadvantage to him that day.

"I was always thankful my name wasn't George Washington," he said, with a nervous laugh, as, with his companions, he waited behind the inevitable green curtain, listening to the applause. "But I'm afraid it will be almost as bad to be a Dilloway in this presence."

One after another the young orators trod the stage; and mothers and sisters, and, perhaps, dearer ones still, flushed, and smiled, and wept. It was Roy's turn at last, and the senior class filed in, one by one, and took the front seats. It would have been funny, if it had not been pathetic, to see the faces of the Woodleigh people just then—the eager eyes, the tremulous lips, together with the vain attempts to seem perfectly calm and politely indifferent.

It was over at last. It does not matter to tell what was Roy's theme, nor to repeat the earnest, thrilling words of the valedictory. Of course everybody cried. What is the use of going to commencement if you cannot throw off your petty, personal self, with its worldliness and its prosaic daily strivings, long enough to enter into the spirit of the day, and feel as those bright young fellows feel? Doubtless it all seems very trivial to your superior wisdom—but it will do you good to cry, nevertheless.

A shower of bouquets fell at Royal's feet, and the church rang with cheers, as in a voice thrilling with strong yet contained emotion he uttered his closing words. One flowery missile, small, but exquisite in its delicacy and perfume, fluttered down from the gallery just over his right shoulder. The attendants were gathering up the fragrant spoils, but Roy stooped for this one himself, glancing up at the gallery as he rose. His little girl, as he had called Daisy to himself ever since the eventful night of the storm, was leaning over the balustrade with crimson cheeks, and her dark hair floating about her shoulders. And half hidden behind her, with tear-wet eyes and sweet, tremulous mouth, sat Rose. A bright, warm flush chased the excited pallor from Roy's face, as, still holding the flowers, with a little wave of thanks he left the stage.

Left it to have both hands caught by his uncle, and to hear him say, huskily; "I am proud of you, Roy, my boy, and I thank you—for your father's sake!"

For a whole month Daisy had been overflowing with talk about commencement. Everybody went to commencement, and why could not they go? Daisy wanted to see what it was like; and why did they call it commencement, when it was really the end? For students always left college when they graduated, did they not? She wondered if "he"—which pronoun she had substituted for the tabooed "that boy"—would speak? She presumed he would; and for her part she should like to hear him. He had saved her life, maybe. She might have been buried up in the snow and drowned; no, not drowned, exactly, but smothered, or frozen, or something, if he had not taken care of her. And if she went to commencement, and he spoke, she meant to throw him a bouquet. The girls at school said every one threw flowers to their friends.

Thus she rattled on. Rose thought she would like to go herself. But she knew nothing about commencement customs here. She went to Aunt Jane, who, having lived on the Dorchester Road all her life, might be supposed to understand matters.

"Bless your heart, yes," said that lady. "Anybody can go to commencement. I hain't been myself, not for ten years—not since John graduated; but I'd just as lief go with you, if you feel shy about it."

"Did your son go to college?" asked Daisy, with an unconscious glance at Aunt Jane's hard hands.

"Oh, yes! he went, and graduated with the best of 'em. But the Lord made him for a seafaring man, like his father—and he had to go, after all.

He's captain of a merchantman—and owner of it, too," said the mother, with pardonable pride.

So Daisy had her three wishes—they went to commencement, "he" spoke, and she dropped at his feet the little bouquet that Rose had arranged with dainty care—care that there should be nothing in it out of harmony with the perfect sweetness and beauty of the day.

As for him, he would pass out of their lives, now and forever. That is to say, he would have passed out, if he had ever been in. Rose knew who he was now. The Dilloway Mills were not his, but they would be some day. She wondered if he would ever know that it was she who had furnished some designs for them, and to whom that good Mr. Farrington had written such kindly, encouraging letters? And if he did, how would he think of her? As of the girls, no older than herself, who worked in his mills, yet belonged to another world?

She felt so very far away from him that day, as she sat in the gallery, gazing down upon the sea of heads. Very foolish of her to think of him at all? Well, you must remember that she had "all the blood of all the Howards" in her azure veins; and that she had also all a young girl's veiled romance and enthusiasm. And in all that great, desolate city he was the only one of her own social and spiritual kindred—of her own caste, as it were—who had been thrown in her way. She had come to commencement on purpose to hear him speak. How could she help thinking about him?

Yet the distance between them seemed immeasurable that day, even with all the long line of stately grandfathers and grandmothers at her back. It was not always easy for Rose Sterling, brave as she was, to take up the burden of a life so totally at war with all the traditions of her race.

Was that his mother—that lovely, graceful woman in soft grays, to whom she saw him speaking several times in the course of the afternoon? It must be, for she looked at him with such proud, tender, smiling eyes. How blessed their life must be, with wealth, and ease, and love!

Rose had no thought of being moved by Roy's words. She owned to a little curiosity—that was all. Daisy leaned over the front of the gallery, and watched the young speaker as if her life depended upon seeing every gesture he might make. But she, after the first few sentences, was glad to draw back into the shadow and hide her burning cheeks and tear-wet eyes behind her sister's exequant little figure.

"He was just splendid!" declared the latter, as she danced along toward home. "He made me think of that Apollo we saw so many times in the Louvre—do you remember? But I don't see what there was to cry about. You're just the funniest girl, Rose!"

To which charge Rose made no reply.

CHAPTER XXIII

"AND now, Roy, if you are going abroad, the sooner you go the better. That is my judgment," said Robert Dilloway, one morning of the next week, as the family party of three sat at the breakfast-table.

"It is mine, also," added Rachel. "You are looking a little tired after all the excitement of the last few months. Why not go at once?"

Roy looked from one to the other.

"Mother—Uncle Robert," he said, "I have been wanting to talk with you about this matter. My whole feeling has changed with regard to it. I would rather not go—not now, at least."

"Well, well!" exclaimed his uncle. "That is a change. Why not, pray?"

"I thought that the very last day-dream you would be willing to give up," said his mother, a little reproachfully.

"Will it be such a disappointment to you both?" he asked. "Perhaps I cannot make you quite understand me. But I want to go to work. I feel as if I should enjoy a year or so of Europe vastly better after I had earned it. I want to do something."

"But we want you to do something, my dear boy. You'll find work enough in the tour you have proposed, if you manage it rightly."

"Yes. But in my case, and at my age, it would be a pleasure-soaking, dilettanteish sort of work, after all. This is no new whim, Uncle Rob. It has been growing upon me for a year. I am twenty-one, and I want to begin my real, sober life-work. By-and-by, mother, when you think I have earned a play spell, I shall be glad to take it."

"But what makes you in such a hurry? What's the matter?" said Rachel, leaning forward and placing her hand upon her son's shoulder.

Roy laughed. "I don't know," he answered, his voice trembling a little, in spite of the laugh. "I don't know, unless it is because I am more of a man than I was a year ago. I imagine I am a good deal like my father," and he raised his eyes with a reverent, thoughtful look to the pictured face upon the wall. "I want to grasp something solid and tangible. I want to grapple with material forces, and bend them to my will."

He stopped suddenly, flushed and half-ashamed of his own earnestness.

"I heard Farrington say, a week or two ago, that there was need of another blacksmith's shop down the hill," said his uncle, drily. "Perhaps you might set up an altar there for the worship of the God Vulcan. I'll furnish the necessary capital. Or, there's the contingent fund, Rachel!"

"Now you are just laughing at me, Uncle Rob. But look there!" and he stretched out his right arm. "Feel of those muscles. I am so conscious of physical life and strength, Uncle Rob, I feel like a young Hercules. And I don't want to spend that strength loitering over Europe, dreaming in picture-galleries and picking up a dilettantiesh sort of knowledge. I doubt if I am ready for the real sort yet. It seems to me that one needs to be taught of life and experience, before one can fully comprehend art, or even nature."

"Now, Rachel, you may see what Daniels for judgment, and Solomons for wisdom, the young men of this day and generation are," said Professor Dilloway, gravely. "When I was at this gentleman's age, there was nothing but Europe for me."

"Yes," answered Roy. "But you went there to do your real work, Uncle Robert. You did not go just for a play-spell, while the work waited."

"The boy is right, Robert," said Rachel, her eye kindling. "I am willing to trust his own instincts and intuitions. If he had rather have work than Europe, so let it be."

"To which I heartily cry amen!" answered Robert. "I agree with you entirely, Roy. But I wanted to be certain that you understood yourself."

"Three cheers for Mill-Day!" cried Roy, springing to his feet and tossing his napkin into the air. "Mother! our old Mill-Days are at the bottom of it, I don't doubt. 'Just as the twig,' you know!" Then passing his arm about her waist, he whispered: "I want to share them with you again, lunch and all, mother—and take them off your hands entirely, after a while."

And Rachel smiled in the fulness of her heart's content. She had been the regent only. She would be glad to abdicate when the king should claim his throne.

They went out on the piazza overlooking the mills, the village, the wooded hills beyond, the far blue mountains, lying like billowy clouds against the horizon—Rachel leaning upon the arm of her stalwart son, whose face was radiant at that moment with the ineffable light and glory of a pure and spotless manhood, rejoicing in its strength.

Robert looked after them for a moment, and then left them to themselves.

It was excessively hot—for Woodleigh. The encircling hills seemed to shut out every breath of air, and for a week the very leaves had hung motionless.

"I am possessed by a strange longing for the sea," said Rachel, that night. "Perhaps it is because I have been thinking of it so much, lately, imagining that Roy would soon be on it."

"Let us all go the Gray Beaches, take a cottage and make ourselves comfortable for a few weeks," remarked Robert, fanning himself with his broad-brimmed Panama hat. "That is, if this young man can spare the time. The very thought of it is refreshing."

"I'll make the sacrifice—for your sake, Uncle Rob," said Roy, laughing lightly. "When shall we go? To-morrow?—next day?"

"The day after—which will be Friday," answered Rachel, with her quick decision. "I should like it of all things. And we will take Janet—if she will go. It will do her good."

Saturday found them at the Gray Beaches—a quiet watering-place whose freshness and beauty were as yet consecrated to the few. The great crowd of summer tourists had not yet discovered this gem of the sea—this fairy island lying far enough from the mainland to give one a sense of utter seclusion and rest; and yet not so distant but that one could see, afar off, the emerald shores, the sloping hills with their fadeless garniture of green, the hamlets scattered along the coast, and the domes and spires of one large town, upon which, every night, the sunset kindled its golden fires.

There were two hotels at the Gray Beaches, and half a dozen cottages. One of these latter our party was fortunate enough to secure; and then, with eager zest, they gave themselves up to the enchantment of the sea. There were enough queer specimens of the finny tribe, strange fossils, and curious rock formations, to interest Robert, and to give him the semblance of employment that does but enhance one's sense of happy idleness; there was fishing for Roy, and there was rowing; there were long rambles about the lovely island; there were towering cliffs from which to watch the spectro-like ships as they passed silently in the far distance, laden with the spoil of many climes; there was the swimming and battling with the surf, in which he exulted like any young sea-king; and though there was no rushing crowd, there was plenty of society, if he wanted it.

For Rachel there was all the shifting splendor of sea and sky, the voice of many waters, sunrise and moonrise, and the peace that passeth understanding. Janet was content to sit all day on the verandah, knitting in hand, watching the rolling in of the tide, and the dashing of the surf upon the wave-worn rocks; counting the sea-gulls as they swooped downward for their prey, or the little sand-pipers that flitted along the beach. But she could not be induced to go into the water, insisting that it was against nature.

"You're very kind, my lady," she would say, in answer to all Rachel's expostulations, "but I will na go in. It's aye tempting Providence. I have na fins an' gills like a fish, nor am I web-footed like a duck. Then why should I leave my ain native element and take to the water? It's a' nonsense—this fussing an' bathing. A' bodies should be clean, an' that's enough."

They had been on the island about three weeks, when, one sunny noon, Roy lay under the shadow of a great rock, listening "to the incessant sobbing of the sea," and watching the amethystine gleam and sparkle of the waves, as, their topmost crests tipped with silver, they curled and broke almost at his very feet. Suddenly a cry of affright and pain—a child's cry, apparently—rose above the soft, inarticulate murmur of wind and wave. Roy sprang to his feet in an instant, listening for a repetition of the sound. It came presently—from the other side of the rock, which was on a little promontory jutting out into the sea.

"Oh! oh! Rose, I can't walk a step! I believe I've broken my leg; or my ankle, anyway!"

Roy's face crimsoned, and a sudden light broke over it. Surely he had heard that voice before; and—Rose? that was not a common name. Yet what chance was there that any sweet cloister-Rose was blooming on this island?

"Don't cry, Daisy, dear; I'm so sorry. There! do not try to step, but lean on me. How is that? Can you move your ankle a little, dearie—just a little?"

There was another sharp cry of pain.

"Oh! I can't stir it, Rose! Not a bit! It's broken, or sprained, or something!"

Roy deliberately walked round the corner of the rock, hat in hand.

"Why! why, where did you come from?" cried

Daisy, pain being for the moment swallowed up in astonishment. Rose said not a word, though her color deepened. But she asked herself wonderingly if Daisy's hero was omnipresent.

"From the other side of this rock," he said, smiling, "where, as I lay dreaming a moment ago, I heard the cry of a fair damsel in distress. The fates have sent me to your aid again, Miss Daisy."

He hesitated for an instant, glancing from her to Rose, who bowed silently. Whereupon Daisy went through with a quaint little ceremony of introduction, at which both Rose and Roy laughed; and under the benign influence of that laugh, the ice thawed marvellously.

"Now may I ask what I can do for you?" said Roy.

But before either could reply, Daisy gave her ankle a little wrench, and grew white to the very lips as she sank to the ground.

"Take off my shoe, Rose, quick!" she cried. "How am I ever going to get back to the hotel?"

The ankle was swelling rapidly. Roy stood for a moment, irresolute, while Rose placed a folded shawl under Daisy's head.

"Has she been ill?" he whispered, as the child's eyes closed, and he noticed the dark circles under them. "She is much thinner than when I saw her last." "On commencement-day," he had been about to add, when some secret consciousness checked him.

"Yes," said Rose, "she has had a low, nervous fever for three weeks. The doctor said she must go where it was cooler; and so I brought her here. We only came last night, and she seemed so bright and happy over it. Now this will spoil it all, I am afraid."

"Oh, no, I hope not!" exclaimed Roy, eager to offer some consolation, though he hardly knew how. "But I really fear that the ankle is badly sprained; and it should be attended to at once. Miss Sterling, my mother is but a few rods off—in the last of the cottages yonder. Will you let me bring her to you? She will know just what to do. She always does."

But Daisy gave a faint little moan just at that moment, and Roy darted away without waiting for Rose's answer.

And then that irrepressible child, her face as white as a sheet, and her lips quivering with pain, said with a little gurgle of laughter: "There, Rosy-posy, you were determined you would not get acquainted with him, and you see you had to, after all! I knew you would."

"It is very easy to say, 'I told you so,' after a thing has happened," retorted Rose. "But you need not have introduced us—for I had spoken to him before."

"You had? Why didn't you tell me? I did not know it."

"But I had. Lie still, now, and let me cut off your stocking—there's a good little Daisy."

Rachel was putting on her hat before Roy had half finished his story, and tearing strips of cotton for a bandage. As they walked swiftly along over the sandy beach—the peculiar gray color of which gave its name to the island, Roy told his mother all he knew about the two girls. The all was not much.

"And they seem to be orphans—living by themselves?" Rachel said, her quick sympathies stirring warmly. "Sterling—Sterling," she repeated. "The name seems very familiar; yet I cannot quite place it. Do you know where they came from?"

"I know nothing beyond what I have told you," he answered. "But there they are—just round the rock."

The severe pain, driven away, in a measure, by Roy's unexpected appearance, had returned in full vigor, and Daisy was crying silently, her eyes closed and her face set and white. Rachel clasped Rose's hand for an instant as Roy pronounced her name, and then passing on, kneeled by the little girl's side.

"My poor child," she said, tenderly, "is the pain so very hard to bear?"

Daisy opened her heavy eyes for a moment and looked earnestly in the face that was bending over her. Whether it was the large, sweet motherliness she saw there that won her, or whether it was the quick outgoing of her own affectionate, impulsive nature that moved her, cannot be known. But, after one long, steady gaze, she lifted both arms and put them around Rachel's neck, drawing her face down to hers.

Rachel kissed her.

"There!" she said, blithely, "now we are the best of friends, and you are going to let me bandage your ankle, are you not? It will give you some pain, probably; but I am something of a surgeon in a small way, and feel sure I can help you."

It was with a very odd sense of sudden and almost inexplicable companionship that Roy held the pins while Rose assisted his mother in the adjusting of that bandage. He had not the remotest idea of "falling in love" with Rose Sterling. But, from the very first, there had been for him a strange, an unwonted fascination in the young, fair face, with its crown of wavy, golden hair. He said to himself that it was merely the unusual combination of very dark eyes and eyelashes with such softly tinted wild-rose cheeks, and such a profusion of sunny tresses, that had attracted him. He liked to look at her, as at a picture—that was all! Besides, he had felt an intense interest in the two young sisters whose lives seemed so blended in one, and who lived in such a lonely, quiet way. There was just a little touch of mystery about them, that had appealed strongly to his fancy and imagination. He had so longed to break down the invisible barriers between them and to place himself upon the footing of a friend. But it had been impossible. Rose, at least, had seemed as far out of reach as the evening star.

And now here, in the twinkling of an eye, as it were—without any plotting or conscious co-operation on his part—without his volition, even—they were standing side by side, engaged in a common office, under the sweet and hallowed sanction of his mother's presence.

It was one of the daily miracles, at which young hearts will not cease to wonder as long as the world stands.

"And now, what are you going to do with her?" asked Rachel, as Rose whispered a few shy words of thanks. She, too, had not been without her own wondering reflections during those few moments of silence. She had not thought on commencement-day, that, in less than a month, she and the lovely lady in the soft grays would be kneeling on the sands together, bandaging Daisy's ankle!

"Our room is at the Argonaut," said Rose.

"Up-stairs?"

"Yes—up four flights," was the dubious answer.

"That will never do," said Mrs. Dilloway.

"There is no elevator, of course?"

"I doubt if they ever heard of such a thing," was the laughing reply. "All the arrangements of the house are of a rather primitive order."

"We went there," chimed in little Daisy, "because the house is kept by a cousin of Aunt Jane's; and she told us how still and lovely it was here, and wrote to him about us, too."

A true statement, as far as it went, if somewhat indefinite as to personal pronouns. But Rose was in no mood for sailing under false colors—certainly not in that presence.

"And because it is a much cheaper house than the other," she added, bravely. "I do not doubt our accommodations are as good as we could expect for the price we pay. So we will make the best of it, Daisy."

Roy strolled carelessly away, obeying a signal from his mother's eye.

"Miss Sterling," said Rachel, when he was out of hearing, "it will not do for your little sister to be taken to a room up four flights of stairs—for it will be weeks before she can get down again; and you will lose nearly all the benefit you expected from your stay here. She must be on a first floor, somewhere. In that case she would be able to be out of doors in a very few days, I hope."

Rose shook her head a little sadly.

"I know it, Mrs. Dilloway," she said. "But the lower floors are all crowded; and the charges at the other house are so exorbitant that Daisy and I can't afford to go there—can we, Dot?"

"No—I think not," replied Daisy, slowly. "You know we planned it all out before we came here; and now that little misstep of mine just upsets everything. It's very hard for you, Rosy-posy," and the little hand that had grown thin and white during the past few weeks, patted Rose's cheek caressingly. "You worked so hard to get the money."

It was a moment before Rachel could speak, and she saw the blue sea and the distant shore with misty eyes. Then she said, softly, laying one hand on Rose's arm and smoothing Daisy's hair with the other: "My dear Miss Sterling, you two sisters are all alone, as I understand. Will you forget that we are strangers, and let me make a little plan for you? There is a room in my cottage over yonder for which we have no especial use. You can have it just as well as not. Will you be my guest for a few days? For Daisy's sake, dear," she added, quickly, as she saw the shrinking in Rose's face, and read all the shy pride, the fear of intruding, the womanly hesitation.

"Oh, do say yes, Rosy!" cried Daisy, who, with all a child's frankness, felt no hesitation whatever. "It would be so nice, and I should feel dreadfully to be shut up in our little sky parlor."

It was hard to resist, after that; and in a few minutes it was all settled. Rose seemed to herself to be in a dream. Even yet she could hardly comprehend how it had come about. Rachel beckoned to Roy, who was throwing shells in the water at a convenient distance.

"Now for a carriage, Roy," she said; "and we will have this little lady at the cottage in a trice. She is to be my guest for awhile, since Dr. Dilloway declares she must not go up-stairs."

"It is but a few steps," answered Roy, measuring the distance to the cottage with his eye. "If Miss Daisy will allow me, I can carry her with the greatest ease, and the removal will give her little pain, I think."

"I am pretty heavy," said Daisy, gravely.

"But I have carried you once already," he replied, with a laughing glance at Rose; "so, you see, I know just what I am undertaking. You were heavier then than you are now, besides being wrapped, like a mummy, in my fur cloak. Shall we try it?"

For answer, Daisy put up her arms, and Roy lifted her tenderly from her sandy couch. But it was a white little face that rested on his shoulder; and though Mrs. Dilloway steadied the lame foot with the greatest care, Rose was glad when the cottage was reached, and was thankful that they were to go no farther.

EDITH BURTON.

BY SUSAN B. LONG.

"THAT'S her, papa! That's her, I'm sure!" I cried, excitedly, seizing the individual addressed by the hand, and hurrying him down the long platform, in front of the station, towards a tall lady, who was standing beside a very unpretending but respectable looking pile of baggage. She was evidently expecting some one, but seemed perfectly composed, and not in the least anxious.

"There! that one," I whispered, as we came nearer. "She's a perfect Edith Dombey, isn't she!"

Papa looked down upon me with a mischievous smile—he was always teasing me about my heroines—but just at that moment a friend detained him, requesting a moment's conversation.

"Well go on then, Emmy, and make the acquaintance of your heroine, and I will follow you directly," he said, pushing me gently forward, while he stopped behind with his friend.

Before I had time to realize that I was about to address a stranger, I was at the lady's side, and she turned upon me a pair of bright blue eyes—keen and searching, and full of a magnetic light, which drew me unconsciously to her. "Not at all Edith Dombey's eyes—cold, calm and proud,"—I said to myself.

"I feel sure that you are Miss Burton," I said, with a glance, and a slight gesture of my hand towards her trunk, upon which was her name, "and I am Emily Truman; and papa and I have come to meet you, and take you home with us."

"Ah!" she said, and the keen, bright eyes smiled down at me, as she held out a slender gloved hand. After a moment's scrutiny, she added, still retaining my hand, "It is very pleasant, when all is strange about one, to be met by such a friendly face. Are you to be one of my pupils?"

"Yes ma'am," I answered, "and there are several other girls about my age; so you will have plenty of friends very soon."

"If they are all as kind and good as I think you are," she replied, "I am sure I shall have a pleasant school."

Papa came up at this moment, and asked me if I had found the lady of whom I was in search. "Of whom you were in search, you mean," I retorted and then turning to the lady I said: "This is my father, Miss Burton. He is very much afraid of school ma'ams and so he sent me to speak to you first."

They both laughed a little, as they exchanged greetings; but papa blushed, and seemed so embarrassed, that I grew frightened, thinking I had said something very improper indeed.

We were soon on our way home, and papa was himself again, doing most of the talking, while I studied my new friend; for friends I felt we should be, spite of the disparity in our ages and positions.

The circumstances which led to her coming among us were these: Papa had written to an old and intimate friend in the city of C—, in an adjoining state, begging his assistance in finding a competent teacher for our school, for the coming winter. He took especial pains to impress upon him the fact that the position would be an onerous one; the school having, unfortunately, gained the reputation of being the most ungovernable one in the county—a reputation fairly merited, too, as plenty of teachers both male and female could testify.

Papa, on being elected a member of the Board of Trustees for the District, had proposed that a lady, and one who should be a total stranger to the character of the school, should be employed. His proposition was agreed to, and he accordingly wrote to his friend, who recommended Edith Burton, and kindly offered to act for papa in securing her services.

A portion of papa's letter recurred to me now, as I sat beside her in the carriage, taking note of her every look and motion. "Do you know of a lady of pleasing address, a good deal of tact, 'slow to anger,' but firm as a rock, some experience in teaching, etc., etc." As I recalled it, I wondered to myself whether the quiet, reserved, extremely lady-like young girl at my side possessed all those qualifications. I hoped so sincerely, for if she did not, well did I know there was no hope of her success in the position she was about to occupy.

That she was "of pleasing address," I was ready to declare; and I was sure papa thought so too, for I never knew him more animated and interesting in conversation. As to her looks, I could not decide at once, whether to pronounce her handsome or not; she was not beautiful, like Edith Dombey, certainly; her nose was not perfect and her mouth was too large; but still, her face was a very attractive one, owing chiefly to the faultless fairness of her complexion, and the wonderfully magnetic eyes. Her hair, I had no hesitation in pronouncing the most beautiful I had ever seen; light, or golden brown, and slightly wavy, very abundant, soft and long; though this I did not observe critically until we had reached home and she had removed her hat, when I discovered that all its glossy abundance was natural to her head.

It was nearly dark when we arrived at home, where dear grandma gave the young stranger a smiling welcome, and then bade me show her to her room where she could remove her wrappings, and make what alterations in her dress she wished, before tea.

Immediately upon reaching her room, she turned to me and asked softly and earnestly, "Have not you a mother?"

I shook my head, the tears springing to my eyes, as they still would, at the least allusion to that tender friend, "She died two years ago," I answered.

"I have been motherless ten years," she replied taking both my hands and holding them closely in hers, and there was unutterable sadness in her voice, "I well know what that means; and now," she added after a pause, suddenly dropping my hands and going swiftly to a window, while the sadness in her voice changed to agony, "now I am fatherless, too."

She stood gazing out into the gathering dusk, and I could see her slight form shake with the intensity of the emotion she was striving so bravely to conquer. I would have given worlds, then, it seemed to me, to be able to express the sympathy that filled my heart for the lonely stranger; but could find no fitting words; so I went and put my arm around her and leaned my head against her shoulder. She mastered her grief in a few moments, and then stooping over me we kissed each other, without speaking; but that kiss I felt to be a compact of love and friendship between us which should last while time should last.

This was on Saturday evening, and she was to remain with us over Sunday and begin the school upon the following Monday. It was understood by myself and my brother Nel, that we were to volunteer no information regarding the character of the school, and to avoid as much as possible any allusion to particular pupils, in case Miss Burton should ask any questions leading to the subject. Indeed, as Nel himself was fast becoming one of the most unruly members in the school, the last clause in our instructions was scarcely necessary.

The evening passed very agreeably, papa and grandma doing most of the talking, Miss Burton seeming best pleased with the part of listener. I say the evening passed very agreeably, and it did, on the whole, I believe; but Nel made me very angry several times, by communicating to me, in sundry ways, the very low estimate he placed upon the qualifications of the new teacher. Indeed, his nods, winks, and grimaces, were indulged in at every possible opportunity when they could be without attracting the attention of the others, regardless of my frowns, until I turned my back upon him and refused to notice him in any way.

Now, he would direct my attention to her slender fingers and wrist, comparing them with his own, so thick and brown; then, to her white delicate throat, pretending that he could span it with one hand; or, he would ridicule the smallness of her waist; and, finally, when she drew towards the fire and put out from beneath her dress a slender, perfectly fitting walking boot, he took occasion, very soon, to make his own awkward, heavy boots as conspicuous as possible.

You must know that Nel was just at the age (twelve years) when bodily strength and endurance are qualities greatly to be desired, and the fact that he could "master" me, who was three years his senior, and no fairy in build, was quite as gratifying to him, as it was unpleasant to me.

The "first day of school" was always an exciting occasion for me; but on the following Monday my excitement took the form of anxiety. I did so hope the new teacher would make the same favorable impression upon the school that she had upon me. Somehow, I could not help regarding her as an unconscious victim; and feeling as though papa, and in some sort of a way, myself, too, had been guilty of treachery in bringing her into a situation where she was certain to encounter difficulties such as she seemed to me so unfitted to meet. As for Nel, I was determined that she should not be troubled by him. Instead of shielding him, as I had heretofore most unwisely done, I should acquaint papa, with his very first disrespectful word or act towards her, and he should take the consequences, be they ever so severe.

Nothing particularly unpleasant occurred during Monday, to my great relief. The large girls voted her "awful nice," and the boys admitted that she was a "stunner," and that was quite as much as I could reasonably expect of them.

"Well," said papa, that evening, "how did your Edith Dombey succeed to-day?"

"O, papa!" I replied, "I was wrong to compare her to Edith Dombey; she is ever so much too good. She may seem a little like her at first—before you know her, you know—but now, I think she is really more like Florence, gentle and loving, and just as true as steel. Oh! I do so hope those terrible boys will behave themselves this winter. What can such a delicate, lady-like looking thing as she, do with them if they don't? I saw Nel and Fred Williams, laughing and sneering about her slender hands and wrists to-day. Oh it seems almost cruel to have brought her here!"

"Tell Nel and Fred Williams, not to count too much upon the weakness of those hands and wrists," said papa, "they may be stronger than they look. Besides, if I can read her face correctly, she has a will to back them, and render them sufficient for the occasion, I'll venture to guess."

"Papa," I said, "you never told me what Mr. Selby said about her, when he recommended her, though I asked you at the time. I should like to know how old she is, at least."

"I never showed you the letter because I thought it would be an advantage, both to Miss Burton and the school, to be wholly unknown to each other. I think it will do no harm, now, to impart to you some of the items of information which the letter contained, as you seem so anxious about the success of your friend, as you call her. She is twenty years old, has taught for the last three years in the public schools of C—, and for the last year and a half, in a gymnasium for ladies and children, in that city. Selby's words were: 'she has the best trained nerves and muscles in the city, and is as agile as a panther and nearly as strong. I think you will find her equal to every emergency that will arise either in teaching or governing. We are sorry to part with her, but a change of scene and air is absolutely necessary for her. If she is not appreciated among you, we shall only be too glad to welcome her home again, after a reasonable time.'

"Oh!" I said, drawing a long breath, "I feel so relieved about her, now."

The next day, all passed on very smoothly until near the time for the afternoon recess, when an affair occurred which furnished food for much excited conversation during that intermission.

"Now," said Miss Burton, in her pleasant, cheery, ringing voice, "let us have ten minutes of close study before recess. Let no one ask a question, or make the least disturbance in any manner, until they hear the bell."

Everyone obeyed with seeming cheerfulness, and for the space of five minutes there was almost perfect silence throughout the room. Then, all at once, Nel arose and said abruptly, "Miss Burton, may I go and speak to Jemmie Joyce?"

"Certainly not," was the quick reply, accompanied by a look of pained surprise. "Sit down," she continued, seeing him hesitate, "and resume your study, and remain in your seat during recess."

"I'd rather not, thank you!" said Nel; and then thrusting his hands into his pockets, he deliberately left his seat and swaggered along towards that of Jemmie Joyce, winking to one and another of the boys as much as to say, "Let's see what she'll do about it."

I was thunderstruck. I knew he was far from a good boy in school, but did not deem him capable of conduct so openly insulting as this. I learned afterwards that the whole thing had been planned beforehand by the older boys and they had drawn lots to see who should carry it out, and the lot had fallen to him.

Miss Burton was standing by her desk, at one end of the room, with her watch in her hand. The distance between her and Jemmie Joyce's desk was farther than from Nel's to the same point, but by the time he had passed over half the distance, she had seized him by the collar of his coat behind, and dragging him backward laid him sprawling upon the floor, in the clear space in the middle of the room. The action was so sudden and so entirely unexpected by him, that he had no time to offer any resistance, so that, although much surprised and greatly chagrined at the ludicrousness of his situation, he still had no idea but what he should come out best at last. He burst into a forced laugh to cover his confusion, and gathered himself up as quickly as possible—rather, he attempted to do so, and had nearly succeeded in gaining an upright position, when he found himself seized by both arms, twitched suddenly forward, and then backward, and forced down upon his knees, and held there, firmly fixed to the floor, despite all his struggles to free himself or get upon his feet. The slender fingers closed upon his arms with the grasp of a vice, pinning them to his sides, and himself to the floor at the same time. There was a silent struggle for a few minutes, when Miss Burton spoke. There was a slight flush upon her cheeks, and her eyes were nearly black and shone like stars, but her voice was clear and calm, with no shade of faltering.

"Be quiet, now, and listen to me," she said. "Don't struggle. It is perfectly useless. I have the advantage, and know my own strength and yours, too, better than you do—though this is the first time I have ever been forced to rely upon brute force to secure obedience in school. Promise me, at once, that you will go quietly to your seat and remain there through the recess, and I will allow you to rise."

He remained silent and sullen for a minute, and then said with forced bravado: "What if I won't promise?"

"We will not consider that side of the question," was the calm reply; "you will promise, and that directly, and put an end to this disgraceful scene."

Thoroughly convinced by this time that it was useless to contend with her, and heartily ashamed of his ridiculous position—for there were titterings and whisperings at his expense in all parts of the room—but still hoping to leave the field with some show of victory, he at last said, loudly and saucily: "Well, I promise, then! Will that do?"

"When you say it respectfully it will do, certainly," was the firm reply.

He made another ineffectual struggle to release himself, and then, all at once, the "bully" gave way, and the better part of his nature—which was really his true nature—asserted itself.

"I promise, Miss Burton," he said, looking her honestly and respectfully in the face; "and I ask pardon for disobeying you."

This was Nel's last act of insubordination that winter.

"Gracious!" said he to the boys, who were teasing him about his defeat the following morning; "just you try it yourself, if you want to understand how it was. 'Twasn't so much her strength—though who'd 'a' thought such little fingers could grip so!—but, my gracious! her eyes just go right through a feller, and seem to take all the vim out of him, and—and just make him feel like a baby."

The unsuccessful termination of this affair did not deter one or two other attempts of a like nature by different unruly spirits in the school: but in each case the treatment was equally prompt and effectual.

She never threatened, or lost her temper, but was always firm, decided and ready to meet every difficulty before it had hardly time to shape itself. At the same time, her kindness and gentle dignity was fast winning the love and respect of the whole school; so that ere the first half of the term was passed, there was such a marked improvement in their manners, that the remark was often made by those interested enough to notice the change, that the school was fast "losing its reputation."

It was the custom with us, as with all country schools in that part of the West, for the teacher to "board around." I had conceived such an ardent attachment to "my heroine," as papa used often to call her, that I was not disposed to be satisfied with the meagre share of her company that custom allotted us; and so, with very little trouble, I caused the arrangement to be made that she should spend the Saturdays and Sundays of every week at our house. She was a finished elocutionist; and, better still, played the organ and sang beautifully; so that it was rare enjoyment that marked the evenings of her weekly presence in our cosy sitting-room during that winter. Only Miss Burton read; we taking the rôle of pleased and gratified listeners. But when music was introduced, we all participated—papa with his rich bass, Nel with his smooth, girlish alto, while Miss Burton and I united our voices in the soprano, either she or I presiding at the organ. Even grandma's tremulous but musical tones were often heard when we came to those grand, old-time pieces—Coronation, Old Hundred, Balerna, etc.

The time passed so agreeably, both in school and out, that the winter was nearly gone before we were aware; and Miss Burton quite startled us all, one Friday evening, by saying—and I thought she said it regretfully—as she laid down the book she had been reading, while I was arranging the music, etc., for what Nel called "the next performance," that three weeks more would bring the school to a close.

"And that being the case," she went on, after a pause, looking up at papa with a bright, confiding smile, "and it being the case, also, that I must keep a sharp look-out for the future, I should like to know soon whether I may expect to have the school for the coming summer." She paused, but papa not seeming about to reply, she added: "If my course in the school has been satisfactory here, I should much like to remain, another term, at least."

I could not imagine what did all papa! He really looked frightened, I thought, at first, and then dreadfully embarrassed, and actually blushed. He coughed and hemmed, caught up a book and "flipped" the leaves once or twice, and laid it down again, but still remained "tongue-tied," as it seemed. I could bear it no longer, for I could see that Miss Burton began to look pained and disappointed, so I broke out: "Of course you have given perfect satisfaction! Of course you must stay! Mustn't she, papa?"

"Stay?" said papa, looking unaccountably confused still. "Oh, certainly I wish her to stay! But—I—ah—yes, yes, certainly, Miss Burton, you have given perfect satisfaction as a teacher, and I have no doubt but what the trustees will be glad to have you remain through the summer. I will consult them soon and let you know."

Miss Burton was evidently surprised and hurt at papa's manner more than his words, both of which were so different from what she had reason to expect, and she said, with much more dignity and formality than she had used with him for a long while: "If it will be quite convenient, will you please consult with them to-morrow, and let me know your decision to-morrow evening. I received a letter to-day from a friend, who wishes me to take charge of the school in her village, and I must give an answer without delay."

She arose as she finished speaking, and went and seated herself at the organ, and we took our usual positions about her; but somehow an unnatural reserve seemed to have come over us all. We attempted our familiar pieces, but our singing was out of time, and lacked spirit. Papa, especially, seemed absent-minded, and made blunders without number, and at last, with one consent, we all left the instrument, and soon after separated for the night.

Papa left home the next morning soon after breakfast, to be gone the whole day. Before he went, it happened that he and I were alone together in the breakfast-room, and he drew me toward him, as he stood at one of the windows and said, with a look and manner that puzzled me sorely, for it was not usual for him to hesitate and seem embarrassed with his own family: "You are a wonderfully clear-sighted little lady, usually, Emmy—tell me, have you perfect confidence in Miss Burton? I know you like her immensely, and all that; but are you sure that she is just what she seems? You thought her perfection at first. Have you found no flaws in her yet?"

I felt my personal importance a good deal enhanced by his thus consulting my judgment, and by his compliment to my clear-sightedness.

"Why, papa!" I exclaimed, without waiting to see if he had finished, in my eagerness to give him a "piece of my mind," now that he had opened the way to it, and, in a measure, invited it. "Why, papa, you are not used to be so exacting with teachers! What has possessed you to be so disagreeable? I can't understand it at all! We never had a teacher before who did one-twentieth part as much for the school as Miss Burton has done, and now you go to hesitating and making scruples about keeping her another term. Talk about my having confidence in her, and all that! I'm sure she can't have much confidence in us!" (I said us, but meant him.) "I'm sure she must think us perfect Judases—making believe all winter that we think her just perfect, and then when she asks for the school another term, raising difficulties and making bones over it, as though it would be the greatest condescension, on our part, to let her have it. I know she was dreadfully hurt by the way you acted last night, and I shouldn't be surprised if she wouldn't have it, after all. She's proud as anything, and she don't need to go begging for schools!"

I don't know how long I should have gone on with my castigatory remarks, but at this moment Miss Burton herself entered the room, ready dressed for a walk to the village. She started when she saw papa, and a beautiful color swept over her face, and was gone again in a moment. Papa colored, too. I did not wonder at his feeling confused, after my showing him how strangely, to say the least, his conduct must appear to her, but she had usually such perfect control over her feelings, that I felt sure she must be more seriously displeased than even I had supposed, to cause her to color so quickly at sight of him. She came merely to get her handkerchief, which was lying upon a chair, and with a casual remark to me, she withdrew, and we soon saw her walking down the path to the front gate.

"I was about to resume the 'thread of my discourse,' when papa said, musingly, as he watched her retreating figure: 'Edith Dombey!' and then turning to me, said: 'You compared her to Edith Dombey, Emmy, when you first saw her. Do you think she is like Edith Dombey, now? I fancy she has much the same appearance.'"

"I don't think she is at all like Edith Dombey," I answered, with a good deal of asperity, considering my years, and whom I was addressing, "but even if she is, I don't see that that need to unfit her for a school-teacher. Edith Dombey might have made the very best of teachers, for aught we know. Because she was cold, and proud, and married for money and position, does not prove that she would not have been. I can't understand, papa, why it is that you are determined to find fault with her, all at once! I thought you liked her, until now."

Papa's looks were a puzzle to me all the while I was talking to him. Sometimes he would look amused and about to burst into a laugh; then he would seem thoughtful; then, again, he would color and look confused.

Nel came in at this point, and said the team was ready and waiting; so papa only said: "Well, little madam, you have given me quite a lengthy scolding. I must apologize to Miss Burton this evening for my seeming rudeness last night, and I hope we can make friends again—if she is offended, as you think."

That evening—it was the most extraordinary thing!—she never did it either before or after, on the evenings when Miss Burton was there—grandma kept Nel and I in the kitchen paring apples until eight o'clock. We were both quite restive under the confinement; I the more so, because I felt sure that my presence was needed in the sitting-room. I had no doubt, but what papa and Miss Burton were having a very dull, uncomfortable time of it; and when the last apple was pared, I was not long in hanging up my apron, and washing my hands, and making my way out of the kitchen. I paused in the passage, just outside the sitting-room door, not for the purpose of eavesdropping, but merely to see whether they were reading and talking, and passing the time pleasantly, or sitting silent and uncomfortable, as I had feared.

Just then there was a little stir within the room, and I heard Miss Burton say: "But I can't give up the school, just yet! I must teach one more term at least." She said more, but her voice sank so low that I could not distinguish the words; neither could I of papa's reply. It touched me deeply to hear her—proud as I knew her to be in most things—petitioning for the school in that agitated manner; but it was only another evidence, added to the many she had given us that winter, of the deep interest she felt in the improvement of the school. What could possess papa, I wondered, that he, of all others, should oppose her.

I opened the door. Papa was standing before the fire, which (a bright wood-fire,) gave the only light there was in the room, and Miss Burton was just disappearing by another door.

"What is the matter, papa?" I asked, going straight to him. "Why has Miss Burton gone away? You've been cross and disagreeable about the school again, I know; and she has so set her heart upon it; and so have we all but you; and it's the most incomprehensible thing in the world why you have taken such a sudden dislike to her!"

He burst out laughing, which I thought very singular, for I could not conceive what there could be to laugh at—caught me by the shoulders, giving me a little shake, and said: "Now, little mistress, I'm not going to take another scolding from you upon this unfortunate subject. I've given your 'friend and heroine' ample satisfaction for my conduct last night, and we are the best of friends again; and she can have the school; and I can assure you, that I don't dislike her, but quite the contrary; and, in fact, you have nothing to scold about, so, run and bring the lights, and find Nel, and when Miss Burton comes back, let us have some music that shall make up for our miserable failure last night."

It was some little time before Miss Burton came back.

"Waiting for me?" she said, and went directly to the organ, and began to play, so that I had no opportunity to observe the expression of her face, but several times during the remainder of the evening, I noticed plainly something unnatural in her manner toward papa—a constraint, or shyness, or something—difficult to describe; so that I didn't feel quite sure that they were the "best of friends," as he had said, after all. "She is so very sensitive," I said to myself, "and he don't understand her as well as I do. She was, really, very much hurt, and she don't forget it as easily as he supposes."

If the winter had seemed short and pleasant, the following summer was equally so. Miss Burton was not at our house as much as during the winter, though through no fault of mine. I did my best to have the winter arrangement for the disposal of the Saturdays and Sundays hold good through the summer, but could get no support to my proposition from any one—even grandma declined to advocate my cause. Miss Burton seemed to enjoy being there when she could be persuaded to come, as was sometimes the case, and she and papa seemed perfectly friendly; but still I could not divest myself of the belief that she had not quite forgiven him for his strange behavior about her having the school; for there was almost always in her manners that same constraint and shyness, which I had first observed directly after that little misunderstanding occurred.

On one occasion, near the latter part of the summer, she was spending the Sunday at our house, and we were at tea, when Nel spoke up abruptly: "Say, Miss Burton, they all wonder if you are going to have the school next winter. Are you?"

She glanced up at papa and blushed crimson, but made no reply, and I knew she was thinking of the time when she asked for the school last. Papa, too, remembered it, I knew, for he choked over his tea, and coughed, and finally laughed to turn it off, while grandma ingeniously turned the conversation into a new channel.

A few days after that, at school, Lettie May, the daughter of one of the other trustees said to me: "Ain't it too bad, Em? father spoke to Miss Burton about teaching the school next winter, and she said she was not going to teach at all."

"I wonder why!" I replied. "She has often said to me that teaching is to be her profession through life."

"Maybe she is going to be married," suggested Lettie.

"Impossible!" I exclaimed. "I know every one of her gentleman correspondents—I mean she has told me all about them—and they are all uncles, and cousins, and friends old enough to be her father."

"Are you really not going to teach next winter?" I asked her that night, after school.

"I really do not intend to," she answered, bending low over the papers in her desk, so that I could not see her face.

"Oh, dear!" I said. "It will be dreadful without you! I really don't know how I shall get through the winter."

I expected some sort of a sympathetic reply, and was rather shocked, and a little hurt, when she raised her head and looked at me with an intensely amused expression, her color a good deal heightened, and on the whole exhibiting no traces of grief at our approaching separation.

Before she had time to reply in words, an interruption occurred, and I left her, pondering on the meaning of her singular conduct.

The summer term closed in due time, and Miss Burton spent a few days at our house before leaving for home. I was glad to see that papa treated her with even greater kindness and respect than usual, and that her shyness and constraint in his company seemed much less than formerly. Although I was pleased at this, as I say, still I always liked to feel that my presence was, for the most part, necessary to their complete comfort and tranquillity. Consequently, I was a good deal annoyed and grieved when, on the day that Miss Burton was to leave us, papa announced the fact that one of the horses was not in a condition to travel, and that therefore he should be obliged to take Miss Burton to the station in the light carriage, with but one horse, which would deprive me of the pleasure of accompanying them, as himself, Miss Burton and her luggage would be quite as much as the carriage would accommodate. It was very provoking, but there was no help for it, so I bade her "good-bye" at home, and watched them ride away together without me.

Christmas was at hand! Only a fortnight, and it would be at the door. Papa, grandma, Nel and I, were sitting in the dancing firelight in our cosy sitting-room before the lamp was lighted for the evening. I had just received a letter from Miss Burton, and was holding it in my hand after having read it aloud.

"How I wish she would come herself!" I exclaimed. "If she could only be here at Christmas, I should be perfectly content."

Nel echoed my wish in some boyish way, and then went on and enumerated several characteristic qualities of hers which raised her in his estimation much above the average of womankind.

Papa looked seriously from one to the other of us without speaking. Presently he arose, and taking a turn or two across the room behind us, came and stood with his back to the fire, seemed about to speak, hesitated, and then resumed his walk. At last he said, still walking back and forth behind us: "Well, Emmy, suppose I go and bring her?"

"Quite a sensible supposition," I answered, "supposing you were in earnest, and supposing she would come with you."

"I am quite in earnest about going, and am equally sure about her coming," he replied, still continuing his walk.

A glimmering of the truth darted into my mind. I was upon my feet and facing him in an instant.

"What do you mean, papa?" I cried, springing to his side, seizing him by the arm, and bringing him where the firelight shone upon his face. Instantly I comprehended all that had been going on before my very eyes for the last year.

"O papa, you take away my breath!" I gasped, dropping his arm, and covering my face with my hands. Then I turned and threw myself upon the lounge, and burying my face in the pillows, gave way to a storm of sobs that nearly suffocated me. Papa came and stood over me.

"Emmy," said he, and there was a world of tenderness in his voice, "you distress me beyond expression. I thought you would like it. I thought I was consulting the wishes and happiness of my mother and my children as well as my own. Are you so very sorry, my child?"

"I don't know as I am sorry," I replied, as soon as my sobs would let me speak. "No, I am not sorry! But I didn't think of such a thing! And—it's so sudden; and—I've been so deceived! You've all deceived me so!" I repeated, with sudden energy, sitting up and pushing the pillows from me angrily. "I never suspected such a thing! And it's been going on for a year! Why has it all been kept from me? Even grandma has helped to deceive me! She has known it all the time!"

"Hush, Emmy!" said papa, gently. "No one has tried to deceive you. You have had the same opportunities to know what was passing that grandma has; and really," he went on, smiling, "for such a wonderfully keen-sighted little girl as you usually are, I think you have been unaccountably blind."

"But I didn't dream that such a thing could be possible," I explained, my crying fit having subsided, and my anger along with it. "Why should I dream of such a thing? Why, papa, you are forty years old, and have gray hairs a plenty, and she is only twenty-one—you are old enough to be her father!"

Grandma looked reproachfully at me—papa was always her boy, notwithstanding his gray hairs—but papa laughed and said: "Still I know of a certain little miss, not a hundred miles from me at this minute, who has often told me that I am handsomer than any of the young men."

"To think," I exclaimed, without noticing what he had said, "that I should be so blind! Why, I all the time thought it was me she liked the best of any here; and now I can recall ever so many things that might have undeceived me." I started to leave the room, but papa stopped me.

"Wait, Emmy," said he, "you haven't said that you are glad. Can't you say it? And you, too, Nel?"

"I'm glad," I replied quickly, and flew from the room, for I wanted to be alone and think it over. I paused outside the door, however, to hear Nel's verdict.

"I'm glad, too," said he, "but I've been thinking it was a first rate thing for me that I've been to school to her so long."

The next day papa left home, to return at Christmas, accompanied by Edith Burton as his wife.

That was many years ago, but never yet, I am confident, have any of the parties most concerned had cause to regret the circumstances which brought her among us.

DEBORAH NORMAN:*

HER WORK AND HER REWARD.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER VII.

"CAN I have a few words with thee?" Deborah asked, a smile just touching her lips.

"Oh, yes, certainly," returned the deacon, but not with any graciousness of manner; for he knew his visitor. A chair was handed by Maxwell, and Deborah sat down. She did not speak for some moments, waiting, with her quiet eyes on the face of Deacon Strong, until she saw signs of a break in the repellent hardness of his feelings. Then she said, with a gentle persuasion in her tones that was almost irresistible: "If the love of Christ constrain us, shall we not seek to know His will? and, knowing it, do it gladly?"

The deacon was not prepared for a remark like this. He had set himself on guard, but not at the gate where she was trying to enter.

"Thee will let me talk to thee a little, will thee not?" The sweetness of her manner and the tender earnestness of her tones were irresistible. The ice melted from Deacon Strong's frozen aspect like wax before a sudden flame. Deborah saw this, and added: "for I have something to say that deeply concerns thyself as well as others."

"Say on," replied the deacon, trying to speak freely; but a nervous apprehension betrayed itself in his voice.

"Thee owns a good many houses, I am told, in the neighborhood of Coulter's Row," said Deborah.

"Yes," replied the deacon, an uneasy movement and a contraction of his brows accompanying the answer.

"Does thee know in what condition some of them are, and for what purposes some of them are used? Thee is a Christian man; and I cannot think thee knows."

"I trust all this business to my agent," was answered. "It is impossible, in the multiplicity of my affairs, to give any time to the renting and overseeing of those houses. The fact is, I haven't been in the neighborhood where they are located for months and months. The people are a thriftless, vicious set, for whom little or nothing can be done."

"It may seem so, friend Strong, when we stand afar off; but if we go near we shall find something on which to take hold and lift them a little way out of their sin and misery."

"To fall back again, and sink deeper, when our hold is loosed," replied the deacon.

"That has not always been my experience," said Deborah. "Oh, sir, if thee could see outstretched hands and hope-lit faces as I have seen them, thee would not be in despair of these poor prodigals who have wasted their inheritance. If they had strength to rise, and some one to lead them back, many would return to their Father's house. But, alas for them, instead of help, they find cruel exaction or evil enticement on every hand. Is this right, friend Strong? As followers of the loving Saviour, who came down to the lowliest and most degraded, are we doing our duty by the poor who are always with us?"

Deacon Strong had never in his life found himself at so great a disadvantage as now. He could not match his strength with that of this gentle woman, under the power of whose searching eyes he was bound as by a spell. She seemed to touch him, spiritually, as a wire charged with electricity touches the body. He felt a thrill of higher impulses pervading his soul; and conscience, long asleep, stirred in its heavy slumber.

"God sees and knows of all this," Deborah went on, her voice falling to an almost warning tone.

A shade of fear struck coldly across the deacon's heart.

"We cannot be indifferent to the needs and perils of His poor, lost and wandering children, for whom He suffered and died on the cross, and hope to receive His approving smiles and forgiving love when we meet Him in the judgment," she continued. "If I were to pass these sad and sorrowing ones—stained with evil though many of them are—pass to the other side as did the Priest and the Levite, I could not lift my eyes to the Saviour's face. I would stand before Him self-condemned, and wait in trembling fear for the dreadful words, 'Inasmuch as ye did it not unto the least of these, ye did it not unto me.'"

The deacon sat dumb before this woman. She seemed like an angel from Heaven sent to accuse him. Her words burned themselves into his soul.

* Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1875, by T. S. ARTHUR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

The old formulas of doctrine on which he had rested in conscious safety dropped out of his thoughts, and in their places came one divine precept after another, passing through his mind in quick succession, as if spoken by some invisible monitor. His bulwark of safety had been the substitution of Christ's merit and righteousness, whereby he was made inwardly holy; and this substitution had come through faith alone. He had accepted the conditions of salvation, and was, therefore, a child of God, elect and precious.

But now the Lord's own words, burdened with a different meaning, crowded in upon him. "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments." "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first and great Commandment. And the second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "A new Commandment I give unto you: that ye love one another, even as I have loved you. By this will all men know that ye are my disciples." "Love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again: and your reward shall be great and ye shall be the children of the Highest; for He is kind unto the unthankful and the evil. Be ye, therefore, merciful as your Father also is merciful."

He had read or listened to the reading of these pure Gospel precepts hundreds and hundreds of times; but never before had they risen in judgment upon his life. Now their sweetness was all gone; they had a tone of accusation; he felt condemned in their presence. The Saviour, in whose righteousness he had, in imagination, clothed himself by faith, and so gained favor with God, stood before him with a frown of condemnation. He shivered in sudden terror. The soul he had thought safe, was in danger of eternal loss. His way to Heaven had become suddenly barred by a high if not an impassable mountain; the mountain of his own self-love. Until that were broken down, or cut through, he stood in peril of hell!

The face of Deacon Strong lost its repulsive hardness; his coarse mouth softened, the lips moving nervously; his eyes betrayed an inward fear and pain; and he looked at Deborah with a kind of despairing appeal on his changed countenance.

"Let us pray," fell in a low, serious voice from the young Quakeress, and as she spoke she knelt. For a few moments Deacon Strong sat irresolute; but the pressure on his feelings was too great to be resisted, and he sank also upon his knees. Maxwell only bowed his head. For some moments a deep silence pervaded the room. Then the voice of Deborah, tremulous with feeling, broke upon the still air.

"If Thy Spirit be not in us, Lord, then we are not Thine," she said. "But how shall we know that we have Thy Spirit, Lord? Herein Thou hast not left us ignorant. 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' Open our blind eyes that we may see our true condition and the dangers that lie about us. If we are, indeed, unprofitable servants; if we are not feeding the hungry, nor clothing the naked, nor caring for the sick, what hope of favor have we in the day when Thou shalt come in Thy glory, with all Thy holy angels, and sit upon the throne of Thy glory, setting the sheep on His right hand and the goats on the left?"

"We tremble before Thee, as we look forward to that day, when Thou shalt say to those upon Thy left hand, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels: for I was a-hungred, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick and in prison, and ye visited me not.'

"Touch our hearts; soften them by Thy love; make us Thy willing servants. And, oh, come especially nigh to our brother upon whom Thou hast laid so many responsibilities; to whom Thou hast given much and wilt require much. His soul is very precious in Thy sight; and that he may not lose it, Thy Spirit has led me here to warn him of danger. Oh, let no anger against me come into his heart; but let him feel toward me as toward a servant of God trying to do him good. Move him to join in the work of lifting up the weak and fallen. And now may Thy blessing and Thy peace rest upon and remain with us."

The change in Deacon Strong's face as he arose from his knees and looked at Deborah, was singular and striking. All its hard self-confidence had given way to an expression of weakness and alarm. In the presence of divine truths, that judged and condemned, setting him over in their sharp discrimination to the left hand side, strong convictions had taken hold of him. The words of our Lord were too plain to be misunderstood; and their attendant warnings too clearly spoken to be disregarded. If he were to be so judged, how could he stand? All his faith, all his profession, all his devotion to the church must go for nothing, and the law of human brotherhood approve or condemn. His mind did not rise above the literalism of the text, the hard stones of which struck against and battered down the walls of his old self-security.

"Friend," said Deborah, standing before the deacon and reaching out a hand toward him, "the way to Heaven is through love to the neighbor; and there is no other way. We must be like-minded with Christ, and walk through the world as He walked, doing good to the poor and needy, and ministering to the sick and those that are in prison. I have come to thee, drawn by His Spirit, and not by my own boldness and self-sufficiency, strong in the faith that thee would see the duty that lies at thy feet, and take it up in the willing service of our common Lord and Master."

Not with a quick movement, born of a sudden impulse, did Deacon Strong grasp the hand of Deborah, but with a quiet pressure in which was felt the beginning of a new purpose. A veil had fallen from his eyes, and he saw things never seen before, and old things in new relations to each other.

"We must forsake all and follow Him if we would be His disciples," said Deborah. "That is, all of our self-love; and we can only begin to forsake this when we compel ourselves to do good to the neighbor. But His service is love, friend Strong; and He soon changes our self-denial into love, the sweetness of which no human language can express. It is here that we find true peace—here that our reward comes. In no other service is there any true reward. But forgive me if I have troubled or wearied thee. It was for the love of Christ, that yearns to save His poorest and most degraded children, that I came, hoping to find in thee a helper in His work. Thou hast many and great privileges; thou hast money and influence; God has blessed thee abundantly in the goods of this world; thou art strong to do whatever thy hands take hold upon; as thou leadest many will follow. Great are thy responsibilities as a steward of God. The voices of the hungry, and sick, and naked, and sorely wronged, and oppressed, are going up from Kedron, and the Spirit is calling upon thee to hear and to help. May thy heart leap gladly to the call! So shall the reward given unto thee be very great."

Dropping the hand of Deacon Strong as she closed the last sentence, Deborah turned away and went out with almost noiseless steps.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE deacon did not move nor speak for several moments. Peter Maxwell, with half-closed eyelids and head bent forward in its usual manner, was watching him with keen but covert scrutiny. Turning to his agent, Deacon Strong caught the expression of the man's eyes before he was able to change or conceal it.

"You can leave!" said the deacon, jerking out one of his hands impatiently.

"Shall I come this afternoon?" asked Maxwell, with more than his ordinary obsequiousness.

"No," was replied.

"To-morrow morning?"

"Yes." And the deacon's hand was thrown out again toward the door.

Maxwell bent his head almost abjectly, and left the presence of his master; but a sinister smile broke over his mean face on closing the door behind him.

As he retired, the deacon sat down, and leaning forward over his writing-table, rested his temples against the palms of his hands. He remained in deep thought for a long time. At first he tried to shake off the depression of feeling which the visit of Deborah had occasioned; but found this impossible. The veil she had rent from his eyes could not be restored in a moment of time, and the light of higher truths than he had seen before still kept streaming in upon him with their clear convictions and stern judgments. The longer he sat and thought, the more deeply did he become disturbed by doubt and fear. A dread of God's anger seized him. An image of the great judgment, in the strictly phenomenal and judicial aspects with which he had been used to regard it, was set sharply pictured in his mind. He saw the Judge's angry face, and heard His stern voice saying: "I was a-hungered, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick and in prison, and ye visited me not.  Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not unto me.  And these shall go away into everlasting punishment."

The deacon shivered. A chill went down to his heart. He tried to shut the dreadful picture away from his inner vision. In its place, one scene dissolving away and the other coming out like the changing views from a camera, Coulter's Row, with all its wretched neighborhood, was before him. Impressions received in one of his rare visits to that region, and which he had covered up and tried to forget, stood out to his vision now with a life-like distinctness. He saw a miserable wooden hovel, where he would not have stabled his cow, and there stood at the door a wasted and scantily-clad woman, with hunger in her eyes and a sick baby at her breast; and through the entrance he could see a rotting floor, and broken walls, and dirt and squallor. He was the owner of this hovel. It had cost him, at a sheriff's sale, one hundred and fifty dollars; and the rent he exacted from the poor, half-starved tenants who crowded every foot of its available space, was eight dollars a month, or ninety-six dollars a year—nearly two-thirds the whole cost of the wretched tenement! And near it was a corner bar-room, from which he received an income of three hundred dollars a year. Before he let it for this use, it paid him only a hundred and fifty; but a man just from the State's Prison, with a license to make paupers and criminals in his possession, came along and offered three hundred for the stand. "It is worth what it will bring, of course," said the deacon to his agent; and so the house was let for a tavern, and Deacon Strong became a partner in the work of sending men, women and children to the Almshouse and to paupers' graves.

Starting to his feet, and uttering an exclamation of distress, he tried to thrust these accusing images out of his mind. But it was all in vain. He was in the power of influences which he could not for the time control. There were present with him angels and evil spirits, the one trying to save and the other to destroy his soul; and for the time being, with the help of convictions awakened by the visit of Deborah Norman, angelic forces were strongest; so that he could not shut away from sight the pages of memory that were being turned back for his inspection. Another and another wretched hovel or den of debauchery and crime from which he took a liberal share in the gain of iniquity, passed before him, until he became sick of soul and smitten by shame and fear.

If this went on, how was he to stand in the judgment? He tried to put the question aside; to defer the answer; to cover up the pages of memory on which his condemnation was written; but in vain. The angels who were trying to lift him into a better life, that he might be a co-worker with them in doing good, so saving himself in the effort to save others, held the power over him which they had gained, and fought his evil counsellors with the terrors of an awakened conscience. The battle went on until the heart of Deacon

Strong became weak and his spirit subdued. He was humbled in the presence of God, and had such an inner vision of himself and his utter worldliness and cruel indifference toward his fellow-men as to cause deep self-abasement.

When Deacon Strong made his appearance at the factory, an hour later than usual, he found a woman in the office waiting to see him. She was the mother of two girls, one twelve and the other fourteen years of age, who worked in the mill; a pale-faced, hollow-eyed, half-starved looking woman, with a suffering, pitiful expression in her countenance. Deacon Strong was used to seeing such faces, and the sight of them generally annoyed and angered him; for their presence was the sign of a coming remonstrance or appeal; of some interference with the Mede-and-Persian law of his establishment, or of some petition for help.

It was plain from the woman's manner, as the deacon came into the small office where she sat awaiting him, that she had little hope in her heart; but something desperate in her case nerved her to the effort for which she had come.

Strange to tell, there stirred in the deacon's heart, as his eyes rested on the woman, a feeling of softness and pity.

"Mrs. Jenks," he said, with a kindness of manner so unexpected, that it sent tears into her eyes. She tried to rise from her chair, but a sudden weakness fell upon her and her efforts were fruitless.

"Don't get up," said the deacon, still speaking kindly. Then, as he saw how pale she was, he asked, with an interest in his voice so genuine that the woman thought for a moment that she must be dreaming, if there was anything he could do for her.

"Jenny's had to stay home from the mill again, sir. She was so weak and sick this morning that she 'most fainted."

She saw a change in the deacon's face. The kind look began to fade out and the old un pitying hardness to return.

"Miss Norman was to see me this morning, and when she found how sick Jenny was, she said I mustn't think of sending her to the mill. I told her that Jenny had lost a day 'most every week, and sometimes two days, and that you said last time she was away that if it happened again she couldn't come back at all. But Miss Norman said she knew you'd consider Jenny and not be hard with her. And so I've come to ask if you won't keep her place, and not dock her too hard. She'll be right again to-morrow. Poor thing! She isn't very strong and hasn't much appetite. Hardly eats enough to save a pigeon alive."

The softer look, which had gone so suddenly out of the deacon's face, came back again.

"Very well," he answered, kindly. "Tell Jenny I'll make it all right."

He paused, a thoughtful expression in his eyes. Might he not do something more for the girl. The angels were still near him.

"Jenny isn't very strong," he said.

"Oh, no, sir!" The mother spoke with a quick eagerness. "She's so given out, sometimes, when she comes home from the mill, that she has to lie down all the evening."

"If it is so bad as that, Mrs. Jenks," said the deacon, showing still more interest in the case, "I'm afraid you're doing wrong to let her work in the mill at all. It's too hard for her. All girls can't stand it, you know. Some of them keep breaking down all the while."

"But what can we do, Mr. Strong," answered the woman, growing bolder, as the deacon softened. "It's just hand to mouth for us all as it is now, and the hand isn't always full. Lucy's, not much stronger than her sister, and doesn't keep up in her time at the mill much better; and when they're docked two hours for every one lost, it cuts down dreadfully. I'm not complaining, Mr. Strong," added Mrs. Jenks, seeing the hardness again in the deacon's face; "but we who live so close to hunger and cold all our lives feel every pinch."

The docking system, to which Mrs. Jenks had referred, was very rigid. Deacon Strong found no difficulty in settling the question of justice involved in his rule of withholding the pay of two hours for every one lost, and of a day and a half for every single day lost. He assumed that the cost of running the mill was just the same, whether the hands worked full time or not, and that the loss to him of an hour in the product of an operative was much more than the profit on that product. So, to make it all safe and right for himself, he established his rule, which he found to work admirably. He had never given himself any concern about the effect of this rule on the poor working people, out of whose weekly earnings he rarely took less than an aggregate of from fifty to sixty dollars beyond the actual wages forfeited through loss of time; so making gain of their idleness, necessities or sickness, as the case might be. Business was business, and must be conducted by rule and system. The men and women and children who worked for him were not thought of as human beings, subject to the common weaknesses and needs of humanity, but as machines hired to do a certain amount of work. If some could not or would not abide by the law of the establishment, they must suffer for the infringement or be thrown out altogether, though they died in the street of sickness or starvation. What had he to do with that?

But, strange to say, the closing words of Mrs. Jenks struck a chord of pity in his heart. He saw in her wan face something not visible to his eyes a moment before. It was the record of long years of suffering and sorrow; and the weakness of coming despair. And out of the scanty means of this poor, exhausted woman and her two half-starved and over-worked young daughters he had taken, week after week, from one to two dollars in excess of actual loss in wages, adding so much to his gains at the cost of "hunger and cold" to them!

The power of better influences was upon him. Angels were touching the eyes of his soul and giving it a clearer vision.

"Go home, now, Mrs. Jenks," said the deacon, with an unsteadiness of voice that he could not hide. "It shall all be made right. Tell Jenny to rest to-day and take care of herself. She's a good, steady girl, and does her best, I'm sure. I didn't know she was so weak. If she feels strong enough for work to-morrow morning, tell her to come over, and I'll see if I can't make an easier place for her."

"God bless you, Deacon Strong!" leaped from the poor widow's tongue, with a suddenness and fervor that struck a thrill to the man's heart, and then rested and quieted it like a benediction from Heaven.

"One moment," he said, as Mrs. Jenks turned to leave the office. As he spoke, he took from a rack his wages-book. "Let me see," talking, as it were, to himself as he opened to one of the pages; "six hours last week; a whole day and three hours week before last; and ten hours the week before that." Then he closed the book and sat thinking. Trouble might come if he were to do what was in his heart. It would become known, and demoralize, he feared, the whole establishment.

"There's been some mistake, I think," said the deacon at length, resorting to a subterfuge. "Jenny has been docked more than her real loss of time, I'm afraid; and it has been the same with Lucy. I'm sorry about it, and shall look closer into this business in future."

He opened his desk, and taking out three dollars, handed the sum to Mrs. Jenks, saying as he did so: "Give two to Jenny and one to Lucy. But I don't wish either you or the girls to speak of this to any one. It might cause me a deal of trouble."

Tears dropped on the soiled and crumpled bills as Mrs. Jenks took them from the deacon's hand.

"Oh, thank you a thousand and a thousand times!" she exclaimed, with grateful fervor, and then hurried away.

Deacon Strong had a new sensation, the ground and meaning of which he did not really understand. It was not strong, but quiet and deep. It was a very little thing that he had done—a simple act of justice and humanity—but it had so changed his interior relations as to bring him within the sphere of better spiritual influences. It had broken, for the time being at least, the rule of his dominant selfishness, and set to a distance the evil spirits who had gained such power over him. Nay, it had done more; it had made way for the nearer approach of angels, who are quick to perceive in human souls the first inceptions of good, and prompt to breathe upon the kindling fire and fan it into flame. It was the nearer presence of these heavenly attendants that gave to the spirit of Deacon Strong the new sensation of which we have spoken, and held his mind to truer thoughts and better purposes.

For we are not in simple isolation as to our spirits. The inner world in which our souls dwell is peopled with its myriads of inhabitants. They are as much our companions, and influence our thoughts and feelings as much, as the men and women into whose society we come intimately in this outer world. There, as here, are the good and the evil; and we gather around us such spirits as are in the delight of the affections we cherish; good, if good—evil, if evil. The good help us to rise heavenward; the evil seek to draw us downward toward hell. Our safety lies in our liberty. We are as free to choose our inner as our outward associates. We may turn to the one or the other; or separate ourselves from them at will.

In this simple act of justice and humanity, Deacon Strong had, for the time, separated himself from the evil and selfish companions by whom he had been so long influenced; and, swift as thought, angels drew near. He not only felt the peace and comfort of their presence, but was touched by new impressions. Scales seemed to fall from his eyes, and he saw many things in changed aspects. Out of his memory and into thought, came, in quick succession, one scripture passage after another, as if a hand were turning the leaves of a book and showing what was written upon its pages. By some of these passages he was rebuked, and by some prompted to a better life.

The deacon was sitting at his desk, with letters and papers before him, but feeling in no mood for business, when the overseer of his mill came into the office. This man—his name was Amos Trueford—was past middle life, and had a broken, depressed look, like one who, after a long battle with the world, had been overpowered, borne down and utterly discomfited. His hair was gray, his features thin, and his eyes deeply set in their sockets. His face was inexpressibly sad; the mouth closed with a firm pressure that indicated both suffering and endurance. He had a memorandum-book in one hand and a pencil in the other.

"I've made up the wages' account, sir," said the overseer, as he stood before his employer. There was no life in his voice, and no sign of interest in the business for which he had come.

"How does it stand?" asked the deacon.

The overseer's brows lifted suddenly. A look of surprise came into his face. He did not answer until the deacon repeated his question.

"The Jenks girls, and Fanny Williams, and Peter Ober, are short on time again; and so are—"

"How much is Peter Ober short?" asked the deacon.

"Two days," replied Trueford; "and that won't leave him more than three days' wages; and his wife's sick, and they've had to have a woman to nurse the baby. At least so he says."

Instead of a growl, and the usual impatient wave of his hand when the overseer attempted to excuse a delinquent operative, Deacon Strong inquired, in a voice that sounded strangely to Mr. Trueford, if Peter Ober's word was to be depended on.

"Yes; I'm very sure of it," replied the overseer.

"Don't believe that he's a shirk, and goes off idling away his time?"

"I'm certain that he does not, sir. The poor man isn't fit to be at work half the time he's here. He's sick and broken down, and starved into the bargain."

"Starved! What do you mean by saying that?"

asked the deacon; turning sharply round upon Mr. Trueford.

"You've only to look into his face, sir, to see how it is," returned the overseer. "And then, sir, how is a man and his wife and three children to get much beyond starving on five dollars, which is about all he receives one week with another; and the rent's taken out of that."

The deacon raised a hand to his forehead, and held it there with a hard pressure for several moments. Both men were silent for a little while.

"He's lost two days, you say?"

"Yes, sir."

"Call it one," said the deacon.

"Make it one and a half, you mean," said Mr. Trueford.

"No, I don't mean any such thing. Make it one, and no more!" The deacon spoke with some irritation of manner.

"Oh! yes. Thank you! One it is." And the overseer opened his memorandum-book with a kind of nervous haste.

Deacon Strong looked at the man curiously as he turned the leaves of his book. Why should he say, "Thank you!" It was no favor or concession to him.

"If he could be paid off to-day instead of to-morrow," suggested Mr. Trueford, almost timidly.

"Can't break the rule," was the deacon's quick reply. His cold, stern manner came back. But, softening a little, he added: "You know as well as I do that it can't be done without making trouble. It is only by keeping these people squarely up to the rules and regulations of the establishment that we are able to do anything with them. Concede one thing, and they'll want another. Give an inch and they'll take an ell."

Mr. Trueford did not urge the matter. He understood the deacon too well for that. The light which had come into his thin face died away, and the old sadness settled back upon his lips. But Deacon Strong was not done with his poor, sick, half-starved workman. He tried to turn coldly away from him; to set him out of his thoughts; but this was impossible. "Inasmuch as ye have not done it unto the least of these, ye have not done it unto me!" He almost started as the sentence came suddenly into his mind.

"You think he needs it badly?" said the deacon, looking up at his overseer.

"As much as a hungry man needs bread, I imagine," replied Mr. Trueford. "He got four dollars and a half last week, and I hardly think there's been much left for the last day or two."

"Can you pay him off to-day without letting the others know of it," asked the deacon.

"Oh, I'll see to all that," replied Mr. Trueford, with a change in his voice.

"You may go past the rule just for this once; but there must be no more of it."

The deacon tried to be very hard and positive; but Mr. Trueford did not fail to notice a weakness in his manner. What did it all mean? He was puzzled.

"About Fanny Williams?" asked the deacon, referring to what his overseer had said a little while before. "How much time has she lost?"

"Just half the week."

"What! Again?"

"Yes, sir. The poor thing can't stand it much longer."

"How much was taken off for lost time last week?"

"She worked three days, and was paid for only two. It's the rule, you know."

The deacon bent his head quickly. He felt something like an electric shock as the words flashed upon him: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me!"

"She's really sick, Mr. Trueford?" The deacon looked up again.

"Any one can see that in her face," replied the overseer.

"What's the matter with her?"

"What's the matter with them all, Deacon Strong!" exclaimed the overseer, breaking away from his usual silence and reserve touching the rule of the establishment toward its poor operatives. "Overworked and underfed! That's the matter, sir! It's a bad business all around!"

Mr. Trueford had become suddenly excited, his excitement betraying him into unwonted freedom of speech. For a little while he stood before the deacon in a half-defiant attitude; but this changed slowly, and his old impassiveness returned. He looked for an angry response from his employer, but it did not come.

"Overworked and underfed!" These two words struck down into the deacon's soul with the clear impression of a die. He was not angry, but shocked. The voice that still rang in his ears did not sound like the voice of Amos Trueford; but seemed to come from afar off, and with the rebuke of God in its tones.

"Overworked and underfed!" Had he really anything to do with that? No one was obliged to work in his mill. If his hands could earn more money elsewhere, they were free to go. He did not compel them to stay. And as to being underfed, he did not supply their food. To bring this against him seemed going out of the circle of responsibility. Food was cheap enough; and if the wages were spent as they should be, no one ought to be underfed.

But he could not feel right with himself.

"I don't see what I'm to do with these people." The deacon spoke in a worried, fretful voice. "I don't keep a poor-house. That isn't my business. The town must do that."

To this the overseer made no answer.

"What's to be done about Fanny Williams?" asked Deacon Strong, the worried feeling still in his voice.

"Simple justice, if nothing more," replied Mr. Trueford, with a steadiness of tone, considering his remark, that caused the deacon to glance up at him quickly, and to regard him for a few moments with contracting brows.

"What do you mean by simple justice?" asked the deacon, repressing as he spoke his rising anger.

"She has worked for you three days. Pay her three days' wages," replied the overseer, not letting his eyes drop away from those of the deacon, which were fixed in a stern, half-threatening gaze upon him. "If you had done as much last week, she might not have failed in her time from hunger and exhaustion this week."

"Amos Trueford! do you know what you are talking about?" exclaimed Deacon Strong, the fire of a suddenly-aroused indignation flashing out of his eyes.

"Yes, sir," replied the overseer. "I'm pleading the cause of the poor—God help them!"

There broke into his usually passionless voice a wild pathos. His lips quivered with feeling; his eyes lit up and burned; his whole countenance wore a new expression. The manhood which had so long been under the feet of Deacon Strong, stood erect again. And as it so stood up, the deacon's anger began giving way to a feeling of respect.

"That is all I have to say about it, Deacon Strong," continued Mr. Trueford, in a quieter voice, but speaking steadily. "You ask what is to be done about Fanny Williams, and I answer, simple justice. She has worked for you three days; pay her three days' wages. Keep back any part of the sum she has earned, and you put her soul as well as her body in peril!"

The overseer's manner became stern and accusing, as he uttered the last sentence. At the same instant, a voice, speaking to the deacon's inner sense of hearing, said: "And what does the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

Hardness and anger went out of the man. A sense of wrong oppressed him. He seemed to be in the midst of a company of accusing spirits.

"Fanny Williams stands to-day," said the overseer, still holding on to his recovered manhood and speaking without hesitation or any fear of consequences to himself, "on the very edge of a gulf into which, if she falls, she is lost forever. Your hand is upon her; and it is for you to push her over the fearful brink, or draw her back to a place of safety!"

Beads of sweat came out and stood all over the deacon's forehead. A faintness fell upon his heart.

"You talk in riddles, Mr. Trueford. I can't understand you."

"Let me speak more plainly, sir," returned the overseer. "Fanny Williams is alone in Kedron. She has no mother; and, I believe, no near relatives—at least, none who feel any interest in her. She is pretty, and has attractive manners. Her constitution is frail, and her long hours of work and confinement at the mill have drawn heavily upon her strength. She had been here for only a few months, when I saw that she was beginning to fail. Every now and then a day would be dropped out of a week. Sick headache was the cause. I remember her look of blank surprise and discouragement, when, for the loss of a single day, I docked her the wages of a day and a half; and her tone of voice when she asked, with a quiver on her lips: 'Is that right, Mr. Trueford?'"

"'It is our rule,' I replied.

"And she answered: 'It is not an honest rule,' and then took her money and went home. I did not expect to see her back on Monday, but she came with the rest. Before this, I often heard her singing at her work; but she rarely sang afterward, and then only in broken snatches of song. This act of injustice, as it seemed to her, left a feeling of bitterness in her mind and robbed her of cheerfulness and hope in the future. She lost another day the following week, and from the same cause.

"'Haden't you better dock me two days for one?' she said, with considerable bitterness, when I paid her off on Saturday.

"'Don't fret about it, child,' I answered her. 'It is the rule of the establishment, and all fare alike.' She understood that I felt kindly toward her, and gave me a grateful look. She never spoke of it again; but I could see that the 'rule' bore heavily upon her, especially when two sick-headache days happened to come in the same week, and she got the pay of less than three days for four days' work.

"Well, sir, it didn't grow any better for the poor thing. She had to pinch here and there in order to make both ends meet, and the pinching came too often on her food. She gave up her boarding-house and took a poorly-furnished room, for which she paid five dollars a month. This only made things worse. There were no more regular meals. Her eating was governed by caprice of appetite, or the amount of money she was able to earn. Her natural tastes, as well as her desire to make a good appearance, led her to spend a large part of her small earnings in dress—little, in consequence, remaining for food. Her income left no margin for the dressmaker, and so she wasted her strength still farther, sitting late over her needle, that her garments might be whole and slightly.

"Things went on from bad to worse with poor Fanny; and there was no help for it. The sick headaches came with increasing frequency, and the income grew less and less each week. There have been a good many weeks, sir, in which she's been paid for only two days, though she worked three; and it's come, now, to starving or something worse, I'm afraid. And if she's lost, Deacon Strong, I don't see how God can help requiring her soul at your hands!"

It was a bold speech, this, for the overseer, whose scanty bread and that of his wife and children was in the deacon's hands. It might cost him his place; and if he lost that he did not see where in the wide world he was to go. Not that he lacked ability and faithfulness, but having been badly worsted in the battle of life, he had lost faith in Providence and hope for the future. He was a gloomy, depressed man, hampered and limited by his own lack of confidence in himself and in the wisdom and goodness of God. Such representatives of Christianity as Deacon Strong—and he had met and suffered from too many of them—made him half a skeptic as to religion. It was not often that he permitted himself to be anything more than a machine in his office of overseer; executing the will of his exacting master with the simple faithfulness of his nature, and barring away from his heart the sympathies that could only distress him without helping the overworked and underpaid operatives in the mill.

But something in Fanny Williams had interested him from the first; and his heart had gone out toward her as the heart of a father toward a child. He would, when he saw how, in her struggle for existence, the tide was turning against her, have drawn her into the sheltering haven of his own home had this been possible. It was not, however. That home was already too crowded for its narrow walls, and there was no room for a stranger. And there were, besides, other reasons why she could not come in. He saw that she was pretty; that her nature was social and her tastes refined; that she was simple-hearted and confiding, and had a natural love of beauty that manifested itself in personal adornment.

The heart of Amos Trueford began to feel anxious for her as he saw her cheeks begin to fade and her eyes grow dull from exhaustion. Would the pretty and attractive girl keep straight to the path of honorable industry, though the stones cut her tender feet at almost every step, and her limbs ached with weariness; or would she, in her weakness, and in the seeming hopelessness of her lot, break madly away from the ways of safety? He was troubled about her, and could not shake the trouble off. This feeling increased to anxiety on meeting her, one evening, upon the street in company with a young man named Victor Howe. She was leaning on his arm, and he was bending toward her and talking low and earnestly. He did not know much about this young man; but he had seen him a few times in company with the notorious Len Spangler, and this made him feel sure that he was no fit companion for Fanny Williams. He took occasion to ask her how long she had been acquainted with Mr. Howe, and if she knew anything of his character; and was pained to see the quick rise of color in her face, and the confusion of manner the question occasioned.

"You are young and alone in Kedron, my child," said Mr. Trueford; "and I trust you will be very guarded. How did you become acquainted with Mr. Howe?"

Fanny was at first inclined to resent any interference of the overseer as unwarranted; but he was too sincerely interested in her welfare to let this influence him. His heart was beginning to yearn over her as the heart of a father over his child. He pressed his questions until he learned that the young man had met her, a few weeks before, at a house where she was spending an evening with a friend, and that since that time he had called for her often in the evening, when they would walk together for an hour upon the street. It was plain to Mr. Trueford that there was danger to Fanny in this association. He saw, from what little she said, as well as from the feeling she manifested, that the young man had succeeded in completely fascinating her. If he were evilly inclined, her danger was most imminent; and he greatly feared that he was.

Out of the overseer's deep concern for Fanny Williams had his boldness grown: a boldness as surprising to himself as to his employer. His discovery of the intimacy between her and Victor Howe, was only recent, and had occasioned him great anxiety. The spur of this anxiety had driven him to make the charge of responsibility for the soul of Fanny, if it were lost, upon Deacon Strong.

A long silence, with its burden of suspense, followed this bold accusation. The fate of Amos Trueford, as well as that of Fanny Williams, seemed hanging on the issue. The deacon raised himself at length, slowly, from the bent posture he had assumed, and to the astonishment of his overseer said, in a veiled, unsteady voice in which was no sign of anger: "Sit down Mr. Trueford."

The overseer obeyed.

"You have just spoken strange words. Do you mean all you have said?" The deacon's voice had not regained its firmness.

"All," replied Mr. Trueford, with a solemnity of utterance that sent a thrill along his own nerves as well as along those of his auditor.

"That her soul is in peril?"

"Yes, sir. In the direst peril."

"Speak more plainly," said the deacon in a tone that was half command.

"Do you know a person named Victor Howe?" asked the overseer.

"Yes, what of him?"

"Is a weak, fond, half starved, half despairing girl safe in his hands?"

"No, sir! He's a godless young man! No, sir! She is not safe. You might as well give a lamb over to the tender mercies of a wolf."

"Fanny Williams is a weak, fond, half starved, half despairing girl, with every way in life apparently closed against her. In her helplessness and extremity this young man has found her. Shall we, knowing this, not make an effort to save her soul from a ruin worse than death? O, Deacon Strong! if she fall and perish, the stain of her blood will be upon our garments, and God will require her soul at our hands! We cannot squeeze the life out of one such, as we squeeze the juice from a lemon, and throw the rind away. God sees it all; notes it all; and holds the record for our day of judgement, come when it will."

The overseer's face glowed with the heat of his new ardor. He forgot himself and his relation to his employer under the strong inspiration that was upon him, and spoke with the freedom of an accuser.

"Is she in the mill now?" Asked the deacon.

"Yes, sir."

"Send for her."

The overseer rang a bell, and to the boy who answered it gave a message for Fanny Williams. For the space of two or three minutes these men sat silent. At the end of that time the door of the little office opened and a young girl came in. Her face was soft and refined; but pale and wasted. Her large dark blue eyes rested with a kind of wistful sadness upon Mr. Trueford as she stood holding the door partly closed; and then turned to Deacon Strong, the expression of her countenance changing a little and growing harder. Even in the deacon's eyes she looked almost beautiful. Unlike most of the girls who worked in the mill, her person and dress were neat—the hair smoothly brushed; the skin white and clean; the garments well fitting and tidy. There was a grace and an attractiveness about her which had never been observed by the deacon until now.

"You were not at the mill yesterday?" The deacon spoke kindly and with so much interest in his voice that the girl, from very surprise, was unable at first to answer. A deep flush overspread her face, and her eyes grew dim with moisture.

"Sit down," said the deacon, pointing to a chair. He felt strangely moved in her presence.

Fanny came forward from the door in which she had been standing, and sunk upon the proffered seat. She felt her strength leaving her, under the shock of so unexpected a reception from a man whom she had learned to fear and hate as a cruel and exacting tyrant whose iron rule was as a heel upon her neck, slowly crushing out her life.

"Were you sick?" asked the mill owner, still speaking with a kindly interest in his voice.

"Yes, sir," was faintly answered.

"You are not strong enough for our work, I'm afraid."

Fanny made no reply.

"You lost three days last week, and three this week," said the deacon. "Were you too sick to work all of this time?"

"If not I would have been at the mill," replied the girl. Deacon Strong did not fail to notice the change in her voice as she said this; it was so very sad. Her lips trembled as she spoke. She had drawn herself up, sitting more erectly, and with her eyes fixed steadily upon him.

"You can't live on what you are paid at the mill, if you loose three days every week?" said the deacon.

"If I were paid for all my work, I could live," she answered, her voice growing steady, and gaining a slight thrill of indignation. The deacon winced at this. It came upon him too suddenly to be received without a sign of the shock it gave. A feeling of anger stirred in his heart; a sentence that he felt sure would have driven the girl instantly from his presence rose to his lips, but he shut them tightly together and held it back until he could gain control of himself. Before he had time to reply, she went on, saying with a sharp thrust in her voice: "But when sickness is made an offence, and I am punished by a fine equal to a third of my wages, the case is hopeless. You are right, sir! I cannot live on what I am paid at the mill, and the sooner I give up this struggle the better."

A sudden fire burned on her cheeks and flashed in her eyes. A fierce anger sat on her lips. The expression of her face became almost desperate.

"Keep all, this time!" she added, in a rising voice, and with stinging contempt in her tones. She sprang to her feet as she said this, her whole manner becoming strongly excited. The gentle, patient, down-trodden girl, who had been slowly dying for months, became in an instant the personification of reckless anger. Nerve and muscle thrilled with a new and intense life. Defiance was in every look and motion. For a moment or two she stood with her eyes upon the deacon, transfixed him with her fierce contempt; then turning away, she passed like a flash through the office door and out into the open air, going down the path that led her away from the mill, almost running as she went.

SPECIMENS.

BY MADGE CARROL.

"PAULIE, my girl!" exclaimed pater familias, nearly upsetting his coffee-cup in his excitement, "look up your geology. Uncle Peter writes me that Professor Vansyckel is on his way with a letter of introduction, and will spend a couple of days with us. Coming, no doubt, to pursue his studies in our beautiful rock region. What delight it would afford me to accompany him on his tour. Plague take the rheumatism that prevents! You, my dear, must be head and feet for me. Go with him, learn of him, and bring your stores of knowledge home. Just think, ma, the great Professor Vansyckel! Get the south room ready. He'll be here—let me see—why he'll be here to-night! Paulie, see that the cabinet is in order; don't let him find our specimens covered with dust. The great Professor Vansyckel! That I should live to see this day, and"—as a twinge caught him—"be crippled with rheumatism when it came! Call Silas to bathe me. If possible, I must have one round with the professor before he leaves."

"Let me see that shiny one," demanded Freddie, as Pauline's feather brush flew over and under the carefully arranged and labeled specimens. "What is it?"

"An unmitigated bore," remarked Paulie, aside, as Mrs. Spaulding stepped up to take a look.

"A bore? Pa, where does that sort come from?"

"What sort?" asked Mr. Spaulding from his invalid chair, while his daughter continued her brushing and whispering, unheeding the words going past her.

"The bores. Paulie says here's an unmanygated bore, and I want to know—"

His pursuit of knowledge was cut short by a hand over his mouth.

"You ask so many questions, it's no wonder you get wrong answers. That's not the sort they bore for; it's over there somewhere."

Paulie's cheeks were a little rosier than the occasion seemed to warrant; and a moment later, in the kitchen at her mother's elbow, she declared: "It was a bore, after all. I never saw a specimen that wasn't. This professor's an old man, isn't he?"

"I imagine so—quite old. You're Uncle Peter has known him many years."

"If you'd only go around with him, I wouldn't a bit mind his being here."

"I go around with him! I do know a rock from a brick, and that's all."

"I'd so much rather stay at home and get up nice little dishes. Old men are particularly partial to good things, maybe when he discovers that neither Cassie nor you can cook, and I can, he'll let me off."

"I hope, Pauline," said Mrs. Spaulding, uneasily, "you'll do as your father wishes—make yourself agreeable."

"That I will," heartily. "It's an unmanygated bore; but I'd turn into a pillar of salt, if possible, to please such a dear, kind father."

Paulie tied a sky-blue ribbon in her yellow hair that evening, and pinned another at her throat. It was worth while to look one's best, she thought, even in the eyes of an ancient bachelor. Beside, their country home afforded few opportunities of looking well in any eyes save those of the household. Paulie was so sure of appreciation there, she had no need to don a new ribbon, or give her wilful hair an extra brush. Being a little uncertain of her ground this time, but knowing well how to please her father, she went so far as to decide on wearing a lovely gray poplin, after having fastened a plain black alpaca.

Thus arrayed, she descended to the dining-room for the purpose of giving the table some finer touches after Cassie's daubing on of the dishes.

To her amazement, there sat a man—a dark-eyed, dark-bearded gentleman of about thirty, or thereabouts, neither so old nor so young as to put her at her ease.

He arose and announced himself as Mr. Vansyckle, bringing a letter of introduction to Mr. Spaulding, adding: "I met a little red-stockinged boy outside, who showed me in here. I asked was this right; he declared it perfectly so, stating that pa was sick and mustn't be disturbed; beside, supper would be ready in a few minutes, and I might as well be handy."

"An awkward piece of business!" exclaimed pater familias. "The great Professor Vansyckel meeting such a reception! Bring him here at once. That Fred ought to be switched."

The professor seemed to have taken it easily, however, and when supper was really ready, showed a hearty appreciation of various dishes Paulie had herself prepared. He looked at her rather more than seemed necessary, and every time their eyes met she wondered was anything the matter? Her tumbly-down hair on her shoulders? Her necktie behind her ears? Or—most terrifying thought of all—was there a spot on her face from some pot or pan she had handled? Confidence was restored in a measure as pa glanced at her from time to time with evident satisfaction, and ma surveyed her complacently from behind the silver tea-service. Still she felt uneasy, and rather avoided Mr. Spaulding's attempt to draw her out on the subject of rock strata. Although an apt pupil under her father's tuition, she felt very more at home among stratas of pastry, currants and citron.

"As bright and breezy as the morning," thought the professor, as, armed and equipped for their jaunt, Paulie Spaulding tripped beside him, her cheeks glowing with vivid color, her eyes sparkling, and her wilful hair taking advantage of a fresh wind to become more wilful still. "If I didn't know better I should fancy her in search of streams waking from their icy sleep, or seeking the trailing arbutus, spring's sweet forerunner."

Paulie's thought matched his in this wise: "He looks as though he could laugh, and say airy nothings like the rest of us. Why will he be so dreadful?"

Porphyritic, micaceous, and argillaceous rocks, strike and dip of strata, flint veins. Ah, dear, why the red, girlish mouth seemed turning to stone under the hardening process of these big words, and her eighteen-year-old head fairly throbbed at the stroke of the professor's hammer. She looked away to breeze-blown hills, where snow patches dotted a brown ground; she saw stretches of dun-colored field, and meadow drowsing in sunshine; heard a twitter running through leafless bough and bush, and longed to do some desperate thing.

"When pa got too dreadful," so ran her thoughts, "I could propose a race, a climb, or our putting salt on birds' tails—and what a frolic we'd have! But with this big, grave man—who could laugh, run and romp, too, maybe, and won't—there's nothing to do but consent to be bored to the bitter end. Well, it's for the dear old father's sake. I'll be good."

Every noontide and night a feast of fat things was spread before Mr. Spaulding in the shape of specimens with which he renewed acquaintance, or halloed with delight as presenting new subjects of study and research.

"Put them carefully away in the shed," he would say; "as soon as I am able, I will make room, arrange and classify them."

Meanwhile, Paulie would fly into the kitchen with: "Cassie, I must make something this very minute to get the rocks out of my brain."

"You rocks in your brain, child! I'd as lief believe you if you 'clared your heart was a rock," was Cassie's stereotyped reply to this, while she stood, showing all her glittering teeth, and watched the rolling up of Paulie's sleeves, the tying on of her apron.

On the morning of the third day of his sojourn, Professor Vansyckle strolled out at the side door with his after-breakfast segar. The grass was greening under a week's uninterrupted sunshine, and a little yellow wheelbarrow made tiny ruts in it as red-stockinged Freddie trundled about, aimlessly engrossed.

"Are you going away to-day?" he asked, lifting his bright eyes to the professor's superior height.

"No, sir. In obedience to your father's urgent request, I remain until next week."

"Oh, pshaw!" was the uncomplimentary rejoinder.

"And why 'Oh, pshaw?'"

"'Cause, you see, Paulie says I shall have her share of the stones after you're gone to make a mound."

"So, so!" said, or rather whistled, the professor. Then, throwing away his segar, "Suppose we make it now?"

"Honest?"

"As honest as the stones themselves."

"All right!" and the yellow wheelbarrow went into service immediately.

"Fred, you dreadful child!" exclaimed Paulie, appearing at the woodshed door in the wheelbarrow's wake, her plump arms bare to the elbow, and a bib apron muffling her trim figure. "Do you know what you're about? The profess—" Her girl-face took on every gradation of color, from softest rose to richest crimson, as just at that moment her eyes lighted on him.

"Has abandoned his profession for the present, and become a mound-builder. We're going to have fuchiatropes, helibenas and dear knows what not next summer."

Paulie laughed, and never was laugh more infectious. Professor Vansyckel joined in most heartily, so did Freddie, although not exactly certain where the fun came in. The next thing Paulie did was to push her hair out of her eyes and take to mound-building, too.

"This business suits me infinitely better than that of collecting specimens, although I wouldn't care to confess it before your father or my uncle, the celebrated Balder Vansyckel."

Paulie stared in supreme surprise. "Then you're not the great Professor of C——?" she said.

"Of C——, yes, but a professor of music, and not great in any degree. What could your Uncle Peter have said to create so wrong an impression?"

"Oh, he seldom makes anything plain; one time he sent us a package of choice beans and labeled them choice brains. Considering the source, the mistake is a very natural one. Freddie, we want another load to fill in here."

"There's no more, only pa's."

"Bring them, then. He won't care for them now—now—" an overwhelming sense of having blundered tripped Paulie's tongue.

"Now that the professor's a humbug," interposed that gentleman. "I must see him at once and explain."

"Not Balder Vansyckel, hey?"

"Jesse Balder Vansyckel, sir."

"Just so, and as welcome for your own sake as your uncle would have been for his. I like you, my young sir; you have walked right into my heart; will be delighted to have you stay a month with us."

March came around again, and, one morning—half snow, half sunshine—Mr. and Mrs. Vansyckel looked out upon the tiny mound, wrapped in ermine.

"How indefatigably we worked in the first three days of our acquaintance," said Paulie, with her merriest laugh.

"Yes," answered her husband, "of all specimens we were the biggest."

THAT DAY ON SIXTH AVENUE.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

THAT day! Its slow, long hours, its pain and despair, have been hushed and covered away by many other days of peace and gladness—days which have overflowed with such a sense of rest and loving tenderness that my soul has been almost afraid, and trembled at its own bliss.

Yet this feeling may have been owing to the consciousness of that other day, lying far away in the past; a ghost of a shadow—a faint echo lurking among all the years—the quiet, happy, sheltered, later years of my life.

I would not, now, have it otherwise. I should not want to lose the memory of that day. I am sure that it has made my life, in some sense, a different one; that I have been more alive, tenderer to all human pain and grief because of that time.

And yet, dear God! that there may be just such days now for other human souls as that day was to me. That is the thought which comes oftencest and hurts deepest.

I should not have told you so much if I had stopped to think twice, Cousin Dorrice; how glad I am that you have that lovely, quaint, old-fashioned name! When I first heard it, it was Tom spoke it to me, you know. I said to him: "Oh, it is charming! I seem to hear the winds singing through that name—winds that come over apple-orchards ripening in July suns, and over still, lush meadows, with dun cattle deep in the crimson clover."

Tom laughed his merriest. "I never heard, little Quaker woman with those odd poetic conceits flashing around all your New-England demureness, any such sounds in my cousin's name. It is a family heirloom, I believe, descended from her mother's side of the house. But I have a great liking for the person who bears the name, so great a one, Marjorie, that if Dorrice Seelye had not been my father's sister's daughter, I should once have asked her to be my wife; had she done me the honor to accept me—"

"I shouldn't have had an opportunity to do it. O Tom! how fortunate for me that first cousin bond held and stood between you two."

"In one thing at least, that I can bring you a Cousin Dorrice. You must throw that weight into the scale along with any other more personal advantages in my favor."

That talk happened before we were married, and it was the way I came first to know you, Cousin Dorrice.

But this is not answering your question; and you are waiting, I see, with your fair face, dear, lying like a white flower among the crimson cushions of the deep, old lounge, while the rain hums softly on the window-panes, and the clouds lie in loose, low, grayish masses overhead—summer clouds which let down their burdens of rain easily, and which a south wind will soon send flying with broken, trailing draperies off the face of the sky.

Your question, Dorrice, dear, has come in the right time, for I could only answer you truly by telling you a long story, and such a rain and such a sky put me into that quiet, tender mood in which alone I could tell this tale even to you.

You have often observed my manner to the girl-clerks, you say, when I come down to the city and we go out for our spring and fall shop-pings. You cannot precisely describe this, for it is something subtle in voice and manner, most like what you saw in me toward the sick children in the hospital, one day, when we carried them fruit and flowers. You understood the manner, then, but these girl-clerks, with their comfortable situations and honest earnings, really seem in no especial need of sympathy. You want to know what my manner means? It means, Dorrice, dear, that I was one of those very girls once. I, to-day, Tom Fairchild's happy wife! It means, too, that I never speak to one of those girls without remembering that last day of mine behind the counter.

How shocked you look, dear! Not because of the place and work—you are too true a woman for that, Dorrice Seelye—but you thought Tom Fairchild's wife had, all her life, the shelter of home, the love and care of strong hands and brave hearts. Yet, Dorrice—let me come a little nearer, and look straight in your twin stars of eyes while I say it—some terrible storms beat right down into the fairest years of my youth. I was hungry, and faint, and homeless one day, when I went into a large trimming store on Sixth Avenue, and applied for a situation behind the counter.

There happened to be a vacancy in the lace department. One of the girls had gone home sick. I took her place.

"How could it all have happened? How did I come to be so awfully alone in the world?"

It came very suddenly. I had had a carefully-nurtured childhood. Papa's salary—he was a college professor, you know—had afforded us a comfortable home; and if it permitted the indulgence of few luxuries, it lifted us quite out of the grind of poverty.

I have heard that he never was the same man after mamma died; but I was too young at the time she left us to be conscious of any change in him. I remember him as a tall, reticent, sad-eyed man, to everybody kindly, but absent and absorbed in books.

He was several years breaking down in health, and when he died, the last dollar of his salary, I have heard my aunt say, barely sufficed to pay his funeral expenses. I was fourteen at that time.

The next three years I passed in a sick room. My aunt, my father's only sister, who had charge of his household after my mother's death, became a confirmed invalid. She could not endure the sea air of the town in which I had been born and reared. She had a small annuity, which barely sufficed to keep both of us in the most economical fashion in the bit of cottage which she rented in a quiet inland village, fifty miles from New York.

My aunt was one of the loveliest women whom I ever knew. Whatever is best in me, Dorrice, I owe to her influence and training; but the dim, hushed atmosphere of that sick-room was hardly healthful for a young life just at its blossoming. We were among strangers; and my aunt's situation, and her tastes and habits, precluded our making many friends in the secluded little village, to which she had come for health, and where she remained to die three years later.

"What is to become of you, dear child?" she said sometimes, her great, sad eyes resting with solemn, yearning tenderness upon me, during the last days of her life—the only ones in which she had realized her real condition.

I think she had expected to live for years in precisely the old, quiet, dim way—a life which, without her knowing it, was touched softly with the shadows of the grave.

I was young and hopeful; the future leaned over me with no dark, threatening face. I was only anxious about my last near earthly relative.

"God will take care of me, Aunt Ellen. You have always taught me to believe that," I answered, with undoubting confidence.

And I know it was with that hope and trust, Dorrice, that my aunt went to sleep one night, softly and sweetly as infants go through the golden gateway of their slumbers into dreams. Only when Aunt Ellen woke up it was not to hear my good-morning, but the angels'.

Two months afterward I came to the city, with a few dollars in my purse—all that remained from the sale of our furniture. I had not a relative in the world on whom I would make any claim. My father and my mother slept in graves over which sang soft winds from the sea; my aunt in hers, where the breezes came with tender voices from the cool, distant hills.

I was only seventeen; and the dreadful problem of shelter, and bread, and clothes, which the strong brain and stout arm of a man might have solved so easily, met me on the threshold of my seventeenth birthday in the great city, and I was all alone in God's world.

I found a cheap boarding-place with a sister of our old milkman. She was not a refined woman. In a little while I proved her hard, mercenary, pitiless.

Well, I tried to get work—God be witness, Cousin Dorrice, I tried it faithfully, steadily, as man or woman ever did, day after day, week after week, until a month had passed away.

I had told my aunt, as I said, with unquestioning faith, that God would take care of me. Would He? Every day my heart grew fainter as I asked the question, wandering through the long, hot streets, among the noisy crowds, and I stared wistfully sometimes into strange faces of men and women who passed me by, with no help or tenderness shining in any of them, only sometimes staring back—the men, I mean—in a way which sent a sick shudder all over me; and the women with cold and curious glances, which at once repelled me.

You see how it was, dear. I suppose my history was not very uncommon—and that is the bitterest thought of all—there was really no place for me in the world—no work for me.

This was, perhaps, in part, the fault of my education. I had a passion for books, and my father had indulged it to the uttermost; but, after all, he had instructed me in a desultory fashion. Before I was fourteen, I had read and studied more than most girls who leave boarding-school at twenty. I had, too, a real talent for drawing; and some skill in nursing, gained from my three years' experience in a sick-room, which would have been of value in a hospital or an invalid's chamber.

So you see I was not without capacity, natural or acquired, which might even then have been turned to account, if only an opportunity had been afforded me to do that.

But the days wore on and on, from the golden softness of the late May into the fiery heats of the early July. I applied for one situation and another—applied for sewing, embroidery, copying, teaching. There is no need of going over the list. All my applications failed. My slender stock of money grew each day a little scantier, although I hoarded every sixpence like the greediest of misers.

You can imagine, dear, a little of the misery of that time; only living it can you know. I do not want to dwell on it, Dorrice, darling, and the pity in your violet eyes hurts me as I know my words are hurting your great, tender heart.

You must remember, too, that I had been brought up in an atmosphere of the most delicate refinement of thought, speech and feeling. I was thrown at once amongst the coarsest associations. The people at the boarding-house in which I had my bit of attic and my seat at table were wholly devoid of delicate instincts and cultured habits, and lived on a plane entirely different from any to which I had been accustomed. The household familiarity was torture to me. Every day the association became more intolerable. Every day, too, the courage and hope of my young heart grew fainter. What was to become of me? Every day, also, I asked God that, and there came no answer from the blue summer sky shining over the great, noisy, dizzy city, under all whose roofs was no home for me—me with my seventeen years!

My landlady began to suspect how matters stood, and, one morning, she came to me with a request that I would find myself another home, as she had been offered a dollar more than I now paid for the little, hot attic in which I had slept for a month, so tired after my long walks that I did not live over the miserable hours of the day even in my dreams.

I had just money for another week's board. It prevailed upon her to allow me to remain for that day, and I started out once more on my quest for employment.

I have wondered, sometimes, that my reason did not break down with the long strain of those days. Why, Dorrice, it was only a month that I walked those streets, a helpless, friendless, bewildered child, and it seems centuries! I had quite ceased to feel now that God—my father's God—would take care of me! I used to wonder that He could sit still and calm in His great, grand heavens and look down pitiless on my long misery. Of course, I have lived to see that, had I been a few years older, all this would never have happened. There were tender hearts and helpful hands all over God's world, in thick walled city and wide, green country, who, if they had known my real condition, would have eagerly reached out succor to me. But I did not know this—I with my unused life and my seventeen birth-days.

I looked up suddenly, standing irresolute on one of the corners of Sixth Avenue, and saw on the opposite side the sign of a great trimming store. I kept on afterward, for a block, and then, on a sudden, I turned back—to this day I don't know what made me do this—crossed the avenue and, going straight into the store, inquired of the first salesman I met whether he could not give me some employment.

I doubt whether I should have made another application that day, or, perhaps, ever again. My courage was at its lowest ebb. All emotion seemed dead within me, and I do not believe I could have shed a tear to have saved my life.

I had come, however, in the nick of time. There was a vacancy in the lace department. One of the girl-clerks had been taken ill and gone home. Her situation was offered me at six dollars a week. I seized it eagerly as those who are going down in deep waters seize a plank which is shot out to them by some rescuing hand.

The rules and the duties were briefly explained to me; I was to stand behind the counter from eight in the morning to six in the evening, with a brief interval at noon for lunch.

When I left that store on Sixth Avenue, my quest for employment was over.

The next morning I was at my place; and so I was for a fortnight of mornings afterward. Well, the rules were no harder for me than they were for the others—my place could probably have been filled any day, had I chosen to resign. But I don't know that made the thing any easier for me. You remember, dear, how secluded and tenderly guarded my life had been, and this now one among perpetual crowds of strange people was a terrible contrast. Then, I had never been strong, and those long, weary hours, from early morning until twilight, of standing on my feet, lifting boxes and waiting on customers, was a terrible strain on nerves and muscles. Ah, how glad I was when the twilight came, and I could put on my hat, every tired limb aching with the long day's wear and toil, and go back to my cup of tea and my bit of hot attic, where I lay in a dead slumber until the time came for me to rise up and go to my tasks again.

I have nobody to complain of; I think my co-laborers were, as a rule, courteous and tried to instruct me regarding my new duties, with a laugh—not ill-natured—over my "greenness."

My landlady's hard face relaxed a little, too, when she found that I had succeeded in obtaining a situation and she felt secure about my board-bills.

That fortnight was the hottest of the season, the mercury deep among the nineties much of the time. The atmosphere of the store was perfectly stifling, and I was remote from doors and windows, and no breath of summer wind ever cooled the dry, dead, awful heats of those days; the roof was low, but the sun found its way between the tall houses and beat upon it; the air was foul with human breaths, it made me faint and dizzy through the long, long days which went down at last in stifling twilights, when I went home, and drank my cups of tea, and threw my aching limbs on the cot-bed in the attic.

I do not think I realized, those days, how my appetite was failing with my strength. All my thoughts and energies were centered on one purpose, and that was to keep my situation. When that went, so I reasoned, life itself must go; and, bitter as mine had grown, I clung to it until that last day.

It was the last day, also, of that fiery fortnight, as I learned long afterward. That very night the wind changed and came in bearing on its wings the salt, blessed coolness of the sea to calm the awful fever of earth and air.

I went to my place that morning as usual. I tried before I left my boarding-place to drink my cup of coffee; but I put it down with the first sip, and the sight and smell of the coarse food gave me an unutterable loathing.

How long the walk seemed to Sixth Avenue! Was something dragging at my feet, they ached and felt so heavy as I tried to hurry along, in terror lest I might be late. I usually walked in the mornings, saving the car-fare for the return at night, when I was less equal to dragging my weary limbs, with the dreadful ache in them, over that long mile to my boarding-place.

I reached the store at last, and went to my counter. Ah, that loathsome, stifling air! Ah, the dizziness and fever at my brain—the pain which shot like smiting darts through every limb! How the faces went swimming around—strange, gorgon shapes they seemed, staring and leering at me!

Yet I believe I answered every question, attended to every customer that day. I kept on my feet, too; although doing this at last became a real torture.

Looking out of the distant door, I could see the street-cars—the Sixth Avenue line—going back and forth. I watched every one with a fierce, longing, breathless eagerness all that day. Less than two miles away was Central Park; and I knew this was the starting and terminating point of the line. The thought took possession of my imagination. Those cars started from, and were going to, the threshold of another world. They came from, they stopped in the very sight of it.

O Dorrice, I know from one terrible day how prisoners in dark, narrow, stifling cells have craved light, and freedom, and air!

Only two miles away; and there it all was—the still, cool shadows; the trees with their mighty roofs of leaves, with the soft touch and feel of the light, wandering breezes among them; the wide, still arbors; the cool dripping of water on the rocks; the singing of birds; the blessed healing sight of green grass, and the glory of the flowers; and little, lovely, shady places, with draperies of vines, and soft rustlings of leaves, and quiet arbors which roofed out the fiery glare of the day, where one might lie down softly and go to sleep, and never wake up again—never in the whirr, and crowd, and din.

For I had come to think that dying was better than life—to long for it, Dorrice, as I longed for no other thing—to think how glad I should be just to go and lie there, and look up once to the sky smiling down blue and pitiful between the green leaves, and say a little, soft good-bye to the world, and close my eyes and just go to sleep forever.

And what was to hinder me from doing this? I kept asking the question to myself, and laughing a little once or twice, thinking how nobody had any power to prevent my putting on my hat, walking straight out of the store, and getting on board one of the cars; and in a few moments I would be in that world of rest, and greenness, and beauty, out of which I would never go again.

All day, too, I had a fixed intention of leaving whenever a car went by. I half-started, with the intention of quietly walking out and taking my place inside, and then something checked me, and I told myself I would go with the next one.

And all the time the crowd of strang, gorgon-like faces swam and leered around me, and the hot air seemed scorching my forehead and cheeks, and pains shot like sharp lances through my limbs. I did not know I was ill; everything around me was like a dream; even the voices of the people at times grew far off, there was such a deafening whirr in my ears; but the dreadful weariness, the hot, nauseous air, the shooting pains, those were very real. And that one day, as I uncover and look at its face, seems weeks long to me.

Well, the end came at last. Your shocked, pitiful eyes are asking for it, Dorrice dear. Have patience, and I will tell you briefly as I can.

It must have been late in the afternoon, when a large, handsomely-dressed woman, with a hard, coarsely-moulded face, came up to my counter to look at some goods. She was a long time in deciding on her purchases. I remember I brought down every box of goods from the shelves for her inspection, and all the time the dizziness grew in my brain, the whirring din in my ears, while the lady sat before the counter and fanned her large, flushed, haughty face, and turned over the soft fabrics critically with her ringed fingers.

Would she never be done? I often asked myself, my eyes on the look-out for every Sixth Avenue car; and sometimes I had hard work to suppress a cry when some fierce pain shot along my nerves.

But at last the goods were all selected, the money was paid, and I passed it with a mere glance to the shop-boy, and commenced slowly to put the disarranged boxes in order.

In a few moments the boy returned, saying that there had been a mistake; three dollars more were wanting to make up the amount specified in the bill. The woman loudly protested that she had paid more than was due, and that a five-dollar note had been abstracted from the sum which she had handed to me, glancing threateningly from the cash-boy's face to my own.

Her angry tones soon drew several of the store-people about us. The woman insisted there had been foul play somewhere, and that she would call a police-officer at once to detect and arrest the culprit.

She grew louder and fiercer every moment; and it was evident by her looks and manner that her suspicions pointed either to me or the cash-boy.

I was really by this time too far exhausted and too ill to be greatly excited or alarmed at the gravity of the situation. I quietly insisted that I had given the money as I had received it to the cash-boy; and he very positively affirmed that he had taken it at once to the desk; but the five dollars was certainly wanting, and was not accounted for in the bill. One of the proprietors was summoned. The incensed purchaser again repeated her story, supplementing it with violent threats. The cash-boy turned his pockets inside out; and I began to perceive that the suspicions of the man and woman had concentrated on myself.

What followed is all very much like a dream,

Dorrice. I see the faces around me—curious, eager, doubtful—they seem like a vast crowd, probably far more than they were in reality, and they dance and swim before my eyes. Yet I was scarcely moved. In the first place, there was my own consciousness of absolute innocence, and then, after that day of misery, I doubt whether anything in this world had power greatly to affect me, but, with the lookers-on, my calmness was probably a strong point in my disfavor; and I was a new clerk with no honest record to fall back on, and I was without a friend in the store.

There was a swift examination of boxes and drawers, the proprietor giving me some orders in a very sharp voice. On the counter was a heap of disarranged laces which I had not had time to put in order. The man hastily overturned the whole pile, and there, clinging between two cards, was a five-dollar note!

The man held it up, the woman watching him with her keen, pitiless eyes sprang forward with a cry; the evidence of my guilt was before all eyes.

There, Dorrice, dear, lie down! The bloom is all scared out of the flower of your face, until it looks like a lily's smitten with sudden rain. Don't cry so—I didn't shed a tear then, if I am doing so now; and the end is at hand—the end of all the long, dreadful misery!

The man held the money up to my eyes. "What do you say to that?" he said.

I looked at the circle of faces around me. I read absolute conviction of my guilt in every one. Indeed, I had not for an instant the faintest doubt on my own part. I knew that in my faintness and bewilderment, I must have unconsciously retained the money in my palm, thinking it was a bit of waste paper, if, indeed, I thought at all, and it had slipped out of my hand and lodged among the laces, when I set about gathering them up.

But who would believe so absurd a story? I read my verdict in the hard, angry eyes all around me, and did not attempt one word in my own defence.

"Nothing," I answered the man, calmly. "You would not believe anything I should say."

"I see!" he said, with an oath. "Perfectly cool! A regular hardened case! Have a policeman right off!"

The words had hardly passed his lips before he appeared; somebody had probably whisked out of the store in quest of one, as soon as the money was discovered, which everybody supposed that I had slipped between the laces for safe keeping.

"You must go with me, girl," the man said, touching my shoulder, and I turned to get my hat very quietly—more so than I am telling you now—it all still seemed like a dream, and I knew I should not go very far. I went down the store with the policeman; cold, stern, curious faces staring at me all the way. Was not I a detected thief?

I had almost reached the door when I tottered; a lady standing by the counter turned suddenly to look, as one of the clerks whispered to her, and pointed to me. I see it now just as I did at that moment, the delicate, beautiful face, startled and shocked, the great, dark eyes turned on me full of pitying wonder, that grew, as we looked at each other, into a great grief and tenderness; it was as though the face of an angel had suddenly shone on me from the skies. I stopped and tottered toward it. I reached out my arms with a cry: "Oh, help me! I am not a thief!" and I fell at that woman's feet.

I have a dim recollection of faces swarming around me; of clear, indignant tones which rang out like a flute: "Are you brutes or human beings? Do you not see the child is sick or dying?"

There was a swarming of faces, a humming of voices around me; on my head the feel of soft, ministering hands. All is a blank afterward for days and days.

The long misery of mind and body had done their work at last, and brought me to the borders of the grave.

There, Dorrice, darling, forgive this sudden sobbing—that old day grew so awfully real to me! Dry that white, wet face of yours; the rest is only good to tell. When I dropped at that woman's feet the grief and misery of my life were over.

I woke up, at last, in a dim, large, cool chamber; the first sounds I heard were the distant rush and retreat of waves on the beach just as I had heard them all the days of my childhood. Soft pillows were under my head. Everything was pure, and white, and dainty about me. I saw the delicate pattern of my snowy bed-spread, and on the light stand by the side of my couch the fiery glow of the fuchsias in the little silver vase among the pretty cups and glasses.

When I stirred to see them better, a woman's face bent over me, a kind, pleasant, helpful face in a white cap.

"Well, my child!" with the cheeriest smile, "what are you thinking about?"

I answered her question with another. "Who are you, and how did I come here?"

"Oh, we brought you, and we've been taking care of you, and intend to until you are quite well. You've been very sick and you are too weak now to talk or think or do anything but just swallow this and go right to sleep," and she held a spoon to my lips.

Almost before I swallowed the drops, I was in a sound slumber.

In the twilight I awoke again; I was decidedly better now, but so weak that I could not lift my hand to my head.

There again was the pleasant, distant leap and laughter of waves on the sands. The kindly, homely face in the white cap bent over me. I liked it.

"You won't go away and leave me?" I asked; at first it was a great effort to speak.

The tears came into the woman's eyes. "Oh, no, dear child. Don't be troubled about anything, any more than a baby or a bird.

"Here is some nice broth. Let me raise your head a little, and try and swallow some of it."

How deliciously it tasted! Yet I could not have lifted my head from my pillow; I was too feeble to articulate the questions which kept crowding up in my mind. Suddenly there was a soft movement at the door, a flutter of woman's garments, and in a moment, there shone in the room the face of the woman who had turned on me as an angel's would that day. She came to me with the pity and tenderness alive in her beautiful eyes just as they had been before. She called me by my name, Marjorie Dale, as though she had known me all my life. She took my hand—was that little, white, wrinkled thing mine?—in her soft, cool fingers, and smiling all the time, although the tears shone in her eyes, she congratulated me on my improvement.

She told me that I had had a brain-fever, and been terribly ill. I was at home now, and must remember that I had not a care or a trouble in the world, and nothing to do but just get well as fast as I could.

The doctor and the nurse would do their part, if I would only do mine.

Well, the rain is over; I see rifts of summer blue thro' the clouds, Dorrice, and for my story, that has only the ending of fairy tales.

My young strength came to aid my recovery after that night, and no invalid ever had tenderer and more skillful care.

Little by little, I learned all there was to tell. My benefactress was a widow. Her husband had died several years before, and left her a large fortune and one child, an invalid boy.

She had a summer cottage on the sea-shore, a dozen miles from New York. She had brought me straight from the store on Sixth Avenue to the cool, airy seclusion of her summer home. She happened to be in New York that day, and had gone out, despite the heat, on some shopping errands, when the scene happened which changed in an instant my whole existence. The moment she looked in my face she knew that I was innocent, and my sudden illness, and the lady's unquestioned faith in me, caused a swift revulsion of feeling in the minds of the store-people, and the policeman himself bore me to the carriage.

When I grew better there were no new facts to tell Mrs. Arlington, that was the name of the best friend my girlhood had. I had related everything during the ravings of my illness, and she had written to my old home, and old friends of my father's had corroborated every word of my story.

If I had been older and wiser I should have gone to these when my troubles came, but it was so very long since we had parted, and I fancied, in my young ignorance, that I must fight the battle all alone in the great, noisy city.

My friend never permitted me to leave her roof, I was her companion, almost her daughter, in a little while, I had the same teachers that her beautiful, sickly, precocious boy had, and we two became to each other—all that brother and sister possibly could.

We went abroad together. Our boy—his mother's and mine—sickened slowly in Switzerland and at last died there.

In two years his mother followed him. My old knowledge of a sick-room was of unutterable value to me during those years, when all whom I loved on earth were slowly passing away from the world which they had made so bright to me.

Ah, how often Mrs. Arlington said to me, among those last days: "Marjorie, my dear, you have repaid to me and Alick a thousand-fold all that I have done for you."

But she was mistaken.

Among the last days of her life, Tom came; he was the son of her husband's best friend, and she was extremely fond of him.

One day—only two before the last—my friend drew down my face to her white, beautiful one on the pillow.

"Marjorie, my May-flower," that was her own and Alick's favorite name for me, "I am going to God's own comfort and rest, but I shall not leave you in the world alone."

I was so overwhelmed with grief that I did not understand her then, but I did, two weeks afterward, when Tom Fairchild told me. Three months later we were on our way home and I was his wife!

I am a rich woman now, you know, Dorrice, both in my own right and as Tom's wife, and loved, as it seems to me, woman was never loved before, by the bravest, tenderest heart in all God's world.

I drive in Central Park occasionally, when we go down to the city. I sit in my cushioned ease, behind my splendid grays as they bowl along the drives, and I look out from my sheltered luxury on that day, hidden away in its darkness and agony among the distant years, when I was a lonely, friendless girl in the store on Sixth Avenue.

So, now, my flower of women, you have the answer to your question, and that is Tom's ring, and we must go down to lunch; only, Dorrice, if I could only know for a solemn certainty that there were no girls behind counters, that there never would be any where I was that day, I should certainly be a happier woman in this luxurious, love-tended home of mine!

At that moment, a man's swift footsteps rang in the upper hall, and a man's voice broke into the room, saying, in the heartiest, merriest tones: "Just where I left you! What in the world can you two women, Marjorie and Dorrice, find to talk about all these long mornings after I have desperately torn myself away from you?"

Dorrice Seelye rose up from the lounge. She went over to Marjorie Fairchild and put her arms fondly about the neck of her cousin's beautiful wife.

"Ah, Tom," she said, "if Marjorie and I were to pass years of mornings together, I think we should find enough to talk about through all of them!"

INFINITE toil would not enable you to sweep away a mist; but by ascending a little you may overlook it altogether. So it is with our moral improvement: we wrestle fiercely with a vicious habit, which would have no hold upon us if we ascended into a higher moral atmosphere.

A WHITE garment appears worse with slight soiling than do colored garments much soiled. So a little fault in a good man attracts more attention than a great offence in a bad man.

Home-Life and Character.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSISSIWAY POTTS.

THIRD SERIES.—No. 8.

I NEVER told you in all these months gone by that there had been a quiet addition of one more to the deacon's household. Yes, ever since last April, and I neglected telling you, too. This was how it happened. The Presbyterian church in Pottsville called for their pastor, a young theological student who was just finishing his course at the seminary in Allegheny City. We pitied the modest young man. Of course, after ten or eleven years' study and preparation, with very little assistance except that which came of his teaching school, he would be barely ready to begin active life—he would be almost alone. When the church in Pottsville began to look about to find him a pleasant home, just the kind for a studious, proper young man, why, the place was hard to find. He looked every time up at the cosy home on the hillside, above the sloping meadow, and the two wooded hills that stood, like sentinels, on each side of it, seemed to invite him thither, but that was the home of Deacon Potts, and the deacon was not of his persuasion, and he looked away ruefully. But my heart went out to that boy the first time I heard him pray.

When we came home from church, that day, I said to Ida: "I rather like that new minister, I'm ever so glad that the Presbyterians called him instead of that other man. He touched my heart when he thanked God for the beautiful October weather that wrapped us in its soft haze of blue and gold."

"Well, I liked him, too," said she. "Oh, didn't he speak tenderly and reverently of women! Any man is good who holds woman so graciously and worshipfully in his heart."

This was while he was yet at the seminary in the fall. In the spring, a committee of elders came to see if we could possibly board their new pastor. We wanted to live alone, just the deacon and his little family, so we said we could not take a boarder, even though we liked the young man very much.

But after they were gone I felt uneasy and troubled. I said to myself: "I could mother over the new minister with such a willing heart, and now, if he lives in town, every thing he says or does will be criticised, and every loafer will make comments about him, and people will put their own narrow construction on all his conduct, and they'll keep the poor fellow under restraint all the time. Maybe he has peculiarities, nearly every body has, and nearly every body concerns himself so intimately with other folks's affairs, and I don't like the idea of this poor, self-sacrificing, educated man coming down to be common talk for those who sit on store boxes, and whittle, and discuss feet-washing, and the one way of baptism, and quibble over the splitting of hairs."

One evening I said all this to my family, and we grew very indignant over probable results, and the end of it all was that we made new arrangements up-stairs. Bub is at Lafayette College and didn't need his room here, so we moved his books and things into my room, and Ida took possession of his, and we gave hers and our library to the new preacher. That allows him the two large front rooms up-stairs, the length of the house. One is his study, and the other his bed-room, and he's as happy as a robin, a very quiet one, however. He takes his meals in the village and the walk is exercise.

It is so good to have a preacher in the house. He often takes tea with us; he settles questions that are not clear to us; straightens my tangled grammar; hangs our pictures, and helps us lift heavy things; we share fruit and berries with each other; read choice bits of letters; admire and share good poems; laugh over funny pictures and enjoy fine ones, and in all he is happy and in the enjoyment of the comforts and blessings of a quiet and a beautiful country home.

Just while I am on this subject, or, rather, because I am really drawn into making mention of a few things that crowd upon my mind. Why, I think an elderly woman has the advantage over a girl in the way of looking after the welfare of young men. I always feel a responsibility if there is a young man thrown under my influence; I am sure to feel that I have a duty to perform, that if I don't advise, and encourage, and assist him, if even only by a word of commendation, that I have not done my duty, and I go away feeling guilty and burdened.

Now, if I were a young woman I could not use the freedom that is mine by right of my years and experience; a young man would distrust me—it is a pity, but it is so. All a young woman can do safely is to wear her good principles daily, wear them on the outside, and to let her very name be the synonym for candor, virtue, temperance, piety, sincerity, womanliness and everything that is good, and noble, and beautiful. Girls of ardent temperament, zealous, fearless, brave unto danger, will, when they read this, snap their eyes, and clench their hands, and shut their teeth in a very decided way; but hold on, my dears, this brave zeal of yours is admirable, commendable, but not always safe. I stood once where you do. I would have died for the right, I didn't care what the misjudging world said, not I. But a middle-aged man, one of large and broad experience, far-seeing, and clear-headed, and shrewd, and sharp, led me to the light by one sentence.

I said to him, of a lawyer, an old bachelor, whose character was not very good and who, in his gloomy moods, was addicted to intemperance, but withal a genius: "I feel as if I ought to talk to Mr. —, sometimes it seems to me that I could really say something that might strike between the joints of his harness, and, oh, wouldn't that be a noble deed for a girl to do!" and I fired up with a real enthusiasm. So ardent is the impulsive nature of the young! "I would tell him what grand possibilities lie before him—all in his reach—if he would only abstain from strong drink, and would be proud for his reputation—only care for his good name!"

The old doctor looked at me; it was not a flattering look, for his lip wore a sneer, and the ugly, ugly wrinkles came in his nose, as he said: "You poor little—fool, I was going to say; and you won't care, eh? You mean well, but your words would be as straw in the flames. He would pretend to heed you just to flatter, but he would laugh slyly—a laugh, too, befitting Satan. Don't try it; save yourself from mortification by only treating him civilly. Men like he is are slow to believe good and unselfish motives of others—they distrust. Let me give you a little bit of advice. When you are forty years old, or upwards, your influence will be worth something. Experience will teach you many valuable things. Then you can safely approach the drunkard, or the immoral man, or the man who tramples golden opportunities under his feet; and your motives will not be questioned, or misconstrued, or treated lightly. Remember that 'hell is paved with good intentions.'"

Now I could not understand that the old doctor was right. I felt hurt, humiliated, unappreciated, and my young heart sank within me; but now I see wherein he was correct. This is hard to tell a young, impulsive, free-hearted girl, who has the good of others at heart, but it is nevertheless true. She may have, and should have, great influence over her brothers; but in a case like this she would do more harm than good. The final result might prove deplorable, for such men are unprincipled, reckless, disbelieving and heartless. A man who scoffs at religion is never a safe friend for an impressible girl or woman. How much of terror and truth did lie in the old Spanish proverb that came to me so forcibly and so pitilessly from the lips of the world-wise old friend of my motherless young girlhood on that remembered day: "Hell itself is paved with good intentions."

I can hardly write this morning. I was coming home from Cousin Sally's the other night—she is the poor cousin who made the "Thanksgiving" the year before last, you remember—and I was walking along in the dark in a narrow way, with the fence on one side and the brook on the other, and in my efforts not to run against the fence nor fall into the brook, I made a misstep, and, half-falling, hurt my back. This morning I cannot put on my shoes, or put up my hair myself; but perhaps I can sit still and write.

No, I'll not go to the doctor, either; just the less we dose and tinker our mortal frames, the better it is for them.

The deacon says: "I've no doubt but this wonderful medicine, made in Pittsburgh, would cure you, for it is recommended to cure every ailment, internal and external."

Then I turn round and look at that beneficent deacon from head to foot, for nothing insults me more than a hint that I should make a tool of myself, and experiment in trying every quack's medicine.

A few months ago, we found in our boxes at the post-office folded circulars, inside of which were seven cathartic pills, and the simple request: "Please try these pills."

Now one of our kind neighbors, Brother Lamley, was so accommodating, and so ready to comply, that instead of throwing them into the fire, as he should have done, indignantly, why the dear old booby went and swallowed the whole seven pills! It was a powerful dose; and when the favor had been granted, and the pills tested, the old noodle was so exhausted that he had to be propped up in his chair and brought back to life by dieting and the most careful nursing. He said they were all they were recommended to be; and he don't know to this day that he did a silly, unreasonable thing, and that any pill-vender who would ask such a favor deserves to be thrown on his back, and, while his arms, legs and nose are closely held, the villainous compound poured down his own throat.

While I am not thinking what to write, or meditating what I could say that would amuse or benefit, I will tell you what I saw at church yesterday. Now you all think that Pipesey Potts, the ugly old spinster, is cross, and purses out her mouth, and shrugs her bony shoulders, and looks gritty, if a dear little baby reaches out and takes hold of one of her fingers, and tries to tug the stubborn finger up to its mouth, baby-fashion; or if a little dear makes a grab forward and clutches her calash roughly in church—do you? Why how mistaken you are! No woman in the world loves babies better than I do; and just because of this I had to apologize to the parson last evening. While he was preaching yesterday, I heard a baby-voice on a seat behind me, and I managed to sit so I could see the child. It was Al Castor's Lenny, a large, ripe baby, about two and a half years old, the rarest baby I ever saw. His complexion is a tender olive; his large, clean head has not as much hair on it as one could pinch up between the thumb and fingers; his features are perfect, and his eyes a dazzling, roguish, bantering brown. No one can look at that face without laughing; there is something so expressive of fun and frolic and genuine mischief in it that you have to laugh. When I peeped around yesterday, there he sat, both of his fat legs sticking out straight, while his mother's hymn-book was spread out in his abundant lap, and he was doubled over it, singing aloud. He had his little, soft, gray felt hat on, with the crown dented in; it was stuck rakishly on one side of his head. He made a charming picture for an artist.

After service, Lily hurried round to where he was, and feasted on his fresh kisses. As she turned away, I saw his glorious baby-eyes following her, and they expressed more than any words could say. Oh, they looked so satisfied, and so full of approbation! And he was licking his lips just exactly after the manner that a contented old cat does after she has partaken of a juicy young mouse. I nudged Sister Bodkin, and we both enjoyed the scene immensely.

Baby Lenny's home is about two miles from ours, and one beautiful day last October Lily proposed that we two would walk down to Mr. Castor's, and slip in very slyly and see the baby just as we might chance to catch him. We drew pictures all the way down there of what we hoped he might be doing. When we arrived there, I told Lily I thought Mrs. Castor would not care if we crept softly around the house so as to come unawares on the baby.

There he was, out on the back porch, trying to make a wagon of an old wooden squirrel-cage; he did not see us, but his mother did. She was back in the kitchen canning grapes, and looked up, startled; but I held up my forefinger in token of silence, and Mrs. Sue understood what I meant.

That child's legs! They were almost as large and round as a stove-pipe, and they were creased, and dimpled, and waxen white, while his little pudgy hands looked as though they had been stung and were swollen. He puffed as he toddled round, and bent over the wagon to see why it didn't run easy like his pa's wagon. He had a string tied to it; and instead of a hammer, he used a piece of an iron pin to drive imaginary nails and to repair weak places.

We could hardly stand it to let that royal baby alone one minute. Lily whispered a verse from Miss Muloch's grandest poem—one that proud mothers often whisper, I doubt not:

"Up from thy sweet mouth, up to thy brow,
Philip, my king!
The spirit that lies there sleeping now
May rise like a giant and make men bow,
As to one heaven-chosen amongst his peers;
My Saul, than thy brethren taller and fairer,
Let me behold thee in future years;
Yet thy head needeth a circlet rarer,
Philip, my king!
A wreath not of gold but palm."

While we stood there, the busy little fellow happened to look up and see us. He stood and stared, and when we laughed the faintest twinkle came in his eyes; and then, as if remembering his dignity, it died out, and he looked steadily at us, as much as to say: "No doubt a couple of interlopers, who wish to interview me."

"How do you do, young man?" I said, with suavity in my voice.

He yielded, and very graciously offered me the iron pin that he held in both hands, the twinkle beginning to come in his marvellously beautiful eyes. Pretty soon he was shaking hands with Lily, and playing peep from behind the back of a chair; and the two co-operated in the wagon-making business very amicably together.

When we started home that day, we paused on the bridge that spans the creek, near the house, and saw a picture that comes up to me almost daily ever since, especially in these cold, bleak days of winter. All you who admire the beauties of nature will see the picture, or one similar, when I tell you that the view was comprised of a range of picturesque hills, undulating valleys, beautiful farms and farm-houses, and the course of the winding stream marked by plummy willows. From the bridge the picture was perfect; above and below us the trees bent over the stream, and formed a sylvan arch, through which the mellow October sunlight came down like fine siftings of gold that glinted and shimmered upon the rippling water.

We two stood there with joyful exclamations of "Ohs" and "Ahs," and all the long list of adjectives that signify beauty, and grace, and splendor. I told Lily to take a good look, drink in all she could of this sweet pastoral picture, for it would never leave her memory, and it would be so pleasant to dwell upon in the gloom of winter.

So, in these cheerless evenings, when the winds howl without, and shriek about the gray eaves, and sob among the door-yard pines, and wail and cry out among the bare oaks on the hill-tops, then we gather about the coal-fire, and say: "What have you in your picture-gallery to-night of the summer's bloom, and greenness, and glory?"

Then we pretend that we have private galleries, and we think over and bring out the most beautiful pictures we can find, and we use the most glowing language in our description.

This is very enjoyable. We accustomed ourselves to this when all the little Pottses were children together. I hope it is common in other families, for there is an exquisite pleasure in it, and it tends to the cultivation of one's imaginary powers, and the selection of the right words in narration, besides fostering a love for the beautiful.

(Dinner is ready now, and I will quit.)

Lily cooked the dinner to-day. Ida and I were not very hungry, and we ate but little. The poor deacon was almost starved, I should judge, by the way he ate. He had been out in the cold for two or three hours working with a foundered colt. It seems that the founder settled in its legs, if such a strange thing can be, and they doctored it. I asked what they did. He said they gave it a big dose of table-salt, and he was sorry they didn't do it sooner; but they were mad at the little fool for stealing corn and overeating, and they had a mind just to let it die for pay of its "cussedness." Then they rubbed turpentine about its ankles, to keep the disease from settling in its feet.

At dinner father said: "I should think, Pipesey, you'd feel like looking well to your laurels, for you must know that you never cooked cabbage in your life to taste as good as this does that Lily cooked;" and he helped himself to it the third time.

Pooh! I didn't care what he said. Why, I would feel proud to have these little Pottses eclipse me in everything I do!

The cabbage was good, and this was how she cooked it: Cut it fine, and covered it up closely on the stove, putting in only three or four spoonfuls of water. When steamed through, she seasoned it and put in a little lump of butter and a teacupful of rich milk. When it was hot, she stirred the cabbage to one side, and dredged in a little flour, stirred it all up together then, and it was done.

This winter is passing pleasantly, and I have something new to tell you about the long winter evenings. Last December I somehow fell into the habit of reading aloud more than I had been accustomed to for many years. Some evenings it would be a sermon and sometimes a story. Frequently a poem, or a child-story, like those fine ones in the Christian Union or the Congregationalist. One day, one of the girls suggested that we would send and get the Tribune lectures. I sent immediately, and we found them to be most excellent entertainment. I never read an evening in which I was not applauded. At first, we were afraid of annoying the parson, whose study is immediately over our sitting-room, but he said only the hum of our voices reached him and that it was pleasing and cheerful, and when the sounds ceased and we retired, a sense of loneliness stole over him. He never goes to bed until after midnight; he learned this habit while at the seminary. I might as well say it now, that, in our reading, we are careful about shunning the writings of men whose views incline to be deistical or unsafe. They may write very beautiful things, but there are other things just as beautiful, besides being safe and good.

Now that crackers are so cheap, it is easier to buy than to make them, but if a young housekeeper wishes to try her hand at making some, this recipe, given me by Sister Jones's daughter Kate, is the best I ever tried. They are just as nice as those you buy. To five pounds of flour take ten ounces of butter, one pint of cold water and an even teaspoonful of salt. It will require a good deal of strength to knead it.

The girls and I were at Sister Jones's last fall when we were out gathering wild grapes. They live near a thirty-acre wood-lot, a wild, dense woodland in which it seems never the foot of man trod. In there we found the rarest mosses, and leaves, and vines, and berries with which to make pretty adornments for our house.

The Woman's Missionary Society met at Sister Jones's a week or two later, and we were all there. I hung around out in the kitchen a good deal, for they are such prime housewives, and I wanted to see how they did their work, so I could tell you women-readers. I don't doubt but some of the neighbors dislike my mousing propensities, but I don't care so long as you poor, tired women approve of the result.

The Joneses had two large loaves of cake and they were frosted most beautifully, and I asked Kate how it was done, and then I jotted down the formula. Take one sheet of isinglass, pour about half a cupful of boiling water on it and stand it in a warm place to dissolve slowly. When there is no scum on top add to it one pound of powdered sugar and a heaping teaspoonful of starch. Let the cakes be cold, pour the frosting over, smooth it down as little as possible and set it away in a cool place to get hard. This is a nicer and much easier way than to make frosting of sugar and beaten eggs.

Old Granny Jones lives with her son. She came from the East "nigh on to forty year" ago, she told me. While we were at the table, her daughter said: "You must all taste grandma's 'Yankee jelly,' as she calls it."

Now that will come in season for this number of the HOME, and I will look in my reticule and find it. I know it is there, for I've not carried the reticule since that day. Here it is, with the very smell of the Jones's parlor on it yet! Peel and core a quantity of apples, and then stew them until there are no lumps in the mass, then strain them through a coarse sieve, pressing them all through with the hand. Throw out all tough, or woody bits, or the remains of dry, bruised places, before refilling the sieve. Then take a tin-cup and measure the cooked apples, and to every four tinfuls of apples put one tinful of fine, dry sugar. Boil until it makes a stiff jam; put in bowls and jars and set away in a cool, dry place. Just at this season of the year we all have apples showing signs of decay and this is a good way of saving them.

I often make peach-butter of dried peaches this same way, only to every three cupfuls of the peach-sauce I add one cup of sugar. And if you have not dried peaches and want something new, or "something black" to spread on your own or the children's bread, why take dried apples and make apple-jam of it; and if you are so very poor that you have not the dried apples, why—let me see—what could you fix? Yes—take a quart of molasses, boil and skim it and add three well-beaten eggs, stirring all the time. That makes a very good "something black," but is better to be flavored with lemon or vanilla.

Ida wanted something this morning—I knew she did. She hung around and busied herself folding up the late papers, right side out, brushing specks of dust, picking up bits of imaginary ravelings, standing the books straight and putting on what Brother Rube calls the "finishing touches."

"How do you feel this morning, Sissy?" said I, beginning to think she wanted to confess something.

"Oh, I never felt better! this air is so balmy and so full of news. I imagine it begins to tell tales of coming bluebirds, and budding lilacs, and that sweet, living, earthy smell that the ground always has in the early spring," and she pushed back the flowing tresses that hung in beautiful ripples all over her shoulders. "I've been wondering how it would be to take about four of those sheets that begin to wear in the middle," said she, hesitatingly, "and make them into nice curtains for the kitchen and dining-room windows."

Aha! so that was why she loitered about my chair, and picked up wonderful bits of lint and ravelings!

"Very well," I said, without looking up from my writing, "just as you please; but remember, Sissy, that there is good economy in ripping half-worn sheets apart and turning the outsides into the centre—they will last as long again."

"That was just what I intended doing with the others," she said. "You know it would be no job at all to rip them and sew them up again with the machine. What nice curtains we will have now, they will be so white, and so large, and will make the rooms look more home-like. Uncurtained windows give any room a gloomy, bare appearance. And, Pipsey, I wish you would ask the village parson to let me cut out and make his next half dozen shirts. I pitied him that day they held union service in Pottsville, for I saw him more than once make a convenient gesture just so he could push his refractory shirt-front into its place. It kept working out at the sides all the time while he was decanting upon the excellence of brotherly love and Christian unity."

Shirts again! but I know why the child wanted to cut and make the parson's shirts. The poor fellow has always bought his, and sometimes he did not get good bargains, they were not always honestly made.

When our brother went back to college last summer, we made up clothing enough to last him two years, in case he did not come home during the next vacation. The pattern for his shirts was cut out by a man whose profession it was, and nearly every letter Ida gets he says: "O Dido, you did make such nice shirts! They fit me most charmingly! My chums feel of me, and pat me on my back and say, 'How neatly Potts's shirts do fit him!' You cannot think how much I am obliged to you!"

The same pattern will fit the parson, and I tell her she shall make the boy a new half-dozen.

I always get the breakfast myself if I am able, but I like to have things handy, so that I will not have to run down cellar the first thing in the morning. I tell the girls when they are cooking supper they must be thinking of the deacon's breakfast at the same time. While boiling the kettle for tea, they can make mush to fry in the morning, or cook a half-dozen potatoes. He likes thin slices of mush fried brown, and he likes potatoes boiled, and when cold sliced the long way and fried in butter. They should be cooked slowly, and nicely browned. Cooked this way, they are really not readily digested, and children should not be allowed to eat them. After all, the good old-fashioned way is the best—to mash them and add milk and butter.

Cute? I thought it was too! It was a funny little cotton tidy that I saw, the other day, at Linda Van Doodle's. Linda and Amity are two old spinsters who live alone and they do see a heap of comfort together. When Jerry Van Doodle died the heirs all signed a quiet claim and the little property was given to the girls. Jerry had been blind, Oh, I don't know how many years! and the two girls had cared for him with all the watchfulness of mother-love. They belong to our church, but then they lived so far away that they hardly ever got to church, only on communion days.

They dress pretty much as I do, very plain and comfortable. They both wear calash bonnets and carry reticules, and umbarels, and wear good woolen shawls, so all the ways of a sinful and vain world touch them not in the way of fostering pride.

But I wanted to tell you of the simple little tidy and how it was made. Take a circular piece of bleached muslin, about two inches across, turn in the edge and gather it with a stout thread, then draw it up as tight as possible and fasten it that way, so that it will stay securely. Then press it down flat, with the fingers, until it is round, with the gather in the centre—a little like when you cover a button-mould. Make twelve of these for one row. Then make enough for twelve rows; then sew them all together on the wrong side—just a few good, firm stitches in the very edges to hold them together. You can make a fringe as you like, the best way is to use cotton yarn drawn in with a needle and cut about three inches long. This is a good way to work up bits of bleached muslin that are of no use whatever, and where there is an idle pair of hands, it is a very pretty little job for them. A tidy made after this fashion will last twenty years.

I learned one new thing of these girls, and that was how to knit heels double. I have been troubled a good deal about the deacon's heels, especially since granny is gone. While she was with us she looked after them, and I never had a thought or a worry. Amity was knitting socks to sell, and she showed me her way. After setting the heel you must widen a few stitches, according to the fineness of the yarn. Then commence at one side, knit the first, then slip off the next without knitting; then knit the next, and slip the next, and so on, across. In knitting back, you must slip the stitches that were previously knit, and knit those that you slipped before. She said this was the old-fashioned double heel, the kind her great-grandmother Powers taught her to knit when she was only seven years of age.

I had a very good time at Van Doodles. They are third cousins of the Van Doodles over on the Ridge Road. My what Baptists! They hooted at me for allowing the village parson to have our best upper rooms. They said just as likely as not we'd grow to be Presbyterians; but I told them, while my orbs blazed with indignation, that I was not that kind of a professor, that my religion was not the sort to be laid off, like a last summer's garment, and something new put on in its stead. I will stick to my persuasion while grass grows and waters run to the sea. I just expected to be twitted about that, but we will show the meddlesome public that Deacon Potts has a heart, and Pipey has a heart, and the rest of the family, notwithstanding.

Last fall we had new neighbors move into the old house on the Rowe farm. It seems to me, the woman knows everything. She has not joined our church yet, but she intends putting her letter into it as soon as she gets it from their former place of residence. I never saw a woman so systematic in her housewifely duties. Every day has its allotted work. Now I don't pretend to wash on Mondays if I am sick, or if we have company, or if the weather is bad; but this woman, Kitty Rowe—a niece of old man Rowe—she will make every day do its own work, rain or shine, sick or well. To use her own expression, she will wash on Monday if it "rains cats and dogs." I don't know, may be she is correct. I have known her to wash cold days this winter when the thermometer was below zero and the wind was blowing like all possessed. She manages pretty well, though. If the day is too cold, or too rainy, or windy, she goes right on with the washing, and when it is all wrung out and ready for the line, she shakes the wet garments out loosely and lays them in her clothes-basket, in the bottom of which she has spread a big, new towel or an old sheet. Then she stands it in some out-of-the-way corner, covers it up nicely, and waits until the weather is more propitious.

I like her plan of facilitating her morning's work. After the supper dishes are all washed up she lets the fire in the kitchen die out, and they all go into the sitting-room. Before bed time they lay the kindlings and fix the wood all nice in the kitchen stove ready to start the next morning. The teakettle is ready filled and on the stove, and all that is required is to touch a match to the kindlings.

We always kept our kitchen floor carpeted until I saw her way, and I think it is the best. She keeps a strip of carpet on that part of the floor that leads to the pantry and dining-room, and a rug in front of the lounge, and a couple of pieces of carpet a-near the stove. She says no kitchen carpet should remain on the floor more than three days at a time without shaking and airing it, and I believe she is right. A kitchen carpet gathers dust so badly, and then foul odors settle in it.

She often pickles a mess of turnips or carrots, and you would not believe how good they are. When she prepares the turnips, she only washes them clean before boiling—nothing else; because she does not want to break the rind and let the juice escape. When cooked, she takes the outside off and slices them like beets, then pours hot vinegar over them. Sometimes she spices them, but they are better without. Who would think homely, common turnips would be so good? They are to be eaten while newly cooked and fresh. This is a change from the other ways of cooking turnips with pork, or mashed with potatoes.

Her cookies are excellent. Two and a half cups of sugar, one tincupful of thick, sour cream, one teacupful of melted butter, a tablespoonful of ground cinnamon, soda and flour.

Her oldest son is a one-legged man, a tailor, and sorely afflicted with dyspepsia. His mother is careful what he eats. Instead of water and lard in his pie-crust, she uses sour cream, with a little soda in it. That makes a very tender crust, and one that he can eat and feel none the worse of it. I will learn more of her dyspepsia treatment, and write it out for the benefit of others.

HARD TIMES.

FROM THE NEW JERUSALEM MESSENGER.

THESE words have become familiar, for they are in the thought and speech of all. But, familiar as they are, there may be an application of them which we do not often make, and which it may be a help and comfort to consider.

We are so variously related, and have so many interests radically distinct from each other, that conditions which favor one degree of our life may be a hindrance to another, and much higher degree.

The natural degree of our being is first developed, and being perverted and severed from the spiritual plane of life, it claims everything for itself. It measures every condition and possession by its own standards. All that favors it is called good; all that hinders the enlargement of its dominion and the gratification of its desires it regards as evil. The times are easy and good when they offer the greatest facilities for the accumulation of property, and the gratification of our natural desires. We identify ourselves with the lowest degree of our nature.

If we should reverse the principle, and adopt a new and truer standard of what is good and true, and regard ourselves as spiritual beings, possessing a nature and the possibilities of a life entirely distinct from and above the natural, we might come to very different conclusions about the state of the times. Hard times would be those which were unfavorable to our spiritual growth. Good times would be those which favored it, and which repressed a too vigorous natural life.

Estimated by this standard, those conditions which are the most favorable for the development and gratification of the natural mind are the "hardest times" for the spiritual man. They crowd our spiritual interests into the background; they make us forget that we are spiritual beings, and they minister only to our natural interests and possessions. History and personal experience conclusively testify that times of great natural prosperity are not favorable to moral and spiritual growth. Indeed, if we lived in uninterrupted natural prosperity, we should never think of our spiritual interests, we should become wholly absorbed in the acquisition and enjoyment of natural possessions. Our whole being would be overrun with the rank weeds of a natural, evil life, and there would be no room for the development of the higher possibilities of our natures.

Seasons of great natural prosperity are, therefore, the "hardest times" for the spiritual man. His interests are ignored; he is trampled under foot and forgotten. When men are making money rapidly, they are the least disposed to contribute to spiritual uses. They want to use all they have, and often all they can borrow, to make more with. If they have any spiritual life, they flatter themselves that they will do great things for the church when they have accumulated money enough to do it with. The chances for business are so good that they have not time to attend to their spiritual interests. When they have accomplished all their natural purposes, then they will have time to devote to the wants of their higher nature. And, in most cases, they go on in this way until they lose their money, or pass on to the other life. They are completely deluded by the sophistries of the natural man.

It is equally in accordance with experience and observation, that when the times are hard for us naturally, there is more disposition to think of our spiritual interests. When our health fails, when our loved ones have been taken from us, when our property is gone or much diminished, and we begin to see that no natural and worldly good can be depended upon, then we begin to turn to something higher, if we have any love for a heavenly life. These are good times for the spiritual man. So far as we identify ourselves with the highest degree of our nature; so far as we regard ourselves as spiritual beings, destined to live forever in a spiritual world, and with capacities for obtaining a knowledge and enjoying a good immeasurably beyond our natural conceptions, they are favorable to every genuine and permanent interest of our being. Our faces are beginning to be turned in the right direction; we are getting released from the bonds which have bound us to a merely earthly life; we are gaining our freedom, and are beginning to see and to appreciate our permanent and highest spiritual interests. These are good times, prosperous times. The money which passes current in Heaven is "easy" and abundant. We are beginning to grow rich and to invest our capital where moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal.

Good times for the highest interests of our nature are good times for every interest. This is one of the great excellencies of a heavenly life. It is profitable for every degree and condition of our being. It may not seem so, but it is so. When we are governed by heavenly principles, the natural man is kept in his place. If we have but little, we make so wise a use of it that we get more good from that little than, when actuated by worldly principles, we could get from the greatest natural abundance.

When we regard ourselves as spiritual beings, and estimate the value of all possessions by their power to help us in overcoming our evils and falsities, and in living a heavenly life, the "hardest times" we ever have are those in which we are so prosperous in worldly affairs, that we become absorbed in this life, and forget that we were born to live in a spiritual world, and with capacities for endless progress in knowledge and blessedness.

* * * * *

These may be "hard times" for our worldly and selfish affections, but they are good times for the germination and development of love to the Lord and the neighbor. We shall come out of them with increased power, with a clearer knowledge of the only way to gain the highest rewards of this life, and to make the best preparation for the life hereafter. "Hard times" for the love of self and the world, are "good times" for the love of the neighbor and the Lord.

FROM MY WINDOW.

BY LICHEN.

No. 10.

OH, the snow! the beautiful snow!
With its wings of downy white;
Whirling about as the breezes blow
The flakes, in their downward flight.
From my window I watch it fall,
Noiselessly down from above,
Cov'ring the earth with a pure white pall,
Like Charity's garment of love.
Oh, the snow! the beautiful snow!
Lying cold over hillside and heath,
Yet sheltering safe from the winter storms,
The flower-hearts hid beneath;
Till the warm spring winds and the April rain,
Shall gently, softly call,
And blossoms shall cover the hill and plain
As the snow now covereth all.

So ran my thoughts this morning, as I looked from my window at Mother Nature, adorning herself in such lovely apparel. Like the bride of old Winter, in spotless robes, soft as royal ermine. Ever since last evening, the white beauty had been falling, and now no spot of earth—no brown roof was to be seen. The tree branches were heavily laden, the cedar boughs bent almost to the ground. Before noon, however, the flakes grew smaller, and fewer, gradually ceasing to fall; a brisk wind blew the clouds about, and the sun came out for a few minutes to look at the lovely picture lying beneath him. Now, thought I, the sleighriders will have to be in a hurry, for the snow seldom lies long enough here to enjoy it more than a day or two. After dinner, the wind grew sharper, preventing any signs of a speedy thaw. A flock of snow-birds came trooping down into the yard, and little Jessie hid behind the lattice on the end of the gallery, and threw crumbs to them. Roy threw snowballs with the little boy over the way as they started off to school. The sun peeped out again, lighting up the scene brilliantly. I looked until my eyes could bear it no longer, then curled down among my shawls and pillows, repeating to myself, "Oh, ye ice and snow, bless ye the Lord, praise Him and magnify Him forever."

But ere long a chime of merry bells aroused me, and looking out again, there was a sleigh full of laughing girls, drawing up to the house. May and Floy, Rosalie and Edna. In they came, rose-cheeked, bright-eyed, bringing a burst of life and sunshine with them. Rosalie, boiling over with gleeful spirits, went dancing around the room, looking at everything new or pretty, and stopping every minute to tell something about the "splendid" time they had been having; while May, more dignified, and assuming more importance as being the oldest one of the party, took possession of a rocking-chair, and attempted, occasionally, to keep her more lively cousin in check. Fair, golden-haired Floy dropped into a seat close beside me, and slipping her hands into mine, gave me a quiet kiss. She had enjoyed her ride as much as any of the rest, but left them to tell about it. Edna, seated on the foot of my lounge, inquired, in her thoughtful way, of my health, and how I stood the cold weather—wishing that I could have the enjoyment of a sleigh-ride such as theirs to-day.

Upon which Rosalie came flying up to us, exclaiming: "Oh, could you go if you were all wrapped up snug and warm? If you can, I'll give you my place with pleasure."

"Why, Rosalie, what can you be thinking of?" said May, with an amusing assumption of severity. "She would have her poor, tender hands and nose nearly frozen in ten minutes, and be sick with a cold for a month after."

"Rosalie cannot realize, in her state of perfect health, what very worthless, weak bodies some people have to carry about with them," said I; "and it is very generous in her to offer to give up a part of her pleasure to me. I appreciate it none the less because I cannot avail myself of it."

The bright face looked relieved, and she answered, with an attempt at seriousness: "I hope I shall learn, some day, to keep my thoughts about me, and say sensible things like other people, but it is so hard to stop to think. Oh, how pretty that hanging-basket of ivy is!"

Whereupon every body laughed.

"I wish you could see something pretty that I saw this morning," said Edna, turning to me. "You remember the little boy who got one of his limbs hurt so badly last summer, and who has been a cripple ever since. They live near us now, and I went over to take a little dish of something nice which mother had made for him. He was lying on a lounge, by a south window, busily engaged cutting strings of dancing dolls, with their hands all joined, out of the margins of a newspaper, for some of the younger children. He looked so bright and contented that I think he must be rather happy, and he says he does not suffer much now; but it made me feel so sorry for him to see those crutches standing by the side of his couch, and think he might have to use them. But the pretty thing which I was going to tell you about was a flower-pot standing on a chair close by the window, with a little wooden cross in it, about two feet high, completely covered with a flourishing cypress vine. His sister, who makes wax flowers for sale, had fastened here and there amongst the thick green masses, a crimson star—very good imitations of the real blossoms which belong to the vine."

"I know it must have been beautiful," said I, "and recalls a thought I have had before; that our own crosses, if we have learned to carry them well, and willingly, are often so twined around with beauty, and crowned with brightness, that we almost lose sight of them."

"Do you find it so?" said Edna, then I hope I shall as I grow older. It does not seem so to me now, my little ones fret me so; but I suppose we girls know very little about such things yet, with our happy lives."

"About crosses?" asked Rosalie, coming up just then. "I do, I am sure. I have lots of them. I can't play croquet for another month at least, not till it gets warmer and dryer, and that is a great cross."

"You seem to have such splendid fun snow-balling, that I should think you were very well compensated, just now, for the other privation," said May, with a mischievous glance at the other girls.

"Well, that is some consolation; Floy, did you see Mr. Ed Vaughan's hat go off into the street this morning?" and her eyes danced with laughter.

"Yes, and I thought you were not very polite to one who was so nearly a stranger."

"Indeed, indeed, it was through no intention of mine that such a thing happened. I am innocent of that. I had just aimed a snow-ball at little Joe Carter, going along to school, and Mr. Vaughan's hat popped right into the way. I jumped behind the big rose-bush at the corner of the house, and came near having convulsions, for the poor young man's face wore such a comical, bewildered look, at first, and then a queer, half smile came over it, as he comprehended the situation. You know, he came here from the far south, and never saw a real snow-ball before, I suspect. When he finds out who did it, I suppose he'll think me a hoyden, but I can't help it now, although I'm sorry."

The laughing face did not look very penitent, however.

"Girls!" exclaimed May, jumping up suddenly, "do you know we were to be back by three o'clock, to let some of the others have the sleigh? It is high time we were going."

So away they went, taking their sweet, young faces and merry voices from the room again, but not all the brightness which they had brought into it. Some of that remained through the rest of the day to gild its closing hours, as their presence will help to cheer and brighten many another's life, I trust. Have they any idea how I love them—these gay, joyous girls, who, as yet, seem to look upon life as a pleasure-ground, laid out for their enjoyment? Not, to be sure, with that light, happy love they feel for each other, springing naturally from the mutual pursuits, pleasures and tastes belonging to their corresponding ages, and from their constant companionship; but with a deep, tender affection, which longs to see them grow into true, earnest women, with a steady purpose in life. A love which would fain have them escape all sorrow and trial, save that which would make them stronger and nobler. Which would pray that their fair, young lives might never be shadowed as—but no, I did not know what way was best for me, when I would have chosen a brighter path for myself, and is it likely I should know what would be good for them? "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." And in His loving care they are safe. Yes, drop the curtain, Roy, and brighten up the fire, that its cheery light may dance upon the walls and chase away the shadows that are gathering. Good-night, beautiful, white, pure-looking world! Sleep peacefully in the still moonlight, and may angels, just as pure, guard us until another morning dawns.

MY GIRLS AND I.

BY CHATTY BROOKS.

SECOND SERIES.—No. 3.

WE were talking this morning, my girls and I, about girls who are always growling, and complaining, and finding fault. We were speaking of Jennie Wentworth.

Now Jennie is one of a class of girls; she is not the only one of the kind, by any means. Her family are in moderate circumstances, and it is no more than right that she should work and earn her own living. Her father has given her a good education; she can get a certificate from any board of examiners; and yet when the time comes for her to go out and teach school, and be a womanly woman, the great booby will sit down and cry like an infant, and 'plain out: "Oh, I don't like to teach! I don't want to teach! I'd rather stay at home!"

When she is at home she is dependent on her father for everything she eats and wears—even for her very shoestrings.

Now one would think that any good girl, liberally educated by the close management of a doating father, would be proud to go out and teach or work, or do something to make her own living, independent of her father's aid.

Not so with Jennie. I saw her once throw herself on her bed, bury her face in the pillows, and cry out piteously. I flew to her, thinking she was in pain, or broken with poignant sorrow, but she sobbed out: "I don't like to teach! I don't like children, and I can't bear to be where they are!"

"Now, Jennie," I said, "be careful. I shouldn't be a bit surprised if you'd marry a widower with eight children, and maybe be the own mother of as many more. That is generally the fate of such girls—the kind who turn up their noses at the blessed children—and I think it is good enough for them, too." I said: "Perhaps, though, the wages are no inducement. What do you get a month for teaching winter school?"

"Forty-five dollars," she booh'd out.

"For shame!" I said. "Oh, I wish girls had received such wages when I were a schoolma'am! But then there were only three young ladies in my township who received eight dollars a month; they were old teachers, who had followed the profession for years. All the rest of us got six dollars a month and boarded ourselves. I thought I was doing very well at those wages; but I had to work hard to pay my boarding. I milked, churned, baked, washed, cooked, and was busy all the time. I have no doubt but the discipline was good for me. I learned a great many things that never would have come to me at home; and then I learned how to battle for myself, to be strong, and self-reliant, and forbearing, and ready to meet any emergency. It is not the best thing for a girl to be dauded in the lap of a loving home; it makes her tender, and weak, and babyish. Better far to learn a trade, and learn to depend on her own exertions for a living than to be cuddled all through her blooming years in the home-nest, or in the bosom of those who cannot bear to see the chill winds blow upon their darling. Forty-five dollars a month is such good wages, and the company of little children should be considered a precious privilege. Sometimes when I sit and listen, enraptured, to the eloquent preacher who was once a little white-headed, bare-footed pupil of mine, I feel the tears come into my eyes, and I say to myself, 'Oh, I do wonder if I did my whole duty while the lad was under my care?' I seem to see his fair, up-turned face, and his earnest blue eyes, as he looked then, and sometimes I shudder, fearing I did not do all that I should have done."

A few years ago I met suddenly a tall, dark man, black-eyed and heavily-bearded; he was an unprincipled, bold, bad man, unscrupulous and dishonest, but I cried out, forgetting everything but the beautiful and good boy of long years before: "O Edgar! Edgar! I am so afraid I did not do my duty! I am so troubled about it! I tried to do what was right."

And the little boy, beloved and trusted, who had come up to this manhood, looked down pityingly, and with emotion, as he softly smoothed my hair, said, brokenly: "O Chatty! Chatty! I wish that all others had done for me what you did! They made me what I am! May the Lord bless you for what you did, my dear teacher!"

A complaining girl, one who was always growling and thinking hers a hard lot, married a widower with five little children, and before they were grown up, so as to be a help and a comfort to her, she had five of her own. She told me that, though hers was an average happy married life, there had not been a month since her marriage in which she had not wrung her hands and fervently wished for those days in which she was a free woman, unrestrained, unshackled, at liberty to come and go when she pleased, and with no binding responsibility fastening her like a fetter. The duties she owed her family were great, and no one could take the burden off from her. Then, she thought if she were again the schoolma'am, she would sing as she followed the winding road among the hills, instead of crying like a baby over fancied ills; she would run, and jump, and bound, instead of dragging along wearily; she would encourage the little ones, instead of finding fault; praise, instead of blame; cheer, instead of condemn; and fill their hearts with gladness, where once she filled them with gloom.

Under all circumstances, we should remember that God metes out to us the good that should bless us, and will, if we turn not away with complaining. Our lives are full of good cheer—radiant with a glory brighter than sunshine, if we will it. Blessings are about us, even though they may seem to come in the guise of sorrows.

Jennie was a braver girl when I left her that day. I think she was ashamed of herself, humiliated because she displayed such an unwomanly side of her character before the poor little widow, Chatty Brooks.

September 16.—Dear little Tудie! We all laughed so at the table to-night at a droll expression of hers. She is so innocent and so very original. I cannot quite remember how the subject came up for discussion, but we were speaking of Pluto, the Pluto who rules in the realm of darkness, and the dear child, not wishing to designate him by any ill name or rough cognomen, called him the factotum. Her pretty, soft, cautious way of speaking it was so funny. The child's chief charm lies in her marvellously tender, low voice.

Tudie was hugged, and kissed, and shaken, and tickled, and laughed at, until her dear little face was as red as a rose. She says everything as though she had thought it over and weighed it before speaking. Josephine and Elenor Lisle say there will never be any danger of our Tudie getting into scrapes because of talking too much, or talking about people unguardedly. We were saying, the other day, among ourselves, that people wouldn't talk much if they never talked about persons and things. Really it is surprising what a fund we find for conversation in the petty details of our homes, our lives, our breakfasts, dinners and suppers, our clothes, our neighbors, and our neighbors' own private affairs. Does Heaven begin on earth? Where does it begin? Where is the room for it, or the sign of its coming if it does begin in our own poor, wayward, misguided hearts and lives? We all have aspirations for a better, and higher, and purer life; sometimes we agonise in longing for that life that is above and beyond this poor, sin-stained strife of years. Let us hope. In the meantime let us watch ourselves and see whither drifts the tide of our daily thoughts and desires. Fold your hands and listen to the hum of conversation that is around you. One is saying: "There must have been at least twelve yards of lace on it, costing not less than four dollars a yard!" "And you say her husband bought that elegant little pony carriage for his wife! how he must love her," says another voice.

"She's after the young preacher, sure as you live, she is; you never saw her dress that way before, and wear such an elegant hat. Why the very plume cost over eleven dollars, and the velvet is of the finest quality of royal silk velvet, while that cluster of roses is the real French, never made in this country, so Miss Lee tells me."

"Yes, she can squeeze her feet into No. 2s, and she does it, but when she takes her gaiters off you could not tell her foot from a lump of raw flesh: proud! I think she is proud, too; any woman is more than proud who will suffer so for the nice looks of a small foot!"

"Oh, they had to sell out because they were broke up! They never would have gone west only that they were obliged to. Why the farm was mortgaged for years! He borrowed money when he was out on an electioneering campaign and some of that same borrowed money bought her grey silk dress and that rich fur-trimmed wrap which she wears so like a princess!"

"Pooh I don't care what she says, or her folks either! He mitted her—that was the way of it. He just got mortal tired of her and trumped up some excuse and left her. Her lovers all tire of her in six months' time."

"True enough! true enough! if he gets his just deserts he will land in the penitentiary. I have no doubt but he was knowing to the whole transaction. I would not trust him as far as I could throw a dog by the tail."

"Oh, I am so worried with servants, they are such an annoyance and trouble, not one of them even treats me respectfully!"

"First it's measles, then croup, then dysentery, then a burn, or a cut, or a broken limb—days and nights filled with trouble—dear-o-deary me! I can't see what it all means."

"No, if I can't have a black silk dress this fall, I'll not go to church all through the winter! Folks all begin to know me by my dress, an' the next thing I'll have some horrid nickname fastened on me!"

If there is a choice titbit of scandal, let us try and not be the first, or even the last, or any one, to help it along. The girls and I resolved this once, and we kept our good resolutions right bravely and womanly. It was amusing, too. I remember how we agreed to help each other in walking in the narrow path we had marked out. We said, "let us consider well when we are about to speak, and see if we are going to say anything that is silly, or foolish, or hurtful; anything that could possibly wrong, or belittle, or do even slight injustice to another; and if we are, do not let us speak at all. Let us not dwell upon the subject, the dear, all-engrossing subject of dress, any more than we are obliged to; let us not talk trimmings; and feathers, and frills, and furbelows only as little as possible. Nothing tends to dwarf a woman's mind more than this. And, above all, let us endeavor to keep all feelings of envy, and malice, and ill-will, and censorious fault-finding far away from us."

This was the way my girls and I tried to lay plans for helping each other; how well we succeed it may not be well for me to surmise, even, but I do know that we are very happy and our home-nest is like a dear, old bird's nest. We do have little annoyances creep in, but we meet them cheerfully and frankly, and think over our good resolutions, and bear all things kindly. It is not possible that a dozen girls could meet under one roof, girls differently brought up and coming from homes scattered here and there, who would all affiliate as one family.

Some of the girls have careless habits, and some a little untidy in their ways, but this will all be overcome, we trust, in time. One girl delights in wearing a loose wrapper all day. I have told her that she may wear it—provided she wears a collar—until all the morning's work is done up, and then she must change it for something a little more tidy in appearance. There is no article of a woman's apparel that has the charm for her and bewitchment that a loose wrapper has. It is so comfortable, a woman is so free and unrestrained in one, that without a watchful care she will go sailing about in it all day. It is the next thing to wearing wings.

GREAT wants develop great resources, but the little wants and worries are hardly provided for, and like the nail which strikes against the saw, they make not much of a mark, but they turn the edges terribly. I think if we looked upon all little worries of one day as a great united worry, self-control to meet it would be developed.

GRAZIELLA.

(See Engraving.)

ONE of the most charming, and at the same time one of the saddest stories to be found in modern literature is that of Graziella, an episode in Lamartine's Autobiography. It is a story that stands side by side with "Paul and Virginia" and "Picciola" in its truthfulness, its simplicity and its poetry; and will, undoubtedly, last as long as they.

Lamartine tells us how he, a youth of eighteen, goes to Naples for a holiday, and there having taken a fancy to the simple habits of the Neapolitan fishermen, he becomes domesticated in the family of one of them. This family consists of an aged couple, Andrea and his wife, with their granddaughter Graziella, and three younger grandchildren. The story is of the growth of an absorbing passion in the breast of the young girl, and of a fleeting fancy on the part of the youth Lamartine, which ends with him as a half-pleasing, half-sad memory; with her in a broken heart and death.

These simple, uneducated people saw the young man spending much time over his books, and they begged to know what they contained that they should be so attractive. So he read to them passages from Foscolo and from Tacitus, but they remained undisturbed.

"'Why trouble one's self thus,' they would say, 'with ideas which do not even penetrate the heart? Of what consequence is it whether the Austrians or the French reign at Milan? It is foolish to burden one's self with grief with such things.' And they listened no longer."

So the young man tried them with "Paul and Virginia." "It was I who translated it whilst reading, because I was so habituated to reading it that I knew it, so to say, by heart. Familiarized, by a long sojourn in Italy, with the language, I was not at a loss to command interpreting expressions, which flowed from my lips like my mother tongue. Scarcely had this reading commenced, than the faces of my little auditory changed and assumed an expression of attention and contemplation, sure evidences of the emotion of the heart. I had struck the note which vibrates in unison in the souls of all men, of all ages, and of all conditions, the sensitive and universal note, that which contains in one sound alone the eternal truth of art: NATURE, the love of God."

"I had read only a few pages, and already the old people, the young girl, the child, had all changed their postures and expressions. The fisherman, with elbow on knee, and ear inclined toward me, forbore to puff the smoke of his pipe. The old grandmother, seated opposite to me, held her two clasped hands under her chin, in the attitude of the poor women who hear the word of God squatted down upon the pavement of the holy temples. Beppo had descended from the parapet of the terrace on which he was just now seated. He had placed, without noise, his guitar upon the floor, and pressed his hand flat over its neck, for fear that the wind might cause the strings to resound. Graziella, who generally kept herself rather aloof, insensibly drew near me, as if she had been fascinated by an occult power of attraction secreted in the book. She regarded, with her magnificent eyes wide open, at times the book, at times my lips, whence the narrative issued, at times the space between my lips and the book, as if she was seeking there with her scrutiny the invisible spirit which was interpreting it to me. Before I had reached the middle of the history, the poor child had forgotten her reserve. I felt the warmth of her breathing upon my hands. Her hair fluttered over my brow. Two or three scalding tears, fallen from her cheeks, bedewed the pages near my fingers."

We have quoted enough to show how vivid is the author's description of the scene. The engraving, to which we refer our readers, catches the exact spirit of this description, so that the beholder exclaims "Graziella!" before he reads its title. This engraving is a copy of a painting by Rudolf Lehmann, who went to Capri and Prociola (upon which latter island was the home of the fisherman,) in order that he might be exact in his rendering of the bay and distant islands and coast. This painting, which was completed in 1854, was seen by Lamartine, who wrote the artist a most complimentary and gratifying letter. This letter concluded with a strongly-expressed desire to purchase the picture, but as it was already the property of Mr. Oppenheim, he was denied not only the original painting, but even the privilege of having a sketch made from it.

THE EXTRA BLANKET.

THE weather had changed suddenly in the night, and Mrs. Buel awoke almost in a chill. It did not take many minutes for the thrifty house-mother to go to her well-stocked storeroom and take down a warm, soft comfortable to spread over her bed. And then an additional thick blanket must be laid over each of the children's beds.

"How warm and comfortable it is," she thought, as she drew the covers about her again. "How I hope George has covering enough this chilly night. But if he has not, he can spread his thick travelling shawl over his bed." So, having settled the question of bed-clothing for all her household, present or absent, she would naturally have dropped off to sleep again. But she did not. The plashing of the chill November rain on the windows kept her awake, for she thought of the many poor mothers who could not go that night to such a well-filled storeroom and take down extra blankets for all their household. She thought how many were shivering with the cold that night while such piles of quilts and blankets were on her shelves, which never came out except to be aired occasionally. Was not that akin to hiding one's talent in a napkin? Would not God call her to an account for these unused blankets.

The more she thought it over the more certain she became that she could well spare the package of old-fashioned quilts which had fallen to her share when Aunt Deborah's goods were portioned out. She knew plenty of homes where they would be most welcome. She only wished she had a still larger stock to dispose of.

"Poor Esther Dane, I am sure the winter will pinch there, and she is so little used to privation. What a comfort that pair of crimson blankets would be to her poor rheumatic limbs. I chided George for bringing them home, but he said they were going so cheap he could not help it. I really think I shall send them over to Esther in the morning."

With this warming resolution for her heart, Mrs. Buel felt thoroughly comfortable, and very soon fell asleep.

Her good resolutions did not vanish with the night shadows. She rather added to them, and took a thorough inventory of her stock, both good and bad. Various quilts and blankets which had been stored in the garret as no longer of service, but too good to be thrown away, were brought down, and well repaired. She was thoroughly in earnest and enlisted her two daughters in the good work.

It was surprising how much the three pair of hands accomplished during the next three days, but more than one widow's heart was made to sing for joy as the result of that wakeful hour.

There are many who complain of sleepless hours which they find so long and dreary. Try to improve them by planning some good for others not so favored, and you will be soon able to rejoice in the loving favor of Him who "giveth songs in the night."

A LETTER.

DEAR EDITOR: I hope it is not yet too late to wish you a happy New Year. May it bring you peace and prosperity, and be blessed in all respects. May you be able to send the HOME, month by month, into the thousands of waiting households which hail its coming with gladness.

The first number for the new year comes to us rich in good things, bringing comfort and strength, and goodly words of blessing and cheer to all. We welcome "Deborah Norman" with her pure, refining influence, and hope her "reward" may be great even as her work. Accept many thanks for the beautiful picture. It surpasses our expectations, and is alone worth the price of the magazine. We have a wee, winsome darling in our home, and I, too, am often an "Interrupted Reader." The sweet babies! May the dear Father make us worthy of them, and teach us how to guide them to noble manhood and womanhood.

I want to tell "Pipsey" how we made beef-tea for mother when she was sick. May I? We took lean, juicy pieces of beef, cut fine, put it into a wide-necked bottle, corked tightly, put the bottle in water, and let it boil an hour, drained the liquor out, added a little salt, and our beef-tea was made. We put no water in the bottle, so the tea was just the pure juice of the beef, and more nourishing than if water had been added.

A cornstarch pudding is made much better by stirring in rich fruit of some kind. We use canned plums, and make the sauce for it of sweetened cream and the juice of the plums. It is delicious.

We wanted some molasses candy on Christmas, so I took a cup of molasses, a cup of sugar, half a cup of butter, and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, boiled all together until very thick, turned it into a buttered tin, and when it was cool cut it in squares. It was good, and needed no pulling. Try it.

"Pipsey," we are glad to see you back in your old place in the HOME, and hope we may long meet you there. A good and happy New Year to you, and to little LICHEN, CHATTY BROOKS and all the rest. We love you all, and count you as dear, real friends.

REMEMBER THE POOR.

BY E. MILLER CONKLIN.

WHEN gathered round the evening fire
With books, and work, and pleasant talk,

You trim the lamp to burn the higher;
Then think of those who homeless walk!
Who, passing, glance within and see
The happy fireside's calm delight;
Then, stung with keener misery,
Pass shivering on amid the night!

Around the room the children play,
The music sounds from fingers fair;
The burden of the toilsome day
The father's hands no longer bear.
But there are those with aching hands,
And freezing feet, and breaking hearts,
For whom no mother watching stands
To warm and cheer with loving arts.

And when the white-robed children kneel
To murmur each its evening prayer;
And mothers from the fireside steal
To smooth each couch with tender care;
Then think of those who crouch to-night,
Uncheered by food, or couch, or fire;
And, longing, wait for morning light,
In sleepless pain, and anguish dire.

If thou hast done thine utmost part
To help, to save, to comfort these;
Enjoy thine own with thankful heart,
As one who still the Giver sees!
But hast thou shut thine eyes to need,
Thy heart to those who asked of thee,
Nor given help by word and deed,
Christ says, "Ye did it unto Me!"

OUR enemy to gratify his ill-will toward us, acquaints himself with the infirmities both of our bodies and minds, sticks to our faults, makes his invidious remarks upon them, and spreads them abroad by his uncharitable and ill-natured reports. Hence we are taught this useful lesson for the direction and management of our conversation in the world, viz., that we be circumspect and wary in everything we speak or do, as if our enemy always stood at our elbow, and overlooked our actions.

Hatboro' was formerly called the "Crooked Billet," or shortened into simply "The Billet." Tradition informs us that it was so named from one of the old inns, having for its sign a crooked billet, or stick of wood.

CROOKED BILLET POLKA.

The musical score for "Crooked Billet Polka" is presented in a standard piano format. It begins with a 2/4 time signature. The first system consists of two staves: the upper staff contains a melody with eighth and sixteenth notes, while the lower staff provides a harmonic accompaniment with chords and eighth notes. The second system continues this pattern. The third system introduces a key signature change to one sharp (F#) and includes a forte (f) dynamic marking. The fourth system concludes with a "Fine." marking. The fifth system is the beginning of the "TRIO." section, marked with a key signature change to one flat (Bb) and a Dolce (softly) dynamic. This section features more complex melodic lines with triplets and grace notes. The final system of the score is marked "D. C." (Da Capo), indicating a repeat of the previous section.

SLEEP.

"So He giveth His beloved sleep."—Psalm cxxvii. 2.

HE sees when their footsteps falter, when their hearts grow weak and faint,
He marks when their strength is falling, and listens to each complaint!
He bids them rest for a season, for the pathway has grown too steep;
And, folded in fair green pastures, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

Like weary and worn-out children that sigh for the daylight's close,
He knows that they oft are longing for home and its sweet repose;
So He calls them in from their labors ere the shadows 'round them fall,
And silently watching o'er them, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

He giveth it, oh, so gently! as a mother will hush to rest
The babe that she softly pillows so tenderly on her breast;
Forgotten are now the trials and sorrows that made them weep,
For, with many a soothing promise, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

He giveth it! friends the dearest can never this boon bestow;
But He touches the drooping eyelids, and placid the features grow;
Their foes may gather about them, and storms may round them sweep,
But, guarding them safe from danger, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

All dread of the distant future, all fears that oppress to-day,
Like mists, that clear in the sunlight, have noiselessly passed away;
Nor call nor clamor can rouse them from slumbers so pure and deep,
For only His voice can reach them who giveth His loved ones sleep.

Weep not that their toils are over, weep not that their race is run;
God grant we may rest as calmly when our work, as theirs, is done!
Till then we will yield with gladness our treasures to Him to keep,
And rejoice in the sweet assurance He giveth His loved ones sleep.

CHILD-SONGS.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

STILL linger in our noon of time,
And on our Saxon tongue,
The echoes of the home-born hymns
The Aryan mothers sung.

And childhood had its litanies
In every age and clime;
The earliest cradles of the race
Were rocked to poets' rhyme.

Nor sky, nor wave, nor tree, nor flower,
Nor green earth's virgin sod,
So moved the singer's heart of old
As these small ones of God.

The mystery of unfolding life
Was more than dawning morn,
Than opening flower or crescent moon
The human soul new-born!

And still to childhood's sweet appeal
The heart of genius turns,
And more than all the ages teach
From lisping voices learns—

The voices loved of him who sang,
Where Tweed and Teviot glide,
That sound to-day on all the winds
That blow from Rydal side,—

Heard in the Teuton's household songs,
And folk-love of the Finn,
Where'er to holy Christmas hearths
The Christ-child enters in!

Before life's sweetest mystery still
The heart in reverence kneels;
The wonder of the primal birth
The latest mother feels.

We need love's tender lessons taught
As only weakness can;
God bath His small interpreters;
The child must teach the man.

We wander wide through evil years,
Our eyes of faith grow dim;
But he is freshest from His hands,
And nearest unto Him.

And haply, pleading long with Him
For sin-sick hearts and cold,
The angels of our childhood still
The Father's face behold.

Of such the kingdom! Teach Thou us,
O Master most divine,
To feel the deep significance
Of these wise words of Thine.

The haughty eye shall seek in vain
What innocence beholds;
No cunning finds the key of Heaven,
No strength its gate unfolds.

Alone to guilelessness and love
That gate shall open fall;
The mind of pride is nothingness,
The child-like heart is all.

HEART-HUNGER.

BY FANNY FALES.

IF you love me, darling,
Break the icy spell;
'Neath the heart's chill surface
Limpid waters well.

Oh, my heart is hungry
For the spoken word;—
We are paid in music
If we pet a bird.

Roses give their sweetness
For our tender care;
Would you be less gracious,
Dearest one, as fair?

More than bird or blossom
Is to me mine own;
Fill my life with music
Ere the day is flown.

Not enough that duty
Every hour is done;
Lest I die of hunger,
Feed me, little one!

Do as does the sun, dear,
To the waves, I wls;
Till they glow and sparkle,
Love me with a kiss.

Clasp my neck, and lay your Soft cheek close to mine,
At the touch life's waters
Would be turned to wine.

WAIT.

LAST night I tried, quite wearied out,
The question that perplexes still,
And the sad spirit we call doubt
Made the good naught beside the ill.

This morning, when, with rested mind,
I tried again the self-same theme
The whole is altered, and I find
The balance turned; the good supreme.

ANGEL VISITS.

THEY do not always visit us in beautiful garments, making the air around golden with their sunny smiles. Oftener they come disguised in sober-hued vestments, lips grief-curved and eyes heavy, as with weeping. But come to us when and how they will, it is ever in love. Daily they are about our paths, though we perceive them not with our dull bodily senses; nor even recognize their presence by the finer instincts of our spirits—for "of the earth earthy" as we are, and with affections clinging to the earth, we have neither eyes nor ears for the inner sight and inner voices that are for the pure in heart. Yes, they are about our daily paths, smoothing and making them flowery when they may; but oftener piling up obstructions and making them rough and thorny.

"Rough and thorny! Piling up obstructions!" we hear from the lips of some life-weary sufferer. "Is this a work for angels?"

Beautiful the way seemed before you, in the bright morning of early womanhood, heart-sick and life-weary one; and as your eyes went far onward, how many lovely vistas opened, showing blessed arcadias in the smiling distance! To gain them you felt was to gain Heaven; and onward you pressed with eager footsteps. You did not gain them! For a while the path was even, and the fragrance of a hundred blossoms delighted your senses. But all at once your feet were wounded—there were sharp obstructions in the way; then thick clouds and darkness were before you, hiding the lovely Eden. Still, you sought to pass onward, though the way was rough, and the sunny vistas, opening to the land of promise, hidden from your straining vision. Then a mountain arose suddenly, whose rocky steep you could not climb. Despair was in your heart; and in the bitterness of your disappointment you called yourself one mocked of God.

It was not so, precious immortal! Not so, pilgrim to a better land than the arcadia of your maiden dreams! At the very foot of that inaccessible mountain, a narrow path at length became visible; and though it looked rough and had no green margin, beautiful with flowers, there was an emotion of thankfulness in your heart for even this way of escape; for, already a mortal dread had seized upon your spirits. With hurrying footsteps you entered this new way, and the hope that it would quickly lead around the mountain, and bring the sunny land again in view, repressed the fear that else had been paralyzing.

It was the hand of an angel which led you into that new way, and kept your heart from fainting. Narrow, rough and flowerless though it proved, it was a better way than that along which you were passing with such buoyant steps—for it bent heavenward. And think, life-weary one! do you not feel that you are nearer Heaven now than when the sun of this world shone from an unclouded sky above the path of pleasure and prosperity? Think, and answer to yourself the question.

A heart-stricken mother sat grieving for the loss of her youngest born, the sweetest and loveliest of her precious flock—grieving and refusing to be comforted. There had been loving sympathy, gentle remonstrances and pious teaching from the lips of the minister who had a year before touched the forehead of her babe with the waters of baptism; but all availed not—the fountain of tears stayed not its waters, nor was the murmuring voice hushed in her rebellious spirit. At length one came to her who had known a like sorrow, and whose heart had, even like hers, been bowed into the very dust. She took into her own soft hand the passive hand of the mourner, which gave not back a sign. A little while she held it, clasping her fingers in a gentle pressure; then in a voice whose tender modulations went vibrating to the inmost of her spirit, she said: "You had an angel visit last night."

An angel visit! What did the words signify?

"Only a year has passed since I had a like visit," continued the friend. "I did not recognize the heavenly messenger when she came, for my eyes were too full of tears to see her radiant form. She came and went, bearing on her bosom as she passed upward to the regions of eternal sunshine, the spirit of my lovely boy!"

The hand of the mourner answered to the light pressure of that in which it lay.

"That night," went on the comforter, "I saw in a dream—I call it a dream, but regard it as a revelation—my translated one among the blessed in the upper kingdom of our Father. He was in the arms of the angel-mother, whose love for him it was plain to see was wise and tender, surpassing all my own deep affection, as far as the unselfish love of an angel surpasses a weak and erring creature of earth.

"Grieve no more!" said the heavenly being, as she came to me. 'I have not taken this innocent one from you in anger or cruelty, but in love—love for both the mother and child. As for him, he is safe in his celestial home forever, and is and will be blessed far above anything you could ask—for it hath not entered into the heart of even a mother to conceive what transcendent delights are in store for those who are born into Heaven. Is it not therefore better for your child? Were I to say, take him again into the cold, dark world of sorrow, sin and suffering, would you bear him back? No, grieving mother, no! You love this precious one too well. But how is it better for you to lose the child in whom your heart was so bound up? I see the question on your lips. That is always best which lifts the spirit nearest to God—is it not so? Think! Not with a heavenly, but with an earthly and selfish affection, did you love your child—such an affection could not truly bless either you or your babe. It is now in Heaven, and as your heart follows it there, it will come into heavenly associations, and thus be filled with aspirations for that higher life which descends from and bears back its recipient into Heaven. Grieving one, I came to you in mercy; and though tears have followed my visit, they are falling on good seeds planted in your heart.'

"Thus spoke to me that angel-mother of my child, and ever since her words have been my stay and comfort. Such an angel came to you last night, grieving friend. The visit was in love, not in anger. Then lift your eyes upward, and no longer permit them to rest on the cold earth-form and the gloomy grave. The spirit of your child has already arisen more beautiful in form, and is with the angels appointed for its guardianship. The wiser love of our good Father has removed it. Be thankful, then, dear friend. Oh, be thankful—but weep not!"

And the heart, which no words of consolation had been able to reach, felt itself swelling with a deep emotion, and lifting itself upward toward the All-Merciful.

"I will believe that it was an angel who came here last night and bore away my child," she whispered, as with shut eyes, fringed by tear-gemmed lashes, she bowed her head upon the bosom of her consoler. "Oh, if anything can soothe the anguish of this bereavement, it is to think that my precious babe, for whom I have cared so tenderly, passed from my arms to those of an angel, and that he was thus borne safely across the dark valley into which I looked down with such a heart-shudder. I bless you for speaking such words of consolation."

Not alone in misfortune or bereavement do angels visit us. They do not always make the way rough, nor always darken the earth-fires around which we gather. Daily they come to us; hourly they seek to draw nearer and quicken our better impulses. A thousand evils—soul-destroying evils—are warded off by them, even though we are unconscious of their presence, and, it may be, resist the very influences by which such priceless benefits are conferred.

"Ah! if we could but open our eyes and see; if the scales that obstruct our inner vision could be removed, if we could know our celestial visitors when they come!"

We may know them; and we may perceive their presence. Whether we are in prosperity or adversity, in joy or in sorrow, angel-visitors are with us whenever the thought goes upward and the heart yearns for a better life. Their mission to the sons of men is to draw them heavenward; and if sorrow, affliction or adversity is needed for the accomplishment of this great end, they are made subservient in the good work. But when, in their high mission, they bow a thirsty soul to the bitter waters of Marah, their hands hold not back the healing leaves, and a song of rejoicing is soon heard instead of lamentation. Happy is that spirit to which the angels come not on their errands of mercy in vain.

KIT'S BRONZE BOOTS.

BY G. DE B.

THEY came home one Friday night. Kit thought there never was anything quite so perfectly beautiful. She was sure none of the other girls had any boots like them. To be sure, Fanny Raynor told her, her new ones were to be done for Saturday, too; but then they were only pebbled morocco! And these—almost golden in their pretty new sheen, and the buttons matched, and tassels at the top, and such cunning little heels! Oh, there wasn't a prouder little girl anywhere in the world than Kitty Kessler that Friday night when her bronze boots came home!

Now, if it would only be pleasant to-morrow, so as she might wear them down to the library. Her little playmates made it a point to all meet there every week; and as most other girls' playmates did, too, the library on Saturday afternoon had become quite a fashionable reception-saloon, where school-girls came to pick out their new books—and talk over each other's new clothes at the same time.

"Oh, dear! there's a circle round the moon; and that means rain, don't it, mamma?" cried Kit, as she put aside the curtains to look out at the weather that night before going to bed.

"I hope so," answered mamma, hanging up Kitty's dress, and putting away the new boots in the closet.

"Why, Mamma Kessler! And I've just got my bronze boots—and water spots them!"

"Oh, I wasn't thinking of your boots, dear, when I spoke, but of the tiny seeds in the ground, and the tender leaves on the trees, and the fresh, new grass, that all need rain."

"Oh, they can wait very well, I guess," pettishly replied Kit, as she pulled down the shade.

"So can your bronze boots, Kitty. Don't be a selfish little girl—always thinking of what only concerns your pleasure most; and, besides, whatever the weather turns out to-morrow, it ought to be just the kind to please you."

"Why? How? What do you mean, mamma?" and Kit's blue eyes opened very wide.

"When you go to the library to-morrow, get Hannah Moore's Tales, and read 'The Shepherd of the Salisbury Plain,' and you will understand what I mean."

"But, mamma, I want to know now. Why ought it to be just the kind of weather to please me, when, if it rains, it won't at all?" and Kit pouted out her pretty red lips.

"Because, Kitty, it will be the kind of weather that pleases God best; and His will should be our pleasure always. Come, say your prayers now; and pray for an unselfish, contented spirit, as well as for fair weather." And mamma kissed Kitty good-night, with the first half of the prayer offered up in her own heart for her little girl.

"Partly cloudy and clearing weather," read Kit the next day from the morning paper. "I can wear my boots, mamma. Old Prob. says 'clearing.'"

"He isn't infallible, however, Kit," said papa, over his coffee. "I should say it would rain hard toward evening." And papa went on with his breakfast, not noticing the decidedly "cloudy" expression on Kit's face at his words.

"You'd better wear your morocco boots, Kit. It will be safest; and they look nice," said mamma, as Kit went up-stairs to be dressed after dinner.

"Oh, no, no, mamma! I am sure it will be pleasant. See, the little edges of the clouds are growing brighter, and the sun is almost out now!"

"Well, Kitty, I will let you do as you please about it; only remember, you know water-spots will ruin the beauty of your bronze boots, and I cannot afford to buy you another pair this summer. If you spoil these, you will have to wear them so."

Kitty "pleased" to wear her bronze boots, of course. And she looked very nice, indeed, when all dressed in her little gray and white striped silk suit, the ruffles bound with Nile green, her white chip hat trimmed with the same color, her little white parasol lined with rose, and her pretty new bronze boots on.

"Will I do, mamma?" she asked, making a little, dancing-school courtesey when she was all ready to start.

"Yes, my dear, you look very nice, and neat, and clean. Don't stay out later than five o'clock. Here is fifteen cents for some ice cream and cake, and be careful not to spill any on your dress."

Kitty kissed her mamma, promised to obey all her injunctions, and ran gayly down the steps, very proud and happy in her pretty new spring outfit.

She peeped through the glass doors of the library to see if the girls were there before her. Yes, there they all were—Fanny Raynor, Cissy Hastings, Addie Tufts and Gertie Graham—and none of them had on bronze boots! Kit walked in very proudly now. The girls rushed up to her to see what book she had, and show her theirs, and talk over those they had read and liked, and those they had "skipped" through and didn't. Kitty looked through their books, and over their spring suits, and discovered Fanny Raynor actually had kid gloves on! She felt a little quail of envy now. Why hadn't she asked papa for kid gloves, too! He would have bought them for her just as well.

"Oh, dear," she cried, "I am so warm and tired! Let's go into the ladies' room, girls, and rest."

They all fluttered after Kit, who usually led the way. Kit sat down on the sofa and crossed her little feet, very conspicuously showing her beloved boots. Then Fanny Raynor buttoned and unbuttoned her kid gloves, making a pretence of fixing the elastic of her hat. The others looked on.

While they sat there, chattering and laughing, and talking over where they should go for ice cream, wondering which place gave the most for ten cents, they were suddenly hushed by the sound of thunder, and presently great heavy drops of rain dashed down the window-panes. Poor Kit, she looked up at the rain and down at her boots!

"What shall I do, girls? They'll be ruined!" she asked, in an awful whisper.

"If you only could put them in your pocket now," said Fanny Raynor, rolling up her kid gloves, and putting them safely away in hers as she spoke.

"Or if they were pebbled morocco," continued Cissy Hastings.

"Or lasting, with kid toes," went on Gertie Graham.

"But they ain't," cried Kit, her eyes full of tears. "They're my beautiful new bronze boots, and they will spot, and be spoiled forever. Oh, dear!"

"Why, Kit, see here," said Fanny. "Take the car at the door; it goes within a few doors of your house; and, anyhow, maybe the rain will stop by the time you reach Spruce Street; it has slackened now."

A brilliant thought! They all followed Kit to the door, watched the car stop, and just between the shower Kit tiptoed over the pavement and got on the car without a drop falling on her boots.

Walnut, Locust, Pine, and the rain began to pour down again. At Spruce Street the crossing was a mighty flood. Kit looked out of the window, and shook her head "no" when the conductor asked her if she would get off.

"You'll have to ride round, then," said he; "up Eleventh, down Tenth again."

"Will I?" answered Kit. "Very well, then," with a look at her boots.

Up Eleventh and down Tenth, and it began to grow dark, and the people who crowded in the car wondered what that gayly-dressed little girl in the corner was doing out in the storm. Almost to Spruce Street again, and Kitty was puzzling her tired little brain over what she should do now. She had ridden out all of her fifteen cents, and the rain was pouring down still.

Presently the gentleman who sat opposite Kit was attracted toward her by a peculiar little movement on the part of the quiet little girl in the corner he had noticed in the car so long. She was stooping down, fixing something or other about her shoes, and her face looked very hot and flushed. She motioned the conductor to stop at Spruce Street. When the bell rang, she jumped up quick, and two little white-stockinged feet tripped out of the car.

"There's a real girl caper for you," said the conductor as she got off. "Any boy in the world would have waded through the puddles in satin boots!"

Kit ran home faster than she ever ran in her life. It was dark, and the rainy street was cold. It was a sorry, muddy, little bunched figure that stood on the step when the door opened.

"Why, Kitty Kessler," cried her mamma, "you're barefooted! Where are your shoes?"

"Here, mamma; they ain't ruined after all, for I took them off in the car and scampered," and Kit drew out from underneath her overskirt two bronze boots and a white parasol.

Kit caught a bad cold; but that was all. Her mamma couldn't scold her. Her papa laughed heartily over Kit's "masterly retreat," and bought her a pair of kid gloves just like Fanny Raynor's the next day. They were very pretty ones, and Kit was mightily pleased over them; but of all the things she ever had, there was never anything quite so dear to her as her beloved bronze boots!

DON'T KISS THE BABY.

UNDER this title the Scientific American gives a strongly-uttered note of warning against the almost universal practice of kissing babies; a practice that needs a large abatement. The note may be a little too harsh and startling for the ears of some, but it will do no harm to let its sound be repeated in the HOME MAGAZINE.

"The promiscuous kissing of children is a pestilent practice. We use the word advisedly, and it is mild for the occasion. Murderous would be the proper word, did the kissers know the mischief they do. Yes, madam, murderous; and we are speaking to you. Do you remember calling on your dear friend Mrs. Brown the other day, with a strip of flannel around your neck? And when little Flora came dancing into the room, didn't you pounce upon her demonstratively, call her a precious little pet, and kiss her? Then you serenely proceeded to describe the dreadful sore throat that kept you from prayer-meeting the night before. You had no designs on the dear child's life, we know; nevertheless you killed her! Killed her as surely as if you had fed her with strychnine or arsenic. Your caresses were fatal.

"Two or three days after, the little pet began to complain of a sore throat, too. The symptoms grew rapidly alarming; and when the doctor came, the single word "diphtheria" sufficed to explain them all. To-day a little mound in Greenwood the sole memento of your visit.

"Of course, the mother does not suspect and would not dare to suspect you of any instrumentality in her bereavement. She charges it to a mysterious Providence. The doctor says nothing to disturb the delusion; that would be impolite, if not cruel; but to an outsider he is free to say that the child's death was due directly to your infernal stupidity. Those are precisely his words; more forcible than elegant, it is true; but who shall say, under the circumstances, that they are not justifiable? Remember

"'Evil is wrought by want of thought
As well as by want of heart.'

"It would be hard to tell how much of the prevalent sickness and mortality from diphtheria is due to such want of thought. As a rule, adults have the disease in so mild a form that they mistake it for a simple cold; and as a cold is not contagious, they think nothing of exposing others to their breath or to the greater danger of labial contact. Taking into consideration the well-established fact that diphtheria is usually if not always communicated by the direct transplanting of the malignant vegetation which causes the disease, the fact that there can be no more certain means of bringing the contagion to its favorite soil than the act of kissing, and the further fact that the custom of kissing children on all occasions is all but universal, it is not surprising that, when the disease is once imported into a community, it is very likely to become epidemic.

"It would be absurd to charge the spread of diphtheria entirely to the practice of child-kissing. There are other modes of propagation, though it is hard to conceive of any more directly suited to the spread of the infection or more general in its operation. It stands to diphtheria about the same relation that promiscuous hand-shaking formerly did to the itch.

"It were better to avoid the practice. The children will not suffer if they go unvisited; and their friends ought, for their sake, to forego the luxury for a season. A single kiss has been known to infect a family; and the most careful may be in condition to communicate the disease without knowing it. Beware, then, of playing Judas, and let the babies alone."

COOKING FOR INVALIDS.

LET all the kitchen utensils used in the preparation of invalids' cookery be delicately and scrupulously clean; if this is not the case, a disagreeable flavor may be imparted to the preparation, which flavor may disgust, and prevent the patient from partaking of the refreshment when brought to him or her.

For invalids, never make a large quantity of one thing, as they seldom require much at a time; and it is desirable that variety be provided for them.

Always have something in readiness; a little beef tea, nicely made and nicely skimmed, a few spoonfuls of jelly, etc., etc., that it may be administered as soon almost as the invalid wishes for it. If obliged to wait a long time, the patient loses the desire to eat, and often turns against the food when brought to him or her.

In sending dishes or preparations up to invalids, let everything look as tempting as possible. Have a clean tray cloth laid smoothly over the tray; let the spoons, tumblers, cups and saucers, etc., be very clean and bright. Gruel served in a tumbler is more appetizing than when served in a basin or cup and saucer.

If the patient be allowed to eat vegetables, never send them up undercooked, or half raw; and let a small quantity only be temptingly arranged on a dish. This rule will apply to every preparation, as an invalid is much more likely to enjoy his food if small delicate pieces are served to him.

A mutton chop, nicely cut, trimmed and broiled to a turn, is a dish to be recommended for invalids; but it must not be served with all the fat at the end, nor must it be too thickly cut. Let it be cooked over a fire free from smoke, and sent up with the gravy in it, between two very hot plates. Nothing is more disagreeable to an invalid than smoked food.

RECIPES.

SHEEP'S TONGUES IN SAVORY JELLY.—Skin the tongues, lard them, and cook them, until they are quite tender, in good veal broth, or any white stock. Take out the tongues, boil down the liquor to a stiff, clear jelly, and pour enough of it over them to cover them. To be eaten cold.

TO CLARIFY DRIPPING.—Put the dripping into a basin; pour over it boiling water, in which a teaspoonful of salt has been dissolved, and keep stirring the whole to wash away the impurities. Let it stand to cool, when the water and dirty sediment will settle at the bottom. Repeat this operation at least twice with fresh water. When cold, remove the dripping from the water, and melt it into jars.

RABBIT CUTLETS.—Prepare the rabbits as you would for a stew; cut the different limbs into the size of cutlets—such as the shoulders cut in half, also the legs, with the ends of the bones chopped off, and pieces of the back, even to the half of the head. Have ready some bread-crumbs and the yolk of an egg beaten up. Drop each cutlet into the egg and then cover it with bread-crumbs, as for veal cutlets. Fry them a nice brown, and when you dish them pour round them some rich brown gravy, which may be flavored with tomato sauce if approved, and put round them rolls of fried bacon.

LEMON PUFFS.—One quart of milk, the yolks of six eggs, two cups of white sugar, two tablespoonfuls of flour, three lemons. Beat the eggs, sugar and flour together well; beat the eggs first, then add the lemon juice; have your dish lined with paste; do not add the milk until you are ready to put it into the oven. Beat up the whites, add fine white sugar, a large teaspoonful, and beat very light; flavor to taste. When the custard is done spread the icing over it, set it back in the oven and let it brown nicely. Eat as soon as cold.

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

IT is impossible yet to predict what the spring fashions will be. As Easter comes early this year, it is possible that before the close of the month we may get glimpses of new styles. But, for the most part, March is a bolsterous month, and the winter costumes and even furs are retained.

The Metropolitan, a new fashion paper, published in New York by Butterick & Co., tells us that the mask veil, the style that is wrapped about the face before the hat is put on, is not as popular as it has been. The close veil is now laid over the centre of the front edge of the hat rim, and then drawn back close to the ears and fastened under the hat behind. A fancy pin, or tied ends that float, hold it in position. This arrangement is for walking, riding or skating; but for evening wear, white illusion or Brussels net is more than ever in favor. A yard-wide lace, that is three yards long, is the favorite. It is thrown over the hat near one end, and then tied in one knot under the chin; the long end is passed about the neck, brought forward of the left shoulder and fastened under a bouquet of natural flowers, provided fresh flowers are not too dear. Black thread net, with open dots, is worn for church and visiting, and is arranged like the great crape walking veil. The favorite travelling veil is a square of peacock blue or peacock green silk tissue, which is pinned over the entire hat or bonnet, with the point in front drawn down far enough to preserve the neck-tie from being soiled with car-dust. These colors are pleasant to the eyes, and wear a long time without looking rusty.

The latest style in infants' cloaks is to line them with cigar-brown silk, matelassé or flannel, instead of pink or blue as heretofore. This color does not show use so soon as the more delicate tints. For a very young baby the double circular is the most popular garment. It has a silk-lined hood, and the edges of the upper circular may be bordered with a white and brown woollen chenille fringe which has a twisted heading of the wool; or it may be finished without decorations, save a floating loop, and ends of brown ribbon at the back.

In gentlemen's shirts the shield-shaped bosom has been found so convenient that it is more in use than in any other. The plaits upon the fronts of bosoms are not so wide as formerly. Many shirts are exhibited with narrow stripes of various colors upon the edges of the centre plaits, and around the edges of the collar and cuffs; others have stripes running upon the edge of all the plaits.

The "Garriek" collar, which is the latest style presented, is decidedly genteel in appearance, and is becoming to most persons. While these stand-up collars are evidently the most stylish at present, the turn-down forms are yet in vogue, and are worn nearly as much as ever, many gentlemen preferring them. In these designs the "Richelleu" and "Cambridge" collars take the lead.

The Apocalypse Revealed; wherein are disclosed the Arcana there foretold, which have hitherto remained concealed. From the Latin of Emanuel Swedenborg. Two vols. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. Thoughtful and observant people have not failed to notice a widespread and steadily-increasing dissatisfaction, among a large class of intelligent and good men, with some of the doctrinal interpretations of Scripture that were formulated into creeds and confessions of faith in the darker days of the past centuries; a dissatisfaction that does not arise from any moral defection, nor from any pride of free thinking; but which is based upon an honest desire for the truth. This is not confined to laymen, nor to non-church-going people, but prevails widely among clergymen of all denominations, sometimes manifesting itself in sharp conflicts, disturbances and unhappy alienations.

As the years go by, this state of things shows a steady increase, and the antagonism between independent seekers after truth and the adherents of old forms of doctrine and what is called church authority, grows stronger and stronger. Men want to know for themselves, and in the light of Scripture and their individual reason, whether a thing be true or not. They wish to believe for themselves, and not be bound, under pain of God's displeasure, to the faith of another. They do not want authority, but truth, that they may be able to give to their own hearts, as well as to another, a reason for the hope that is in them.

It is now over a hundred years since the work named at the head of this article first made its appearance. Besides this, the distinguished author, one of the most learned men of his time, wrote and published voluminously; first in the departments of science and philosophy, and afterward exclusively on theological subjects.

Immediately after the issue of his theological works, originally in the Latin, they were translated into the English language, and ever since that time have been printed and published, their circulation showing a steady increase, and their doctrines finding a larger acceptance from year to year. Of late, the circulation of the writings of Swedenborg has been greatly extended, and those who are acquainted with their peculiar teachings, recognize their influence upon the religious thought of the day, and see in the disturbance of old dogmas to which we have referred, and the demand for a faith to which reason can give its fullest assent, evidences of the work they have already done, and the larger and more important work they are destined to achieve.

A most remarkable fact in regard to the interest which has been awakened, of late, in the writings of Swedenborg, was given, a few months since, in one of the daily papers of our city, The Evening Telegraph. We copy a portion of the article. It says:

"Within the last few years the circulation of Swedenborg's works has largely increased in this country, and a knowledge of their true character has become, in consequence, more widely known. Only the prejudiced or ignorant now regard them as weak and visionary. Their breadth and logical clearness command the respect and attention of the best minds of the age. The profoundest thinkers and the most astute theologians, when they stand face to face with Swedenborg on the rational plane of thought and doctrine, find themselves in the presence of a master-spirit.

"Hitherto the Protestant clergy in this country have, strange as it may seem, remained in comparative ignorance of Swedenborg's writings, and of their widely-increasing influence on the religious ideas of the age. Aware of this fact, and deeply impressed with the importance of giving them an opportunity to examine the new doctrines set forth therein, a gentleman of this city, Mr. L. C. Iungerich, generously offered, about two years ago, to furnish every Protestant clergyman in America who might desire to receive it, a copy of Swedenborg's "True Christian Religion," a large octavo of over six hundred pages, in which the whole theology of the New Church is fully set forth. In order to carry out this work efficiently, he made an arrangement with the extensive publishing house of J. B. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, to take applications for the book, and to send it to any clergyman who asked for it; the only expense to the applicant being the postage, twenty cents.

"The result of this offer is remarkable. Nearly four thousand copies of the book have been asked for and sent to clergymen and students of theology; and the demand increases from day to day. Mr. Iungerich being a gentleman of large wealth, and deeply in earnest in the work he has undertaken, stands ready to respond, through the publishing house above named, to any extent; and there is not a clergyman in America who may not, if he desires it, have a copy of Swedenborg's "True Christian Religion."

"Co-ordinate with this work is that of "The American New Church Tract and Publication Society" of this city, which less than a year ago offered to send to clergymen, through the same publishing house used by Mr. Iungerich, a copy of Swedenborg's work entitled "Heaven and its Wonders, and Hell; from Things Heard and Seen," an octavo of four hundred and fifty pages, requiring only the postage, fifteen cents. The response to this offer has been quite as active as that just mentioned, over fifteen hundred copies of "Heaven and Hell" having, in a few months, gone into the hands of ministers. The demand for these books is not limited to one or two denominations, but comes from all alike. Many of the letters that accompany the calls for books, show a strong desire to examine the doctrines of the New Church and to know just what they teach. It is claimed by the receivers of these doctrines that they are not only rational and scriptural, but that they furnish the only means for harmonizing the conflicting views of the many sects in Christendom and of uniting all in charity if not in external conformity. Such a consummation all true souls most earnestly desire, and, through whatever means it comes, it will be gladly welcomed."

To this we may add that we learn from a member of the publishing house above referred to, that up to this time, over six thousand copies of "The True Christian Religion," and nearly four thousand copies of the work on "Heaven and Hell," have been sent to clergymen in response to applications for the two books, and that the demand continues to increase. This is certainly a very remarkable fact, and one that will take most persons by surprise.

Swedenborg's "True Christian Religion" gives a full statement of the doctrines of the New Church; while his treatise on "Heaven and Hell" unveils the mysteries of the spiritual world, and describes the condition of the good and the evil. But the work named at the head of this article is of another and higher character, and professes to unfold the true meaning of the great Book of Revelation as contained in the inner or spiritual sense, which Swedenborg evolves by means of the doctrine of Correspondences.

All Scripture, he says, whether written in the form of pure symbol, history or prophecy, contains an inner spiritual meaning, which is its divine sense, and by which it connects the human race with Heaven. When a man reads the natural sense thoughtfully and reverently, the angels who are with him see in his thought only the divine sense, and by means of this are able to come closer to him with all their holy and saving influences. It was in order so to connect man with Heaven by the power of its inner, divine sense, that the Word of God was given in a symbolic form. In man's decline from innocence, he lost the power to see spiritual truth; and in his progressive restoration since the coming of the Lord, he has at last arrived at a state of inner enlightenment sufficiently clear to comprehend, in some small degree, the purely spiritual. And now that this "fulness of time" has come, in the progress of our race, the long-lost key by which to unlock the sacred casket and again possess the precious jewel within, has, it is alleged, been, through the divine mercy, restored. It is by the application of this key, or the law of Correspondences, that Swedenborg unfolds, in the two volumes before us, the hidden meanings of the wonderful Apocalypse.

Bric-a-Brac Series, No. 5. The Greville Memoirs. A Journal of the Reigns of King George IV. and King William IV. By Charles C. F. Greville, Clerk of the Counsel to those Sovereigns. Edited by Richard Henry Stoddard. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. The substance of this exceedingly interesting and lively little volume has been drawn from the larger English edition of the much-talked-about Greville Memoirs, which, in spite of their bulky character and the frequently arid nature of their contents, have attained an extensive reading in England. In their present shape, we have the wheat winnowed from the chaff, the grains of gold separated from the coarser debris in which they were imbedded.

History of Two Lives: a True Story; and The Serpent in the Cup. By Mrs. Lucy E. Sanford. New York: The National Temperance Society and Publication House. The Rev. Dr. Prime, in his introduction to this "true story," remarks as follows:

"The facts embodied in this volume, and presented in dramatic and impressive terms, made a deep impression upon my mind. * * * Unhappily, the sin and misery of Intemperance furnish so many and so fearful illustrations, that we have no need of the arts of fiction to invent or embellish narratives of vice to be used in the work of restraint and reform. The TRUTH is the most painful."

That the impressive narratives here recorded are true, no one who has even a slight acquaintance with the effects of the "accursed thirst" for strong drink, can for a moment doubt. And this so evident truthfulness must give them a power for good far beyond that of the most highly-wrought fiction.

Vick's Floral Guide for 1875. Published Quarterly, by James Vick, Rochester, New York. We are in the receipt of the January number of this now well-known periodical. It contains over one hundred pages, with five hundred engravings and letter-press descriptions, with directions for culture of the same number of our best flowers and vegetables. It is truly a useful and elegant book of its kind; and remarkably cheap at twenty-five cents a year. We notice that its editor and publisher proposes to receive from customers, or others, whatever money they may appropriate for the relief of the Kansas sufferers, acknowledging the receipt of all such money, and giving an account of its disposal, and to add to such sums five hundred dollars, as his own subscription. He also offers to appropriate to supplying the Kansas sufferers with seeds, any money that may be sent him for that purpose, at the same time generously donating five hundred dollars himself to the same fund.

Briggs & Brothers' Illustrated Floral Work and Catalogue. For July and October, 1874. This number is designed more particularly to bring to the notice of the public Messrs. Briggs & Brothers' extensive and varied collection of bulbs, for planting and cultivating which it gives full instructions. In connection with this we have to acknowledge the receipt, from the same firm, of a box of choice bulbs. If they are fair specimens of those offered for sale by this house, we cannot see that those who purchase from it will have any occasion to regret doing so.

Waifs of Humanity.

IN another part of our magazine will be found an exceedingly interesting account of "The Girls' Lodging House," at No. 27 St. Mark's Place, New York City, one of the many noble charities that indicate the steady progress of that higher and truer Christianity which is advancing upon the world, and making itself felt in hundreds of beneficent ways. Don't fail to read it. Below we give, from the New York Herald, a description of a scene in another charitable institution, which no one can read without being deeply moved:

"The Foundling Asylum on Sixty-eighth Street (New York) now stands as a glorious monument, first to the indefatigable and almost superhuman exertions of the good sister in charge, and secondly to the munificent bounty and a genuine humanity of a community proverbial for its charity in the broadest sense of the term. It would, indeed, be a superfluous task to dilate on the solid benefits conferred by the asylum, which, commencing with a circumscribed establishment in Washington Square, scarcely over five years ago, now commands, by its splendid proportions, the attention of the passers-by—a home, as one of the reports states, 'for the innocent offspring of passion or poverty, for whom the doorstep, the street, the sink, the river, the string and the knife presented such a means of riddance to those who, suffering from poverty or fearing disgrace, sat in final judgment upon it,' as well as for 'the rescue of fallen women before they have sunk to the hopeless depths of misery and crime.' But the necessity and influence of such an institution have been so well proved by its results, that comment is almost out of place. Suffice it to say, that a visit yesterday to the asylum only confirmed the prediction long ago expressed, that the day would come when the house in Washington Square would be totally inadequate to the demand made upon its resources.

"Yesterday was what is known as 'Pay Day'—an event which occurs once a month, when the outdoor nurses are remunerated for their services. It may be as well to mention that the utmost care and discrimination are exercised in the selection of these nurses, none being employed who cannot present a certificate of good health from a physician, and another of good character from some known and reliable person. Even the small sum allotted for this service proves of incalculable benefit, securing, as it does, a roof for many a poor family, which is, in itself, a great charity. Now it may be as well to explain that, although the dimensions of the building are large, it has been found necessary to care for many of the infants left at the asylum by means of outside nurses, and that the helpless little waifs may be properly attended to, a detective is detailed to the institution, who frequently visits each nurse at times when he is least expected. The result of this experiment has proved highly successful. This was amply exemplified yesterday by the presence of over one thousand beautiful and healthy children, averaging from a month to three years old, whose nurses had come for their pay as well as to receive clothing, all of which, by the way, is made in the asylum. It was a wonderful scene, and those who witnessed it, however hard-hearted the visitors might be, could not fail to be impressed by the heavenly thoughts that prompted the establishing of an institution which worked such wonders. Above all, the fact that the institution prescribes neither creed, nor class, nor color—and there was a goodly representation from every source—must, in itself, commend the broad and noble principle upon which the asylum is based. That this crime of infanticide has been successfully grappled with and diminished through the instrumentality of the institution, trustworthy statistics already show.

"All the wards are now full, there being at present about three hundred and fifty children cared for in the building, which, from the basement to the roof, presents in the interior a picture of order, cleanliness and regularity, which speaks volumes for the untiring exertions of the good sisters whose lives are devoted to a cause than which no nobler is known to the devotees of charity and religion. That deep interest is taken in the asylum, is evident from the throng of ladies, embracing in their number those whose labors and substantial support in the cause of charity are well known, and the fact that they almost rivalled each other in contributing the living day, with needle and thread, to clothe the little waifs, is in itself significant of their commendable devotion on behalf of an asylum whose cause appeals to all the world. Sister Irene—and her name is synonymous with the success of the institution—had yesterday, as she ever has, a gigantic task on hand, but the regiment of nurses and their charges were well provided for ere they left the building.”

Under Difficulties.

SOMETHING of the old barbaric spirit that set woman under the heel of man still clings to our civilization, and is perpetually revealing itself in efforts to limit her intellectual freedom and development. Failing to recognize her equal right with himself to determine what work she shall do in the world, the man draws a circle, and says to the woman, “You must keep within this sphere.” All of what are known as the learned professions are on the outside of this circle, and the moment a woman attempts to enter any one of them, she finds herself met by a stern repulse. If she persist in her efforts, she encounters ridicule, insult, or an iron-handed rejection. No question is asked as to her peculiar fitness for the life-work upon which she desires to enter. She is a woman; and the man says, she shall not, if he can prevent it, become a doctor, a lawyer, or a preacher.

This is the old barbaric “Might is right” spirit, and a poor commentary on the christian civilization of the nineteenth century. A notable instance is given of the courage and perseverance of an American lady, who, denied the advantages she sought in her own country, went to Germany for larger facilities in the study of medicine. But the same barrier met her there. On being refused admittance to a course of medical lectures in one of the most noted universities in Germany, she determined to put on male costume and pass herself off for a young man. One day an American consul was summoned to a hotel to see a lady from the United States. As there was no reception room in the hotel, he was shown up to the room indicated in the note he had received, by the servant. He looked in vain for the lady, but saw what he supposed was a young man sitting on a trunk. He was soon undeceived. The “boy” said he was simply in disguise, and set forth at length the reasons for such extraordinary conduct. She said she was resolved to attend that course of lectures, and had called in the consul to give her real name and place of residence in the United States, so that in case of trouble she could appeal to him for protection. The position of the consul was a novel one, but he finally consented to take the lady’s statement, and promised to keep the secret inviolate unless she should be discovered. This did not happen. The disguise answered its purpose; the lady remained at the institution a year, passed through the course with honor, and is doubtless now applying the knowledge gained, in her practice somewhere in the United States.

A fact like this, and it is one of many that could be cited, should call a blush of shame to the face of every narrow-minded professor, or member of a faculty, who obtrudes his little self in the way of a woman’s inborn right to enter upon any field of work for which God has given her a natural fitness.

The Progress of Woman.

PROFESSOR SWING, in a discourse on the “Progress of Woman,” says:

“Whether woman is advancing toward the ballot-box and toward all the professions, I know not, but she is unfolding into a measureless usefulness. May no coldness of man silence the great debate, nor check her spirit of progress. Long enough has Christianity advanced upon one foot. It will require all souls that love it to make its banner of love successful. The harvest is so great that we may excuse no one from the field. To excuse one-half the human family, a half gifted with sentiment, with spirituality, with soul, is a madness, a crime, against the dearest of our race. A progress toward usefulness must be considered the best advance for all, and those graves must be confessed great, not into which generals, or kings, or orators, or poets alone may have fallen, but also those into which humble ones go down, beneath flowers placed by the hand of gratitude, and beneath the tears from hearts made nobler and happier by the life that goes so humbly and silently back to its God.”

WORDS OF COMMENDATION.

The HOME MAGAZINE for this year is receiving a more cordial welcome and a higher approval than ever before. Our efforts to make it the best magazine for home reading in the country are being more and more widely acknowledged. Commendation from subscribers and the press are of the strongest and most flattering character. We give an extract from a single letter:

"I write to let you know how highly we prize the magazine. Like the angels, it grows young and beautiful as it advances in years; and its monthly visits bring angelic influences into our hearts and homes. My wife and daughter are impatient for the day of its arrival, and read nothing else till its contents are devoured.

"The two pictures you have sent us this year are of rare excellence, and illustrate admirably the home virtues which your magazine so well inculcates and fosters."

The Danville (Ill.) News says of our magazine:

"It is always pure in tone, elevated in character, and has been growing better for years."

The Hudson (Mich.) Post says:

"Among the numerous valuable magazines that come to our table, none are more welcome than the HOME. Mr. Arthur takes high rank among literary men, and no books are more eagerly sought for than his, in all of which he has succeeded in making fiction the vehicle to convey excellent moral and religious thoughts to tender minds. He has now turned his entire attention to his magazine, and the January number is evidently the first of an improved series. No mother can afford to do without Pipsissitway's hints to mothers and housekeepers, valuable because always practical."

We could fill pages with such notices, but these will suffice to show the estimate in which our magazine is held. We hope to make it still better and better as the months go by.

TO YOUNG LADIES, TEACHERS and PARENTS.

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR EUROPEAN STUDY AND TRAVEL.

A lady of culture and some literary attainments, having joined the select class that will go abroad in April on his annual tour with Prof. A. J. Ebell, Director of the International Academy of New York and Berlin, solicits correspondence with those who would desire to accompany her; also with parents who would like to place their daughters in her more especial care.

Unsurpassed advantages for culture and enjoyment are offered at less than one-half what their cost would be to parties not possessing the facilities perfected by the International Academy, under plans which have now been in operation three or four years. No loss, illness or accident of any kind whatever has attended any previous tour. Invalids have joined the class and returned in blooming health.

THE LINE OF TRAVEL lies through Scotland, Germany, comprises ten weeks' stay in Berlin for study, thence through Austria, part of Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, France and England.

DR. T. FELIX GOURAUD'S ORIENTAL CREAM, MEDICATED SOAP, Etc.

Io Triomphe, Io Peana.—The world admires beauty, but in no one thing more than the human face, and he who contributes to making people beautiful does good, for no one can be good-looking and not be better, honester, and consequently happier. This country has long looked to Paris, that city of wondrous fair women and polite men, for its fashions and for those rarer cosmetics for beautifying the complexion and preserving it in all its natural color and freshness, and not until Dr. T. FELIX GOURAUD'S ORIENTAL CREAM or MAGICAL BEAUTIFIER was discovered and placed in the market, did this country realize the consummation of Parisian skill and science here in its midst. For thirty-five years Dr. Gouraud's name has been as familiar in fashionable circles, as the discoverer of a beautifier that has no equal in the annals of modern science, as is the name of Parepa-Rosa to the lovers of song. Indeed, so meritorious in his celebrated Oriental Cream, that the gifted Parepa-Rosa and other celebrities have taken it with them to Europe, and unite with thousands in this country in testimonials of its merit. It is used by the beautiful and fair wherever society is, and no lady's dressing-table is complete without it. Its use is like drinking at the spring of perpetual youth, or being touched by the magic wand of beauty. The ladies even say that the shy god Cupid carries a bottle of it strung to his bow, in which he dips the barbed point of those instruments of torture to the busy breasts of obdurate old bachelors, for it is the fair face, with its rich and rosy hue, that demoralizes the most practical philosophy. Dr. Gouraud may well be proud of the favor in which he is held by the fashion of society, by reason of the popularity of his preparation; but prouder still of his reputation for fair and honorable dealing, gained through thirty-one years of honest dealing with the trade, during which time he has seen hundreds of preparations pass from sight, while his has continued to grow in popular favor. Prepared by Dr. GOURAUD, 48 Bond Street, New York.—Rock Island (Ill.) Argus.

Dr. T. Felix Gouraud's Medicated Soap cures Pimples, Scaly Eruptions, Salt Rheum, Ringworm, Moth Patches, Comedones, Tetter, Flesh-worms, Scald Heads, Nettle Rash, Sores, Chafed Thighs; in a word, all cuticular disfigurements. This soap is a specialty, and must not be confounded with the various lotions and nostrums so extensively advertised for the purpose. GOURAUD'S compound acts on the blood through the hair-like tegumentary tissues, and disperses, instead of repelling all rebellions of the blood. This remedy needs no publication of certificates. It has received the stamp of public approbation the past thirty-five years without a solitary complaint. Found at Dr. GOURAUD'S depot, 48 Bond street, New York, and druggists; 50 cents a cake.

THE CONFIDANTE.

A LETTER, Lucy? for me to read?
Ah, tell-tale blushes, what secret now?
I am but teasing. There, never heed,
Nor blur with furrows that little brow.

Yes, as I thought. 'Tis the old, old tale:
He loves you; dreams of you night and day;
With hope he brightens, with dread turns pale.
Truths, dear sister, or babblings gray.

Love lives forever, if heart-born—real;
But fades like the roses I've now just clipped,
When told by one who your peace would steal,
Then flit to some blossom as honey-lipped.

To you each word here is truth's own mint;
To me, once cheated, there's room for doubt,
You, sister, could give him your love sans stint—
What? tears and trembling? a dawning pout?

Well, darling, believe, then, and cynic thought
Shall fade away in your love's sweet sun;
He is not worldly, nor fashion-taught;
I would not darken new light begun.

His words are manly; an honest ring
Sounds in each sentence. Ah! Lucy, live
Long in the love that can never wing,
Whilst I—well, yes—I have yet to give.

HEIDELBERG.

THIS ancient city, famous for its university, which, after those of Prague and Vienna, is the oldest in Germany, is situated on the left bank of the River Neckar, in a most beautiful district of country. It is built on a narrow strip of ground between the river on the north, and the northern extremity of the Geissberg Mountain on the south, and consists mainly of one street nearly three miles in length. It is thirteen miles south-east of Mannheim, and about fifty-four miles south of Frankfort-on-the-Maine. Among the most important buildings in Heidelberg are the Church of the Holy Ghost, through which a partition-wall has been run, and in which Catholic and Protestant worship are carried on simultaneously; the Church of St. Peter's, on the door of which Jerome of Prague, the companion of Huss, nailed his celebrated Theses, at the same time publicly announcing his doctrines before a multitude assembled in the church-yard; and the ruins of the castle, which was formerly the residence of the Electors Palatine, and which, in 1764, was set on fire by lightning and totally destroyed. In the cellar under this castle is the famous Heidelberg Tun, thirty-six feet long and twenty-four high, capable of containing eight hundred hogsheads.

Longfellow, in his "Hyperion," thus speaks, in his poetic prose, of this castle:

"High and hoar on the forehead of the Jettenbuhl, stands the Castle of Heidelberg. Behind it rise the oak-crested hills of the Geissberg and the Kaiserstuhl; and in front, from the wide terrace of masonry, you can almost throw a stone upon the roofs of the town, so close do they lie beneath. Above this terrace rises the broad front of the Chapel of St. Udalrich. On the left stands the slender octagon tower of the horologe; and on the right, a huge, round tower, battered and shattered by the mace of war, shoves up with its broad shoulders the beautiful palace and garden-terrace of Elizabeth, wife of the Count Palatine Frederick. In the rear are older palaces and towers, forming a vast, irregular quadrangle; Rudolph's ancient castle, with its Gothic glorie and fantastic gables; the Giant's Tower, guarding the draw-bridge over the moat; the Rent Tower, with the linden trees growing on its summit; and the magnificent Rittersaal of Otho-Heuy, Count Palatine of the Rhine and Grand Seneschal of the Holy Roman Empire. From the gardens behind the castle you pass under the archway of the Giant's Tower in the great court-yard. The diverse architecture of different ages strikes the eye, and curious sculptures. In niches on the wall of St. Udalrich's chapel stand rows of knights in armor, broken and dismembered; and on the font of Otho Rittersaal, the heroes of Jewish history and classic fable. You enter the open and desolate chambers of the ruin, and on every side are medallions and family arms; the Globe of the Empire and the Golden Fleece, or the Eagle of the Cæsars, resting on the escutcheons of Bavaria and the Palatinate. Over the windows, and door-ways, and chimney-pieces are sculptures and mouldings of exquisite workmanship; and the eye is bewildered by the profusion of caryatides, and arabesques, and rosettes, and fan-like fittings, and garlands of fruits and flowers and acorns, and bullock's heads with draperies of foliage and muzzles of lions, holding rings in their teeth. The cunning hand of Art was busy for six centuries in raising and adorning these walls; the mailed hands of time and war have defaced and overthrown them in less than two. Next to the Alhambra of Grenada, the Castle of Heidelberg is the most magnificent ruin of the Middle Ages.

"In the valley below flows the rushing stream of the Neckar. Close to its margin, on the opposite side, rises the Mountain of All Saints, crowned with the ruins of a convent; and up the valley stretches the mountain-curtain of the Odenwald. So close and many are the hills which eastward shut the valley in, that the river seems a lake. But westward it opens upon the broad plain of the Rhine, like the mouth of a trumpet; and like the blast of a trumpet is, at times the wintry wind through this narrow mountain-pass. The blue Alsatian hills rise beyond; and, on a platform or strip of level land, between the Neckar and the mountains, right under the castle, stands the town of Heidelberg; as the old song says, 'a pleasant town, when it has done raining.'

The university which has been so often described in connection with "student life in Germany," stands in the centre of the town. As an edifice it is plain and not very large. It comprises faculties of theology, law, medicine and philosophy. The number of students ranges from five to seven hundred; and there are about one hundred professors and teachers. Its valuable library contains nearly two hundred thousand volumes and three thousand manuscripts. The library, the anatomical and zoological museums are in separate buildings.

cast them carelessly aside, as no longer worthy of consideration or kindness; but, somehow, I find it impossible to treat my first silk dress in this cruel manner.

How well I remember the day it was bought! what a long time I was deciding between the many patterns that were spread out before me. Should I have a blue or a brown, a black or a gray? And when it was suggested that a stripe would be best, I was fully half an hour making up my mind whether a wide or a narrow stripe would be the HEIDELBERG.

MY STRIPED SILK DRESS.

OBITUARY.

BY L. NINA HAZELTON.

YES, the poor thing is almost gone, there is no doubt about that. The flounce is soiled and frayed an inch deep, there is a dreadful darn right on the front breadth, the under sides of the sleeves are so ragged that I am obliged to keep my arms in a certain position, when I wear it without a sack, and in fact, the whole dress looks as though it might at any moment, without the slightest warning, suddenly go all to pieces, like the wonderful "One Hoss Shay."

Yet it goes to my heart to think of consigning my old gray silk to the dark depths of the rag-bag. It is customary, I know, when people or things have become useless after long years of service, to prettier. But at last I fixed upon a certain black and gray silk, nor have I ever repented my choice.

Well, it was a beautiful dress when first finished. There were ruffles and bands of the material, and innumerable pipings of glossy grey satin, and the front of the overskirt was cut in points, while the back was ruffled, and here and there were bows of the silk. The last stitch was taken Saturday night, and when Sunday morning dawned bright and beautiful, I felt in an unusually religious mood, and was ready, that day, to go to church twice, Sunday School, and two or three prayer meetings thrown in between; so great was my humble piety.

I was perfectly satisfied to have no other good dress that whole summer, for I went out very little, and it looked new and fresh; but when October came, and the concerts, and operas, and lectures began, and I found I must wear my gray silk everywhere that I went, then, the novelty soon wore off—and the bottom of the skirt also, I am sorry to say.

Did you hear Miss Kellogg last winter? In the balcony, just to the right, sat the girl in the striped silk dress. Did you hear Thomas's Orchestra, or De Murska? Did you attend the Star Course of Lectures? If you had looked where the editors sit, you would have discovered the girl in the striped silk dress. If you walked down Chestnut Street, there she was. If you went to the library, there she was again. If you rode in the Twelfth Street cars, you were sure to meet her. I fear people began to wonder whether I ever took off that dress, but did not eat, and sleep, and live in it, week after week.

But I would not remain in-doors because I had only one dress to wear, although I disliked to ride on the same line of cars too frequently, and sometimes slipped out the back gate instead of going around the front way, for fear of the neighbors.

The happiest moment of my life came to me when wearing that same despised silk. Not that I got a husband in it. Oh, dear me, no! A girl with only one good dress stands a very poor chance of getting a suitor now-a-days. But something almost as delightful happened one afternoon.

I believe I trembled from the time I threw the old gray silk over my head when preparing to go, until I found myself safe back home again. It was a very cold day, the first of November, and I remember I wore a black velvet basque almost as venerable as myself, and which showed its age, I think, rather more, and a gray felt hat that I got at a milliner's way down in the lower part of the city, where they owed my father some money—a very fortunate thing for me, by the by. I had a pink ribbon bow with long ends at my throat, and carried a certain small roll, the disposal of which was to make my fortune.

How the wind blew as I left the cars and hurried down Chestnut Street! My face began to grow dreadfully cold; and how could I ever confront the great publisher with a red nose! I shall never forget with what fear and trembling I passed and repassed his office before I could find courage to enter. Finally I made one desperate effort, and opened the door. But the moment it closed gently behind me, I would have given anything to have been out in the cold street again. It was too late to turn back, however, so I timidly inquired for the "editor," and was ushered into his private office.

The dear old gentleman! How kind he was to me, and how pleasantly he said as he took the little roll from my hand: "I presume we shall take it."

And then, a few days later, with what a proud step did I walk into that same private office to receive a ten-dollar bill for my sketch—the first money I had ever earned in my life. I doubt if on the whole length of Chestnut Street that afternoon you could have found a happier girl than the one in the striped silk dress.

You would scarcely have known the old dress when I wore it again the next spring. The silver gray pipings had disappeared, and were replaced by bands of black velvet. The yard that had been left over, with the overskirt, made a polonaise, which was edged with some guipure lace that formerly adorned a cashmere suit of my mother's, and altogether the old silk looked almost as fresh as new. I did not appear in it more than perhaps twenty times that spring, but when fall came again I began to wear it in earnest. It certainly was a most wonderful dress, suited to almost any occasion when a dress of some kind was necessary. For a trip down town of a rainy morning, what could be more suitable than a black and gray striped silk, I should like to know? For a ceremonious call, an opera toilet, a costume for shopping, riding or excursions to the park, I found a striped silk dress eminently serviceable, and am willing to certify to the same if desired. It was a consoling thought that, if I never became known as an authoress, I stood a very good chance of becoming exceedingly well known as the girl in the striped silk dress.

O dear old dress, thy reign is over! It will soon be a moral impossibility to wear thee again. Thou art gone; and what shall I say of thy many virtues, thy untiring service, thy marvellous durability! It is only a year and a half since thou came to me fresh from the shop window; and now thy short but busy life has just ended; an hour's work with the scissors, and thou wilt lie at my feet a mass of old, worn, dirty silk, no longer of use in the world, but which I shall ever regard with a tender feeling because of the precious memories hidden among its folds!

And as I am writing from Philadelphia, perhaps it would be well, in closing this brief sketch of thy life, to add a verse of obituary poetry, but I can only think of one line which would be appropriate, and that is,

"Gone, but not forgotten."

BONNETS.

BY K. B. D.

THE proper, legitimate shape of a bonnet will probably be always a vexed question to humanity. There will always be three distinct opinions, to say nothing of the right opinion, about them. Women, taken as a class, will admire the coming bonnet; men, taken as a class, will revile that particular bonnet, and be loud in their praises of the bonnet just departing. Old ladies and gentlemen who abjure the present, and live only in their remembrance of "the good old times," will declare that no bonnet of later date than the bonnets of their youth is either becoming or modest, or in any way proper for a lady to wear. Oh, these good old times, when all the fashions were sensible! Yet, my mother tells me of wearing a hat with three upright ostrich feathers—very similar, I should judge, to the style of to-day—and my grandmother has described to me I know not what absurdities of head-gear.

The author remembers seeing the last departing form of the hideous bonnet on the middle of the right side of the picture. And, moreover, she has heard elderly people talk of the times when bonnets were made to cover the head and shield the face. This style certainly did that with a vengeance!

It is quite an amusing recreation for the mind for a person to recall all the changing forms of bonnets during even half an ordinary lifetime.

Succeeding these coal-scuttles came in the much vaunted cottage bonnet, of which no representation is given in the picture. This was straight in its outlines, with square-edged, flat crown, and worn for two or three years, and then suddenly long tabs came in, meeting completely under the chin.

Again fashion halted and dallied, and evidently did not know what to do next. Now it was a round crown, then a flat crown; now the cape or curtain high and narrow, and of the material of the bonnet; then it must be low and broad, and of silk or ribbon. Next the bonnets began to spread out about as graceful and artistic as a log of wood chopped off the proper length, and hewn out to admit the head. This form, slightly altered from year to year, was in favor for some little time; and then suddenly came the gypsy bonnet, a modified form of the bonnet seen at the bottom of the left hand, only it was smaller, more graceful, not so astoundingly trimmed, and very pretty and coquettish on a young girl. The form of bonnet with the sides rounding away from the face was at the sides, while they remained flat on the forehead; and retaining this general form, they gradually receded from the head until they merely rested on the hair at the back. Then by a sudden jump they came back to the forehead, and setting close to the sides of the face, they proceeded to project further and further until the front of the top towered high above and beyond the head, and its height was further enhanced by the style of piling all the trimming just on this highest point.

Then fashion considered what she should do next; and, desirous of making a sensation, she said bonnets without curtains. Women sighed and obeyed. Her next order was bonnets without crowns. Women sighed again, and some refused to obey at first, but succumbed at last. Then she said pancakes, and then all her followers said, "Aye, aye, pancakes it is!" Then she ordered a puff of lace and wisp of ribbon, and all who wished to be in the fashion went out bareheaded to all practical purposes.

Since then, fashion has led us such a dance that it is possible to describe all her gyrations.

A little before the time of the last coal-scuttle bonnet—say fifteen years ago—hats were introduced as a legitimate head apparel for women, and the forms of these have been more varied even than those of bonnets. Some have been exceedingly pretty; others exceedingly ugly; and to-day the styles are so many and so varied, that "you pays your money and you takes your choice."

Now the especial point which every one would like to see settled, at least abstractly—what is a proper and artistic form of covering for the head?

Now the first definition given in Webster of the case of both bonnet and hat is, "a covering for the head." Still, as there must be a slight distinction between these two, else we should never have had the separate names, they must represent two different and distinctive styles—the hat the round and regular form, the bonnet the irregular. Thus reduced down to the simplest forms, the bonnet is best represented by the half-handkerchief thrown over the head and tied under the chin, the hat by the round, flat form, fastened on the top of the head by a ribbon passing over it, and tied also under the chin.

Thus we see that fashion at one point did touch the artistic, just at the very time we were howling out against her for ordering us to wear capeless and crownless bonnets and "pancake" hats. She only touched, she did not stop to dwell and amplify. These forms must always be considered as the most nearly representing the truly artistic when we speak of bonnets and hats for use.

When we regard them as for ornament, there are two forms they may adopt and still be artistic—the helmet and the coronet. Some of the styles at the present time represent these forms well, and, though differing so noticeably from the shapes of twenty years ago as to seem grotesque and absurd to any one whose tastes were formed then, are yet very pretty and very becoming to some faces, and not to be objected to on the score of being in-artistic.

The flat, round hat grows naturally to the seaside, the sundown, and from thence into all shapes of crowned or crownless hats. There are two of these, both of them very becoming, though one looks a little top-heavy from its abundance of trimming. The hat at the top is coquettish in design, and would be very pretty if it were not notably too large for the head it covers. The hat immediately below describes a halo rather than a diadem around the very pretty face, which it either becomes or else is beautified by. The bonnet or hat at the bottom of the picture is contrary to all our received ideas of such articles; yet who shall say it is not quaintly becoming, and certainly not inconvenient, since it serves the purpose of both bonnet and parasol.

THE RIVER WYE.

BY E. I. N. SAMMLER.

THIS beautiful British stream has its source in "lofty Plinlimmon," a mountain of South Wales, the summit of which is two thousand four hundred and sixty-three feet above the level of the sea. The Wye flows from the south side of the mountain, in Montgomeryshire, south-eastward, through a portion of Radnorshire, and then running more directly south, forms the boundary between the counties of Radnor and Brecon. Turning to the east, and intersecting Herefordshire, it again takes a southerly course, dividing Honchester from Monmouth, and enters the estuary of the Severn, two miles below Chepstone. Although of Welsh birth, and distinguished in all early Welsh documents as Gwy—"the river"—in its maturity it is English. It is the fairest of five other streams to which Plinlimmon gives birth, running its course of a hundred and thirty miles through luxuriant scenery—hill and dale, rock and valley—in its earlier progress over many falls, through reaches of green meadow land, "a wanderer 'midst the woods," encircling prosperous towns, and navigable for seventy miles from the sea.

One of the most attractive points on the Wye—to the general tourist—is the renowned town of Ross—a town which owes its fame to the "Man" who, a century and a half ago, gave it an illustrious page in history, and whose name Pope has thus immortalized:

"Rise, honest muse! and sing the Man of Ross:
Pleas'd Vaga* echoes through her winding bounds,
And rapid Severn hoarse applause resounds.
Who hung with woods yon mountain's sultry brow?

From the dry rock who bade the waters flow?
Not to the skies in useless columns toss'd,
Or in proud falls magnificently lost;
But, clear and artless, pouring through the plain
Health to the sick, and solace to the swain.
Whose causeway parts the vale with shady rows?
Whose seats the weary traveller repose?
Who taught the heaven-directed spire to rise?
'The Man of Ross,' each lisping babe replies.
Behold the market-place with poor o'erspread!
The Man of Ross divides the weekly bread:
He feeds yon alms-house, neat, but void of state,
Where age and want sit smiling at the gate:
Him portion'd maids, apprenticed orphans bless'd,
The young who labor, and the old who rest.
Is any sick? the Man of Ross relieves,
Prescribes, attends, the medicine makes and gives.
Is there a variance? enter but his door,
Balk'd are the courts, and contest is no more.
Despairing quacks with curses fled the place,
And vile attorneys, now a useless race.

* The Wye.

"Thrice happy man! enabled to pursue
What all so wish, but want the power to do!
Say, oh, what sums that generous hand supply?
What mines, to swell that boundless charity?"

"Of debts and taxes, wife and children clear,
This man possess'd—five hundred pounds a year.

"And what! no monument, inscription, stone?
His race, his form, his name almost unknown?"

"Who builds a church to God, and not to fame,
Will never mark the marble with his name;
Go search it there, where to be born and die,
Of rich and poor makes all the history;
Enough that Virtue filled the space between,
Proved by the ends of being to have been."

The hotel of Ross is a stately building, occupying a portion of the once honored "Prospect," a embracing a fine expanse of country—hill and dale, green meadows, crowded farm-yards, church spires, pleasant villages and venerable ruins, records of the old Romans and their British predecessors.

There are in Ross several memorials of "the Man." One of these is the house in which he lived, and where Coleridge, nearly a century after his death, wrote the beautiful lines commencing—

"Richer than miser o'er his countless hoards,
Nobler than kings, or king-polluted lords,
Here dwelt the Man of Ross! O traveller, hear!
Departed merit claims a reverent tear.
Friend to the friendless, to the sick man health,
With generous joy he viewed his modest wealth;
He heard the widow's Heaven-breathed prayer of praise;
He mark'd the sheltered orphan's tearful gaze;

JUNCTION OF THE WYE AND MONNOW.

height just outside the town, the grounds comprising which were given, for "five hundred years," to his fellow-townsmen by the Man of Ross. It was prettily laid out for "their convenience and recreation." Here he constructed a reservoir to supply them with water—

"Not to the skies in useless columns tost, Nor in proud falls magnificently lost;"

but that it might pour "health" and "solace" "through the plain" to all who needed. The entire character of the place is now changed, though the name remains. The reservoir is now a dry hollow, the fountains gone, the "seats" destroyed, "the shady rows" of elms cut down; "in a word," says Mr. Hall, "all that could do honor to the memory of 'the Man,' and continue his benevolence from generation to generation, has been removed by one innovator after another."

From the hotel there is a wide-spread view,

Or, where the sorrow-shrivelled captive lay,
Pour'd the bright blaze of freedom's noontide ray."

The church is another memorial of this worthy man. Under a plain stone, beside the altar, he is buried. Since Pope wrote, a tomb has been erected to his memory. On it is a bas-relief, purporting to be a portrait, and a tablet representing Charity and Benevolence. But the chief interest of the church is derived from another source. Growing from the pew where the good man was wont to sit, are two elm-trees, which, when in full leaf, are singular adornments of the sacred edifice. They are, it is said, about fifty years old, but not thicker than a man's arm, and are necessarily cut at the tops when they reach the roof, which is their boundary.

Blessed be the memory of good John Kyrle, the Man of Ross! and may the prophet yet find in his own country the honors that have been bestowed upon him by all the rest of the world.*

Descending the Wye from Ross to Monmouth, the tourist generally goes by one of the native boats. The coracle, which boatmen use to-day on the Wye, differs little from that in which their forefathers floated when the Romans were rulers on its banks. In shape it resembles half a walnut-shell. Some laths, or rude sticks, laid crosswise, form the skeleton. This is covered with canvas, or zinc, instead of the ancient horse-hide. A plank across the middle makes the seat; a small paddle is used for directing its movements. The whole affair is so light, that a man can easily carry it on his back. It draws very little water, and is easily upset, so that considerable skill is needed in its navigation.

A very brief voyage on the Wye suffices to make the tourist acquainted with its peculiarities. Its "winding bounds," like those of the lower Mississippi, are so remarkable that frequently, after his boat has floated four or five miles; the voyager finds himself within gunshot of the place from which he started—a tree-clad hill, or a church spire, seen directly in front, presently appearing at the side of, or, in another moment, behind the spectator; while, perhaps, in a few minutes, it is immediately in front of him again; and all these changes come so suddenly as to seem incomprehensible.

The Wye has been well described as a "capricious and headlong current," its sudden rises and falls rendering it but little available to commerce. During, or after rains, it rushes along at immense speed, overflowing its banks, and, in some instances, washing its rock boundaries. In fine weather, though even then a rapid stream, it becomes very shallow in parts. Through nearly the whole of its course from Ross to Chepstow, where it joins the Severn, the Wye is, as Wordsworth describes it, "a wanderer through the woods;" indeed, during its lower portion, the foliage and rocks are so closely intermixed as to afford no passage—not even a foot-path—from the banks. These trees are, for the most part, oak and beech. The great attraction of the Wye, however, consists in the singularly picturesque limestone rocks which continually, as it were, look down upon and guard the river. From every hole and crevice creep ivy and other parasitic plants, covering these rocks with various shades of green, except on jutting crags where the wind has power—these are stripped bare, or garmented only with lichens.

* John Kyrie, celebrated by Pope as the Man of Ross, was born at Whitehouse, in Gloucestershire, and possessed an estate of five hundred pounds a year at Ross, in Herefordshire, where he died in 1754, aged ninety. The good deeds of this estimable man so highly eulogized by Pope in his "Moral Essays," do not appear to be overrated. Warton says, Kyrie was the Howard of his age, and that he deserved to be celebrated beyond any of the heroes of Pindas. Johnson says of him: "The truth is, that Kyrie was a man of known integrity and active benevolence, by whose solicitations the wealthy were persuaded to pay contributions to his charitable schemes. This influence he obtained by an example of liberality exerted to the utmost extent of his power, and was thus enabled to give more than he had."

They are "simple and grand, rarely formal and fantastic." The Wye is a lonely river. For miles together along its banks there are no habitations. An extensive forest, dense, deep and gloomy, as some old primeval wood, shuts it in during a large portion of its lower course. The only peasantry living near it are the boatmen and charcoal-burners, who are rarely seen—the one laboring only when the tide serves, and the other toiling among the trees that hide them from sight:

"Wreaths of smoke

Sent up in silence from among the trees;
With some uncertain notice, as might seem,
Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods."

To its natural gifts of beauty, and they are many, may be added others derived from pretty villages, the spires of near or distant churches, secluded farm-houses, cultivated demesnes and mansions, populous towns and venerable bridges, and more especially the ruins of ancient castles and "holy abbeys"—some of the grandest "remains" in England—all which contribute their attractions to the lovely river-scenery of the Wye; recalling with impressive effect the lines of the poet:

"Time

Hath moulded into beauty many a tower
Which, when it frown'd with all its battlements,
Was only terrible."

Our engraving gives a view of the Wye at its junction with the Monnow below Monmouth, just under a tree-clad hill, to which is given the unaccountable name of "Gibraltar." The two rivers run at either side of a flat, green meadow, and embrace as they turn its corner, proceeding thence together to Chepstow town, thence to rapid Severn, and thence into the Bristol Channel.

VIEW ON THE SCHUYLKILL IN FAIRMOUNT PARK.

THE picturesque view here given embraces, as the principal object, the recently-completed Girard Avenue Bridge, which is said to be one of the finest and broadest bridges in the world, the width being one hundred feet. The length is a thousand feet. It has a centre roadway of sixty-seven feet, with footpaths on each side, sixteen and a half feet in width. It is built of iron on solid stone piers and abutments, and is handsomely painted. The railings are panelled, each pannel being filled with designs in bronze, eight in number, three being of cotton plant, one of the heron, one of the Phoenix, one of the eagle, one of the swan, one of the owl. The cost of this elegant structure was one million four hundred thousand dollars.

It spans the Schuylkill at Girard Avenue, connecting the East and West Fairmount Parks at that point, from which is obtained one of the many charming views that constantly break on visitors to our magnificent Park. The view is taken from the west side of the river, looking down toward the city, half a mile distant, but wholly concealed by woods and rising ground. Just below the west end of the bridge is the Zoological Garden, destined to be one of the finest in our country, and only a little way back the grounds on which the great Centennial buildings are now being constructed. This is only one of the many bits of fine scenery in Fairmount Park, which embraces an area of over two thousand acres, being nearly three times as large as Central Park, New York.

J. M. W. TURNER, R. A.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

JOSEPH MALLORD WILLIAM TURNER was born April 23d, 1775, in Maiden Lane, Covent Garden, London. His father was a barber of small means, uneducated and penurious.

"He never praised me," says the son, "except for having saved a half-penny." And this, perhaps, explains the son's parsimony in after life.

At the age of thirteen, Turner was sent to school at Margate. According to one biographer, he there fell in love with the sister of a schoolfellow, was constant to the attachment, and six years later declared his passion and was accepted. But the young lady's step-mother, not liking the match, took advantage of a tour he made into Yorkshire, and intercepted their letters. So his betrothed, thinking herself forsaken, accepted a new lover, as so many women do, out of sheer desperation, seeking thus to hide wounded feeling and a breaking heart.

The wedding-day was set when Turner returned. Judge what he felt on hearing this! Too late came his explanation. The lady was inexorable; she had pledged her word, and could not break it, she thought, with honor to herself. She was married soon afterward, unhappily, of course—for in what else but wretchedness can a loveless union result?

It is said that Turner never recovered from this blow. He grew every year more eccentric and misanthropic, and to the end of his life remained a bachelor. Art became his sole mistress, and to her he devoted himself thereafter with undivided heart. Who shall say the world is not a gainer by his disappointment? Had he possessed other ties, he could not have worshipped art so exclusively.

Ruskin speaks of Turner's tour into Yorkshire as the beginning of his true life. Born and bred in London, this was his first impressive acquaintance with the country. "For the first time the silence of nature round him, her freedom sealed to him, her glory opened to him. Peace at last; no roll of cartwheel, nor mutter of sullen voices in the back shop; but curlew cry in space of heaven, and welling of bell-toned streamlet by its shadowy rock. Freedom at last. Dead-wall, dark railing, fenced field, gated garden, all passed away like the dream of a prisoner; and behold, far as foot or eye can race or range, the moor and cloud. Loveliness at last. It is here, then, among these deserted vales! Not among men. Those pale, poverty-struck or cruel faces—that multitudinous, marred humanity—are not the only things that God has made. Here is something He has made which no one has marred. Pride of purple rocks, and river pools of blue, and tender wilderness of glittering trees, and misty lights of evening on immeasurable hills!"

Here, too, Turner first saw ruins. "And thus," continues Ruskin, "the fate and issue of all his work were determined at once. He must be a painter of the strength of nature, there was no beauty elsewhere than in that; he must paint also the labor and sorrow and passing away of men; this was the great human truth visible to him."

Turner seems to have shown a love for art almost in his cradle. He was only fourteen when admitted a student in the Royal Academy, but long before that had been employed to color prints for an engraver, and had offered for sale certain juvenile sketches in the windows of his father's shop. The first picture he exhibited on the walls of the Academy was in 1790, when he had reached the age of fifteen. It was entitled "A View of the Archbishop's Palace at Lambeth."

He began his art by sketching from nature, a practice he continued to the very last. He used all methods, yet constantly preferred water-colors to oil. Some of his sketches are mere pencil outlines, but as clear and definite in their details as if traced from a camera. Their fidelity seems wonderful when we remember the circumstances under which they were often taken; on a coach top, perhaps, or on the deck of a boat tossed upon the waters.

There was nothing in nature that he did not represent; frail leaflet, humble weed, lofty, branching tree, tinted rock, or cloud-capped mountain, were alike transferred to his sketch-book. Human beings were there, too, in every form of repose and action; and cities, and "wayside bits," and birds, and beasts, and cathedrals, rich with architectural ornaments.

Some idea of his industry may be gained from the fact that Ruskin, who was appointed to arrange his drawings after his death, found "upwards of nineteen thousand pieces of paper, drawn upon by Turner in one way or another. Many on both sides; some with four, five or six subjects on each side (the pencil point digging spiritedly through from the foregrounds of the front into the tender pieces of sky on the back); some in chalk, which the touch of the finger would sweep away; others in ink, rotted into holes; others (some splendid colored drawings among them) long eaten away by damp and mildew, and falling into dust at the edges, in capes and bays of fragile decay; others worm-eaten, some mouse-eaten, many torn half way through; numbers doubled (quadrupled, I should say,) up into four, being Turner's favorite mode of packing for travelling; nearly all rudely flattened out from the bundles in which Turner had finally rolled them up and squeezed them into his drawers in Queen Anne Street."

It is said that his studies of skies alone may be reckoned by thousands. Many of his sketches are so exquisitely colored, and interpret nature so faithfully, as to seem like complete pictures.

To appreciate his labors, one must remember that travelling was not so easy in his early days as at present. Yet he never allowed a season to pass without fresh excursions into the country, and had exhibited works ranging over twenty-six counties of England and Wales before he became an associate of the Royal Academy, in 1800. True, he made these excursions profitable. The booksellers bought his "views," and he thus attained two objects—pecuniary emolument and a minute and thorough knowledge of nature. Later in life, he undertook a series of works, illustrating the rivers and coast-scenery of England and France.

Wyatt once employed him to make some drawings of Oxford, and tells this characteristic story:

A liberal price was to be paid for the work, but to do it the artist must sit in the public street. Of course, a crowd of curious spectators at once assembled, and Turner was so annoyed that he borrowed an old post-chaise, and placed it in such a position that he could work from the window. But when the bill for the drawings came to be settled, he insisted that the three shillings and sixpence which he had paid for the use of the vehicle, should be refunded him by Wyatt.

Turner's genius soon rose above merely representative landscapes, and he began to embody sentiment and poetry in the treatment of his subjects. In 1798, he exhibited a picture entitled "Morning among the Coniston Fells, Cumberland," appending to it the following quotation:

"Ye mists and exhalations that now rise
From hill or steaming lake, dusky or gray,
Till the sun paint your fleecy skirts with gold,
In honor to the world's great Author, rise."

These lines have been regarded as almost pathetic, for it is in painting the effects of mist and vapor, and their glorious coloring, that Turner reaches the highest point of greatness in his art. He offers a striking contrast to Claude, whom he studied at first, it is said, with "tears of despairing admiration in his eyes." That he realized, at last, his own superiority, seems evident, or he would not have insisted so strongly, in his will, on one of his own great pictures being hung up in the National Gallery between two of Claude's.

After the date mentioned, Turner made frequent quotations from the poets, sometimes from Milton's "Paradise Lost," or Thomson's "Seasons," but oftener from a mythical manuscript, called "The Fallacies of Hope." Of this Turner was doubtless himself the author; at least, no other was ever found. There is the same ambiguous, eccentric style in "The Fallacies of Hope," as in his own conversation. He dearly loved mystery, and it was just like one of his freaks to compose the lines as occasion required, and then stimulate curiosity by appending the name of an unknown poem.

In 1839, he exhibited a picture called "The Fountain of Fallacy," under which was a quotation from the manuscript, incomprehensible, one would think, to everybody but himself:

"Its rainbow dew diffused fell on each anxious lip,
Working wild fantasy, imagining;
First, Science, in the immeasurable
Abyss of thought,
Measured his orbit slumbering."

Turner did not at once strike out a new path when he commenced painting in oil, but continued for some time to imitate the art of his predecessors and contemporaries. It was not until 1820, that a marked change became manifest in his works—a change, it is said, partly owing to his practice of painting in water-colors. This, says a critic, "led him to the use of the white ground. He soon perceived the far greater luminousness thus to be obtained; that works so treated, when seen in a room, had, as it were, light in themselves, and appeared as if the spectator were looking forth into the open air, as compared with the solid paintiness of the works of his contemporaries. But how to use his color in sufficiently delicate gradations to achieve the same result on a light ground in oil as on the paper ground in water-colors, was one of his first difficulties; and he was led to adopt the use of scumbling, that is to say, of driving very thin films of white, or of color mixed with white, over a properly-prepared ground. By this means he not only obtained infinitely delicate gradations, but successfully imitated the effects of air and mist; the brighter tints beneath being rendered grayer and more distant at the same time by the film of white. This enabled him to make the points of the composition—his figures, and other colored objects in the foreground—stand out in extreme brilliancy, from the use of transparent color boldly and purely used over the white."

But the method was a dangerous one, and almost fatal to the permanence of his pictures. Some of his most exquisite works are fast disappearing; the tints fading, and time will soon effect their total ruin.

Turner's popularity was of slow growth; he was over forty years old when his pictures began to command high prices. His "Carthage" was so abused by the critics that the gentleman who had ordered and was to pay one hundred pounds for it, refused to complete the bargain. Not long afterward, Turner was offered thousands for the same work.

"This is indeed a triumph," he exclaimed, exultingly.

But think of the places where he wrought out his beautiful conceptions. First, in the dingy bedroom over his father's shop in Maiden Lane, and then in the studio at 48 Queen Anne Street—studio and residence both—rightly called "Turner's Den." Broom and dusting-brush were unknown there; the sky-lights and windows were never cleaned, and had broken panes, patched with old newspapers, through which the moisture dripped in damp weather; the door was black and blistered; the hangings dingy; the carpet worn and musty; and from some of the pictures large pieces had chipped or scaled off in places.

It seems incomprehensible that a man could treat with such utter neglect and carelessness the creations of his own genius. For Turner well knew the greatness of his powers, and was jealous of their recognition. Yet he left his pictures in that mouldy atmosphere year after year, apparently unconcerned for their proper preservation.

Visitors he rarely received. If any one knocked or rang, it was long before the summons was answered. Finally, perhaps, the door would be opened a little way by his housekeeper, who would thrust her head out, and say, "You can't come in."

On one occasion, though, this female dragon was outwitted by Mr. Gillot, the steel-pen manufacturer. He called at the "Den," determined not only to get in, but to buy some of Turner's pictures. He rang the bell again and again, and at last the housekeeper came to the door, and, as usual, said, "You can't come in."

But Mr. Gillot thought he would try, and wedging his toes in the doorway forced himself through the aperture. Up the stairs he went, the housekeeper scolding him all the way.

Turner, hearing the noise, made his appearance overhead, and wrathfully confronted the intruder. "What do you want here?"

"I am come to purchase some of your pictures."

"I have none to sell."

"But you won't mind exchanging them for some of mine," said Mr. Gillot, with ready wit, pulling out a roll of Bank-of-England notes to the amount of five thousand pounds.

It was a successful maneuver. Turner could appreciate the point, and Mr. Gillot obtained his pictures.

Turner could not bear to sell a favorite painting. It seemed a part of himself, and he was always dejected and melancholy afterward.

"I lost one of my children this week," he would exclaim, mournfully, with tears in his eyes.

Many stories are told of his parsimony; among others, the following:

Turner had paid a visit to Edinburgh, and been hospitably entertained during his whole stay there by a Mr. Thompson. Mr. Thompson afterward came to London, and Turner, contrary to his usual custom in such matters, invited the gentleman to dinner. Greatly to his consternation, and that of his father, who lived with him at the time, the invitation was accepted.

But as good fortune would have it, Mr. Thompson was invited to dine with a nobleman the same day. Hearing of the previous engagement, the nobleman said, "Bring Turner with you."

Mr. Thompson delivered the message. Turner was delighted, but pretended at first to hesitate. "Well, I suppose I must, but—"

"Go, Billy," exclaimed his father, who had been listening at the key-hole. "Go, Billy; the mutton need not be boiled."

Yet, though parsimonious, says Leslie, Turner was not miserly. At one of the artists' dinners, where it was customary for each to contribute toward the cost of the entertainment, Chantrey, the sculptor, sat at the head of the table, and by way of joke, threw the bill to Turner. Surprising to say, he discharged it in full, and steadily refused re-imbursement from the others.

At another time, a gentleman, who had bought Turner's sketches when he was a boy, and prophesied his future greatness, fell into difficulties, and was greatly embarrassed for want of ready money, Turner heard of it, and at once sent a large sum—some versions of the story say twenty thousand pounds—to the gentleman's steward. It was gratefully acknowledged, and afterward repaid.

From a number of anecdotes, illustrating his kindness to young artists, I select two. At one time he was on the hanging committee, as it is called, of the Royal Academy, and after the walls were full, discovered a picture by an unknown artist named Bird. He examined it carefully, and then exclaimed, "A good picture! It must be hung up and exhibited."

"Impossible!" replied the others; "the arrangement can't be disturbed. Quite impossible!"

"A good picture," repeated Turner; "it must be hung up," and finding them still obstinate, he took down one of his own pictures and substituted Bird's.

Another time, a young artist who had painted "Galileo in the Prison of the Inquisition," showed him the work.

"A good picture," said Turner; "full of promise." And seizing a brush, he dashed in some geometrical figures upon the prison walls, that added fifty guineas to the value of the painting.

One of Turner's most poetical works, according to Redgrave, is "Ulysses deriding Polyphemus," exhibited in 1829, with the following quotation from Pope's "Odyssey":

"Now off at sea, and from the shallows clear,
As far as human voice could reach the ear;
With taunts the distant giant I accost,
Hear me, O Cyclop! hear, ungracious host!
'Twas on no cowards, no ignoble slave,
Thou meditat'st thy meal in yonder cave.
Cyclop! if any, pitying thy disgrace,
Ask who disfigured thus that eyeless face?
Say, 'twas Ulysses, 'twas his deed declare—
Laertes's son, of Ithaca the fair,
Ulysses, far in fighting fields renowned,
Before whose arms Troy tumbled to the ground."

"It is impossible," says Redgrave, "to go beyond the power of color here achieved; it is on the very verge of extravagance, and yet is no way gaudy. How near it is, is seen in any attempt to copy the picture; such copies are more surely failures than those from any other of the painter's works. The mere handling is a marvel; the ease and freedom of the work, the thick impasto of tints that are heaped on the upper sky, making the lower parts recede in true perspective to the rising sun; the grand way in which the vessel moves over the watery floor; the dream-like poetry of the whole, make up a picture without a parallel in the world of art."

It was greatly admired even by those who could not fully enter into its meaning.

Turner was one day dining with a large party, and sat opposite a gentleman and lady, who every now and then glanced at him furtively, and then whispered to each other.

"I know what you are talking about," said Turner, his eyes full of fun. "You are talking of my picture."

The gentleman bowed, and acknowledged the fact.

"And where do you think I got the subject from?" asked Turner.

"Why, from the Odyssey, of course."

"Not a bit of it, my dear sir; I took it from Tom Dibdin. Don't you remember the words?"

"He ate his mutton, drank his wine,
And then he poked his eye out."

Another of Turner's great pictures is, "The Slave Ship," purchased for thirty thousand dollars by J. Taylor Johnson, of New York. Ruskin says he would choose this, "were he reduced to rest Turner's immortality on any single work." And the picture must, indeed, be grandly impressive to answer his description.

"It is a sunset on the Atlantic," he writes, "after prolonged storm; but the storm is partially lulled, and the torn and streaming rain-clouds are moving in scarlet lines to lose themselves in the hollow of the night. The whole surface of the sea included in the picture is divided into two ridges of enormous swell, not high nor local, but a low, broad heaving of the whole ocean, like the lifting of its bosom by deep-drawn breath after the torture of the storm. Between these two ridges the fire of the sunset falls along the trough of the sea, dying it with an awful but glorious light, the intense and lurid splendor which burns like gold, and bathes like blood. Along this fiery path and valley, the tossing waves by which the swell of the sea is restlessly divided lift themselves in dark, indefinite, fantastic forms, each casting a faint and ghastly shadow behind it along the illumined foam. They do not rise everywhere, but three or four together in wild groups, fitfully and furiously, as the under-strength of the swell compels or permits them; leaving between them treacherous spaces of level and whirling water; now lighted with green and lamp-like fire; now flashing back the gold of the declining sun; now fearfully dyed from above with the indistinguishable images of the burning clouds which fall upon them in flakes of crimson and scarlet, and give to the reckless waves the added motion of their own fiery flying. Purple and blue, the lurid shadows of the hollow breakers are cast upon the mist of the night, which gathers cold and low, advancing like the shadow of death upon the guilty ship as it labors amidst the lightning of the sea, its thin masts written upon the sky in lines of blood, girded with condemnation in that fearful hue which signs the sky with horror, and mixes its flaming flood with the sunlight and, cast far along the desolate heave of the sepulchral waves, incarnadines the multitudinous sea."

Toward the last, it is said, Turner completely ignored details, so that his works seemed rather schemes for pictures than attempts at realization. He appeared to think it enough to render the great truths of sun and shade, and so confused and commingled forms that it was difficult, if not impossible, to make them out. Being asked once what a certain object in one corner of his picture was meant to represent, he replied: "I don't know, but will call it a wheelbarrow."

Critics have alluded to his later style as occasioned by declining powers; but how came it then that the change was observed in his oil painting only, and not in his water-color? Ruskin indignantly refutes the accusation, and explains the infinite truth and meaning underlying Turner's mystery.

Perfect and delicate were the water-colors he painted, even in old age. Great as he was in the nobler medium of oil, he rises almost higher in this other art, inventing, as it were, the very methods he used, or at least applying those of others so judiciously that one never thinks of the process in admiring the effect produced.

"Water-color," says Redgrave, "seemed to lend itself readily to the imitation of those effects in nature he so much loved to represent—nature lost in a blaze of light rather than dimmed with a twilight gloom—and thus it happens that his works in this medium mostly embody some evanescent effect, be it flood of sunshine bursting forth after storms, or careering in gleams over the plain, the mountain or the sea; or some wrack of clouds, some passing shower or rainbow of promise refreshing the gladdened and glistening earth."

Turner's idealism, rather than his realism, made him the greatest landscape painter of the world. As early as 1816, Leslie wrote to his friends in America: "Turner is my great favorite of all the artists here. He combines the highest poetical imagination with an exquisite feeling for all the truth and individuality of nature; and he has shown that the ideal, as it is called, is not the improving of nature, but the selecting and combining objects that are most in harmony and character with each other."

We all know that a picture's real value depends upon its suggestiveness. One must be led on and on, as it were, right into the heart of a painting, and at each step grasp new and beautiful meanings, or it will finally cease to give pleasure either to eye or heart. And this is why a mere blot of Turner's will often stimulate thought more than a finished production by another artist.

From Leslie's estimate of Turner, let us turn now to that of Thackeray. He is describing "The Fighting Téméraire," "as grand a painting," he asserts, "as ever figured on the walls of any academy, or came from the easel of any painter. The old Téméraire is dragged to her last home by a little, spiteful, diabolical steamer. A mighty red sun, amidst a host of flaring clouds, sinks to rest on one side of the picture, and illumines a river that seems interminable, and a countless navy that fades away into such a wonderful distance as never was painted before. The little steamer is belching out a volume (why do I say a volume? not a hundred volumes could express it) of foul, lurid, red-hot, malignant smoke, paddling furiously, and lashing up the water round about it; while behind it (a cold, gray moon looking down on it), slow, sad, and majestic, follows the brave old ship, with death, as it were, written on her. * * * It is absurd, you will say (and with a great deal of reason), for Titmarsh or any other Briton to grow so politically enthusiastic about a four-foot canvas, representing a ship, a steamer, a river, and a sunset. But herein surely lies the power of the great artist. He makes you see and think of a great deal more than the objects before you; he knows how to soothe or to intoxicate, to fire or to depress, by a few notes, or forms, or colors, of which we cannot trace the effect to the source, but only acknowledge the power."

Of "The Slave Ship" Thackeray says with delightful candor, "I don't know whether it is sublime or ridiculous." He lays it down that the "first quality of an artist is to have a large heart, believing that all art, all imaginative work of the highest order, must originate in and be addressed to the best powers of the soul, must submit the shows of things to the desires of the mind."

In person Turner did not look like a man of genius. He was short and stout, with a red face, aquiline nose, and keen, restless eyes. He had a sturdy sailor-like walk, and a voice deep and musical, but was a confused and unintelligible speaker. Yet "in careless conversation," says Leslie, "he often expressed himself happily, and was very playful." He was social by nature, and at a dinner-table joyous, yet at times secluded himself completely from the world. He usually wore while painting a dingy black coat, and two comforters, one wrapped round his head, the other his throat. This, together with his rollicking eye and unintelligible jokes, gave him something of a resemblance to the elder Weller. He never would sit for a portrait, and seemed to know, as if by intuition, when a student in the Academy attempted to sketch it, and at once changed his position. The only authentic likeness of him extant is a profile drawing by Dance.

Fishing was his sole amusement. On rainy days, he might often be seen wending his way to the river-side, carrying a dilapidated cotton umbrella and a fishing-rod, and dressed in the oddest fashion—a flabby hat, ill-fitting green coat, and nankeen trousers much too short. From early morning till late nightfall he would sit upon the river bank, shielded by his umbrella, the rain pouring down, and patiently wait for a nibble. Sometimes he was successful, sometimes not, and he was always proud of a good day's sport.

All through his life he was in the habit of absenting himself for uncertain periods from the knowledge of his household and his friends. At last, during one of these absences, he died, under an assumed name, in a cottage at Chelsea, on the 19th of December, 1851. Some years before he had said to Chantrey, referring to his picture of "Carthage," "I have appointed you one of my executors. When I am dead, will you promise to see me rolled up in that picture?"

"Yes," said Chantrey, "and I promise you also that as soon as you are buried I will see you taken up and unrolled."

Chantrey died first, but Turner's words were remembered, and Dean Milman said at his funeral, "I will not read the service over him if he is to be wrapped up in that picture."

Of course he was not, and it made one of the noble collection he bequeathed to his country. For some years before his death he refused to sell his pictures and was evidently preserving them for the great purpose expressed in his will. This was to leave them to the nation as a permanent record of his genius. So much of his will has been carried out, and England possesses nearly twenty thousand specimens of his work.

His funded property, amounting to nearly two hundred thousand pounds, he left to found an asylum for decayed artists. This project, too, he had cherished for years, and it partially excuses his strange and sordid love of money. Yet, owing to some technical defect in the wording of his will, it has never been carried out.

It has been asserted that Turner did not believe in a future life, but let us hope that at the last some ray of divine comfort visited his lonely death-bed, and taught him the faith in things celestial that would so have enhanced the splendor of his genius.

DRUNKENNESS and covetousness do much resemble one another; for the more a man drinketh, the more he thirsteth; and the more he hath, still the more he coveteth.

TWELVE YEARS AGO.

BY E. MILLER CONKLIN.

TWELVE years ago, beloved one!
Twelve rapid, changeful years;
And some brought joy and gladness,
And some brought loss and tears!
Some days were bright with sunshine,
And some were dark with rain;
But, taking the years together,
We've known more joy than pain!

Twelve years ago, my dearest!
It scarcely seems so long,
Since hand in hand we started
In holy purpose strong.
The fields grow ever whiter,
The laborers fall and die,
And we must work the faster,
For night is drawing nigh!

SCORN.

BY EMMA SANBORN.

YOU heard it—a woman's laugh—
Light, and mocking, and vain,
Borne on the evening air,
Which the light winds echoed again.

You heard it—the cruel word;
You saw it—the covert sneer,
With hidden meaning fraught,
Doing such mischief here.

O lady in silken robes!
Scorning the one at your side,
Moving in stately pomp,
Breaking a heart in your pride.

Think of the nights of pain,
Think of her weary woe,
Think of her watchings vain,
Be merciful ere you go!

WHINING.

THERE is a class of persons in this world, by no means small, whose prominent peculiarity is whining. They whine because they are poor, or, if rich, because they have no health to enjoy their riches; they whine because it is too sunny; they whine because they have "no luck," and others' prosperity exceeds theirs; they whine because some friends have died and they are still living; they whine because they have aches and pains, and they have aches and pains because they whine; and they whine no one can tell why. Now we would like to say a word to these whining persons. First, stop whining—it is of no use complaining, fretting, fault-finding and whining. Why, you are the most deluded set of creatures that ever lived! Do you not know that it is a well-settled principle of physiology and common sense that these habits are more exhausting to nervous vitality than almost any other violation of physiological law? And do you not know that life is pretty much as you make it? You can make it bright and sunny, or you can make it dark and shadowy. This life is meant only to discipline us—to fit us for a higher and purer state of being. Then stop whining and fretting, and go on your way rejoicing.

GOING TO SCHOOL.

LITTLE maiden, where away
 On this lovely summer day?
 Don't you hear the robins sing?
 Humming-birds are on the wing,
 Flowers are blooming everywhere,
 Making sweet the pleasant air.
 Stop awhile and play with me
 By the cool stream running free;
 Come, my little maid! I know
 Where the mint and cresses grow;
 Where the grass is soft and green,
 And the brightest flowers are seen.
 Come!"

And the little maiden said,
 As she shook her dainty head,
 "I am on my way to school,
 And I cannot break the rule."

In my face she gravely smiled;
 Then I stooped and kissed the child.
 She went singing on her way,
 Bright and beautiful as May;
 I went homeward, saying low,
 In my thought of long ago,
 "Ah, if in life's daily school
 I had never broke the rule!"

FIFTY YEARS AGO; OR, THE CABINS OF THE WEST.

BY ROSELLA RICK.

No. 4.

EVERYBODY knew Tom Lawton and Bessie Carnahan were engaged, and people said it came of that husking-bee at Judge Lee's, the November before. All came about because of that one ear of red corn! What great events do spring from little things!

They danced together a good deal that night, and Tom kept watching Bessie and hovering about her, and when the vine of bitter-sweet berries that were twined in among her black curls came loose, Tom's deft fingers were the first to put in place the pretty ornament.

Uncle Dick said he mistrusted something uncommon when Parson Belden preached in the barn back of Judge Lee's cabin, for, instead of Bessie riding to meeting that day with the family in the ox-wagon, as she usually did, she came a-foot down across the thorn-thicket and the creek bottom to the rifle, and then she and Tom waded. Tom wanted to carry her over, but she wouldn't hear to it, and just slipped off her shoes and stepped across behind him as nimbly as an Indian girl would.

It was considered a little unsafe, then, going to meeting, or going almost any place, so that day of which I speak, the men all carried their muskets and rifles, and when they got to the barn they stacked them. Parson Belden stood beside some kind of a receptacle for grain. It was made out of a hollow sycamore log about four feet high, with circumference in proportion, and covered with flat strips of bark. His Bible and David's Psalms lay on this, and his musket leaned up against it. The people sat around him on logs, and blocks, and on the clean puncheon floor. Some of the women put their babies over into the mows on the straw, and hay, and flax, and set older children to watch them and keep them quiet. The preacher's wife, a white-faced, little woman, sat with Mother Fisher and Hannah Gwin on the flax-break, a heavy, cumbersome utensil which, in those days, held a post of honor in barns as high as a piano does now in our parlors. Tom Lawton and Bessie Carnahan sat on the scutching-block as it lay tipped over on one side.

One of Fisher's boys was living at Carnahan's when Tom Lawton asked Bessie in marriage of her father. He was a witness of the transaction, and we used to hear him laugh over it and tell all about it, after he was an old man himself. This was the way he told it:

"I seed all the time that there was suthin' a-brewin', an' I's bound to watch Tom, 'cause I didn't know but I'd have fur to ask some old man fur his darter some day. Tom he kep' a-hangin' reound, an' a-hangin' reound, an' I made bizzness to be about all the time. I headed that feller mor' 'n a thousan' times, I did, jus' when the 'portant words were a-stickin' in his thrapple; hee, hee! heeh! Poor Tom! 'f I'd a kneown all I wouldn't a-pestered him no how, like as I did, but I was young-like, an' full o' the old scratch an' willin' to do 'most anything that was kind o' larfable and mischievous-like. Times was pretty hard that summer—the old man was in a pinch to raise money, an' we had all turned out and dug reuts—columbo, and spignut, and gingsang—an' arter we'd got 'em clean an' about half dry, the old man said we'd hitch up the ox-team and take 'em to town to sell. Old man he was a-dickerin' an' a-hagglin' about the price o' reuts, fur the marchant stuck a heap on 't 'cause they want fust-class an' clean dry, but arter 'while he gin in, an' he an' the old man made a bargain.

"Wall, Tom, he stuck like a burr to the old man—cluster mor' any brother would—an' while they was a-hitchin' up Buck an' Bright, I was inside o' the shed purtendin' to be gittin' the kiverlid an' things, an' all to onct I hearn Tom hem, and haw, and cough-like, an' then he blurted right out, like as if he was a-speakin' a piece at an exhibition: 'Mister Carnahan, may I have your darter Betsey?'

"An' then old man Carnahan he turned reound, like as if he'd hearn a clap o' thunder, an' he said: 'What say, Tom?' An' then poor Tom he had fur to go over the whole lingo again, an' I tell you he hussled through it as though the old Harry was arter him.

"'Mister Carnahan, may I have your darter Betsey?'

"The poor, old, dumbfounded critter, he looked right deown at the two noistrils in Buck's nose, an' he hurried an' said: 'I s'pose so, Tom.' An' that's all there was of it, an' there I was e'en a'most bustin' to larf, an' a peekin' through a leetle crack in the shed.

"Well, what does that old man do but go right off to Purdy's store an' buy Bessie a weddin' dress an' a pair o' slippers out o' the interest-money that he'd dug, an' tolled, and turmolded to get. The gown was o' that sort of stuff we called painted muslin—whitish, with pea-vines, and roses, and poppies, and hunny-suckles just a-runnin' helter-skelter, hippity-click, all over it. It was the perfectest thing I ever seed. I swear if it didn't make a feller think of a reg'lar flower-gardin, heaps on heaps o' posies! But afore we got three miles on our way hum'ards, I knowed that that stuff 'd never be Bessie's weddin' gown! The bag in which the old man put his things drapt out, an' we didn't miss it till we'd gone a right smart step, an' then I got eout an' run back to get it. I kneowed 't wa'n't very fur back, 'cause I'd noticed the bag lyin' there, like as if it was dumb an' hed no secret inside of it. Wall, I found it in a little holler at the side o' the road, an' I'll be beound if it wa'n't layin' on a little, longish hill-lock that looked exactly like a reg'lar grave! It looked as smooth, and green, an' mournful-like—abeaut six feet long and 'portioned accordin'ly. My heart stood still for a minnet, the larf was all gone out o' me, the sweat started an' I felt as if I'd hed a tech o' palsey. The bag lay right on the grave, or what 'peared to be a grave, an' when I stooped to pick it up my hair seemed to raise up, an' I fairly groaned. It was e'en a'most sunset then, an' the katydids an' crickets had begun their lonesome singin' in the brambly fence corners a-near me, an' as I laid the bag acrost my arm some sort of a great, black night-bird, with a queer whirr in its big, loose wings, swep' down, cuttin' the air clost to my head an' 'lighted on a fence-stake that leaned over towards the grave. Its tail an' wings hung kind o' loose-like an' sort o' mournful, an' it screamed out the pitifulest cry I ever hearn tell of. Laws! I couldn't compare it to nothin' but the wailin' cry of a broken-hearted, despairin' woman! I never believed much in signs an' tokens, but Grand'ther Jones allus did, an' he'd kind o' teach'd me such things—I kind o' 'herited it from him, somehow. As soon as I could pucker up courage enough, I tell you I got out o' that lonesome place; the grass didn't grow under my feet on my way back to where the old man an' Tom was a-waitin' fur me. The ride home was a very quiet one; I couldn't converse, I hadn't the heart to do it; I felt more as if I was froze, or turned to stun, or suthin'."

There was a rude pathos in the way Fisher used to tell this story that touched me more than the most eloquent language would have done.

Well, while Bessie Carnahan went on spinning and weaving webs of linen to make sheets and tablecloths, Tom worked away and paid for a little bit of land. It was a pretty nook, in sight of the big bend in the creek; part of it was bottom land, and part bluff and broken. A ripple, or "riffle," the old settlers will persist in calling it, was so near, that the rushing and rippling and the swash of the clear waters, so beautifully broken into white foam, could distinctly be heard from the bluff bank on which Tom had selected a site for the cabin which was to be the home.

There never was a happier prospective bride than Bessie. How she toiled! Would you like to see some of the handiwork of a girl of fifty years ago? Step into the double log-house, the dwelling, the home of her well-to-do-father, and see for yourself. First, there is a bed made of goose and duck feathers, weight fifteen pounds, all of Bessie's own pickin', her mother said. Even the feather tick was home-made, cotton filling and fine flax chain well beaten together, two bangs of the sleys to every throw of the shuttle; then before the feathers were put in it was nicely starched on the wrong side, the starch made thick and rubbed on with the hand. Three frolicsome generations might kick such a feather bed to their hearts' content, and it never would "shed a feather"—at least that was what all the old women said; and they took pinches of the tick between thumb and fingers, and rubbed it so vigorously that if there had been any deception they would have proven it. Then there were pillows to match, encased in slips of snow-white linen. The upper sheets were fine flax, both warp and woof; the lower sheets were half tow, and would wear very soft and smooth. She had three quilts; the nicest was made of "boughten stuff," pieced in a figure called Washington's March; though why it was dignified by this name no one could tell, for there was nothing in it that smacked of the military, nothing that suggested a march; but some one said the blocks did look a leetle like the soles of men's feet a-tramping round in a kind of a forlorn chase.

The other two quilts were made of the flaps of worn-out linen shirts, pieced in with copperas and white half-worn breadths of linen dresses. Batching could not be obtained, so Bessie made bats out of soft tow on the hard cards, on her knees; each bat could be split open, and they made a very good substitute. Her straw tick was thin tow cloth, woven in what was called "half-sleyed" goods, that meant half as thick as good, firm cloth.

She had a half-dozen tablecloths, and the same of towels, besides three or four bleached towels that were intended to be hung up on the walls in the prettiest and most conspicuous places. One large towel of the diamond pattern was already fixed to hang under the mirror that her mother had given her. She had an old cat surrounded by nine kittens cut out of black cloth and stitched on the white background of the towel.

No good housewife would deem herself competent for household duties and honors if the customary cat and kittens held not their place on the wall. Sometimes the cat looked as though she had dropsey in the head, and the kittens gave evidence of being similarly afflicted; but that was a matter of little consequence.

Then Bessie had a needle-cushion made out of bits of the gay gowns of grandma's, and aunt's, and cousin's. A curious cushion that was as full of points as a prickly cactus, and on the tip of every point was a tuft or tassel of bright woollen yarn.

Of edibles there were little bags full of dried plums, and cherries, and wild grapes, and sweet corn, and currants, and dewberries; crocks and jars of pickles and crab-apples; and funniest of all, she had three pairs of worn-out, snow-white linen pantaloons full of good cheer. The bottoms of the legs were tied up, and then they were stuffed full and buttoned up. One pair was filled with dried pumpkin, another with dried squash, and the third with hazelnuts. To have them out of the way, they were set astride of a pole in one corner, and an old quilt thrown over them. They looked like three headless horsemen. But in every thrifty cabin home in those early days it was common during the winter months to see last summer's linen pantaloons doing good service in this way.

Fisher, our old story-teller, used to tell us of a tornado that swept across the country of the far West in the year of 1812. It levelled the forest trees in its course, unroofed cabins, and left desolation in its track. Fisher's eyes would stick out in terror while he pursued the narration, but he always ended with a laugh that made rosy and dimpled his round old face. The incident that finished up the story—that was like the cracker on a whiplash—came in after this rollicking fashion: "Well, you see, me and Joe, we hed our old trousers filled with hicker'nuts an' hazelnuts, had 'em up next to the ruff settin' straddle of a pole-like, out o' mam's way an' Reuth's, an' when the pesky storm come a-tearin' across the hills, an' up the crick vally, oh, wuss nor any swearin' or cussin'! Wy, me an' Joe, we was grubbin' in the lot ferment the still-housen, an' all we could do was to fall flat on our faces right down in the muck. The sky was black as a hat, an' the air was full o' trees, an' brush, an' litter, and such, just a-turnin' eend over eend, awful-like. Joe said we ort to pray, an' he begun to pray, 'Now I lay me deown to sleep.' I rolled up my eyes just in time to see the ruff swep o' 'n the cabin, an' then I closed 'em, an' the last I remember was hearin' Joe sayin', 'If I should die afore I wake.' 'I thought my time hed come sure an' sartin, but it didn't last no longer than I'm tellin' on't. But the fun of it was that Joe's britches full of hazelnuts were clean gone, lifted up an' kerried off, and nobody knowed hide nor hair o' them. It must 'a' been a month arter that, one day I was out cuttin' a hick'ry to make mam a new broom, an' what should I see away up in the very tip top of a tall tree but Joe's white linen britches, settin' there straddle o' the topmost fork o' the tree, as compo-zed as a preacher! It was a joke on Joe, I tell you, an' he lost no time a-gitten them out o' that. Nary a nut was lost; he had buttoned them up snug-like, an' then sowed 'em, an' so they come back all right; but, Jereusalem! how mad Joe ust to git when any of us 'd remind him o' thet prayer down in the muck durin' the windfall of '12—hee! hee! heeh! But, then, poor fellar, 'twas all the prayer he knowed. Dear me, he got to be pretty glib-like at prayin' arter he jined the Methody. I've seed him pray till the sweat 'd roll deown his face like punkins rollin' deown a hill. He was mighty in prayer when he got well stirred up, and his blood warmed, and his sperits roused like. Why he'd make the mourners howl like wolves when he got fairly under way, Joe would! But then Joe's gin cout long ago; he made his peace with his Maker, an' he drawed up his cold shanks, an' shet his own eyes with his own han's, an' just went easy as a taller dip that was snuffed out."

The little log cabin was raised. It stood on the bluff Tom had selected and Bessie approved. It was small—perhaps twelve by sixteen feet. Tom furnished the whisky the day of the raising, and all went off pleasantly. Sometimes on such occasions men would take too much and get to feeling too rich, and wise, and stout, and self-important, and then fights would be the result.

Old settlers tell us of one laughable incident that occurred on the day of Tom Lawson's raising. A poor man had entered a quarter section of land, and by dint of close economy had made two payments on it, and another was nearly due. He expected to raise the money by selling some pork. He had it on hands, hoping a waiting for a better price. The day before the raising, he heard that there was no market whatever for pork, that it would not bring money at all. His spirits sank down to zero. What would or could he do? He ate no supper. He knew his land must be forfeited, his family left homeless. He tossed in bed all night, and in the morning at the table he played with his corn dodger, but ate it not. His cup of rye coffee stood untasted. When he went to the raising, he walked along like a slinking dog, and smiled a ghastly smile when his comrades hailed him with, "Look as though ye'd lost the boss race!" "Look as though the corporal'd be called on to hold an conquest over ye!" People pitied him, and the well disposed ones passed him the jug frequently.

It was not long until his spirits rallied, his gloomy prospects began to brighten; maybe pork would be worth something; and soon he felt so well that he leaped up in the air, essayed to clap his feet together three times before alighting, and in a wonderfully elated voice squealed out: "Yeep! yeep! pork'll be all right yit! Yeep! yeep!"

As the job progressed, the poor man felt better and better; a prospect for the sale of pork grew to be a sure thing. Unusual merriment prevailed among the men when they witnessed the change in their companion. He leaped, and whirled, and capered about on one shambling leg, using his arms for a fiddle and a bow, all the while piping out in a thin, shrill voice: "Yeep! yeep! po-rick's riz! po-rick's up! I'm all right, fren's. Yeep! yeep!"

And now, after the lapse of fifty-five long years, we almost held our breath as we waited for the answer to our query, "How did it end with the poor man?"

"Oh, he came out all right; pork did come up, and he made his payment," was the gratifying answer.

Grand'ther Jones, as everybody called him, because he was the oldest man in the neighborhood, was at Tom's raising, and he drank just enough to make him a little flushed and a little mellow. He was a very superstitious man, had signs for everything—could stop blood, and cure felons, and blow out fire, and tell fortunes, and find lost money, and foretell events—indeed, he was the astrologer in those early days. One class of persons regarded him with a holy veneration.

When they were putting the clap-board roof on the cabin, the old man, who was sitting on a stump in front, stared suddenly, opened his mouth, wiped his hand across his face, and said in a low voice: "Gad, sure! Tom'll never live in that housen! Poor feller, that's hard on 'im. I'd a gin the best keow on my place 'n that hadn't happened."

Fisher was near, and he said: "What see, grand'ther?"

But the old man worked his lips as if they were dry and needed a wetting, and he only looked wise and glum, and said: "Jess, parse me the joog."

And forthwith the cob was taken out of the ample jug, and it was lifted up to the eager lips, and steadied in the hands of Grand'ther Jones. The old man averred afterward that at the same moment he had seen two Toms.

The Sabbath day following the raising there was meeting at the house of Judge Lee. The judge read one of Whitfield's sermons, and they had singing of hymns and prayer. This was customary service in those early days. It made the Sabbath seem holy, and it held in restraint those who would have spent the day in visiting, strolling, or, perhaps, hunting. All honor to those Christian pioneers in their observances of that day.

Tom walked home with Bessie from meeting. He was generally cheerful and his words were even, and serene, and pleasant, but this day he was gloomy. Bessie rallied him on his despondency, but Tom's eyes filled with tears, his lips quivered and he leaned his head down on his arm on the rude puncheon table. Fanny, the puppy, always ready for a frolic with Tom, nestled her little pink nose between his feet and whined pettishly, and then she toyed with the rosette on his moccasin, but Tom heeded her not.

In the afternoon, Tom took down Bessie's little, blue sunbonnet from its peg on the wall, and, with a mournful smile, put it on her head and tied the bow under the pretty curve of her chin and then said: "Let us take a walk."

Their walk led to the new cabin. They went inside, and Bessie, with girlish glee, told how she would arrange their little stock of household goods, what would stand here, and what there. Then they went outside, and she thanked Tom for his thoughtfulness in leaving the young maple close to the window, and the forked elm where it would droop down upon one end of the cabin roof, and the pretty cluster of dogwoods on the shelving bank above the spring.

Tom was still gloomy. He drew her arm within his, and they walked down to the beautiful bank of the creek, and then followed its curve around to where he had cut the logs to finish the cabin. The white chips lay thick upon the green ivy that covered the ground like a carpet.

"And now, Bessie, I have something to tell you," said Tom, laying his hand on her shoulder, and turning her face full upon his own. "I don't think I'm whimsical, or full o' notions, or a bit like Grand'ther Jones, but I've seen something that I can't account for, no how. Don't be scared, now, but just listen to me and see what you make of it yourself. I was standing right here, yesterday, kind o' thinking and looking up the creek—it was well on toward evening—and what should I see but a coffin come drifting along. Just as plain and fair a coffin as I ever laid eyes on in my life! I moved up closer and bent over and looked, and rubbed my eyes and looked, and shifted about, but yet it was the very same—a dark, red, stained coffin about six feet long. Some of the time the water'd splash up over one end of it, and sometimes it would veer around and float sidewise, and when it come about even with where I stood, it slowly sank—just like a coffin as it was going down into the grave—slowly and mournfully. I don't believe in signs or whims, but, Bessie, I can't help but think that one of us is going to die, and I believe it's myself. The coffin was nearer my length than yours. But how could the good Lord part us now, just when we're so happy," and the poor fellow sobbed a long, quivering sob that broke into a piteous cry of sore distress.

The two sat down with their arms entwined about each other and wept. Then Bessie slowly ceased sobbing and said: "O Tom, we are silly—just as like as not the coffin you saw was a bit of a log, or a box, or something of the kind," and the poor girl essayed to smile.

"Bessie, dear child!" was all the sorrowing lover said, as he pushed back her hair and looked so tenderly into her large brown eyes.

So they tried to comfort each other as they walked home in the gray twilight, and the twinkling stars came out one by one, and seemed to look down upon the pair in pity—poor Tom and poor Bessie. They were loth to part that evening; they said good-bye again and again, and then when Tom closed the gate, he turned and, as she entered the door, he waved his hand. Bessie thought he never appeared so pretty as he did that day and evening, and she stood and watched him until he crossed the bars that led into the sugar camp.

The next day, Bessie was down at the meadow brook rinsing some skeins of flax thread that she had boiled in ashes and water. The last skein was shaken out and she stood floating it in the water and watching the brown threads separate, when she heard the tramp of a horse's hoofs swiftly coming down the lane. She looked up and saw a neighbor, Ralph Waterson, riding on Jack Slater's dapple gray. Strange! Jack never would loan Ralph his horse! What could be the matter?

"Ho, Bessie!" hailed the familiar voice; "awful, isn't it? Tom's killed down on the bank o' the crick! awful for the Lawson's!" and he dashed past her in his shirt sleeves, without a hat, his hair blown back by the wind, and nothing on the horse save a rude halter.

Bessie remembered only of flying to the house and falling into her mother's arms, after that came a blessed season of unconsciousness.

Fisher told us the rest of the story as he sat, one winter evening, in the warmest corner with his arm-chair tipped back against the wall.

"I seed Tom as he went to his work that very mornin' with his ax on his shoulder. He was a-whistlin' some sort of a mournful song that was rale techin'. He went to fall a tree an' it fell agin' another, leas'taways that's how it 'peared to be, an' a big limb glanced and struck 'im right in the forehead an' it must 'a' been done so sudden that the poor feller never dreamt o' what killed him. There wa'n't a piece of his skull left as big as the half o' my hand, an' his poor brains were spattered round on the saplin's, an' ivy, and the logs, and the big white chips, awful like. Oh, it was a terrible blow fur the whole neighborhood! I thought the Carnahans and Lawsons would go clean daft over his death. Poor Tom! we gethered up the pieces and put 'em in a coffin in some sort o' ship-shape an' laid a white towel over what 'peared to be his head, an' then the girls, our Reuth an' some of 'em, heaped a lot o' posies into the jubious places inside the coffin an' made it seem kind o' tolerable like. I'd never a doubt in my mind but what Tom had a warnin' when he see the coffin come a driftin' down the crick—I think, as grand'ther Jones used to say, that folks offen hev warnin's of death an' that they'd ort for to heed them and profit by them."

More than twenty years ago the railway invaded the sacred spot near which poor Tom Lawson built his little cabin. The site of the lowly home is now in one corner of a broad and beautifully sloping meadow. The big bend in the creek is spanned by a massive bridge of iron, and the tall oaks and sycamores look down upon the thundering trains as they go whizzing by, freighted with busy human lives. Tired travellers look out and their eyes brighten as they gaze upon the sylvan spot, and they exclaim, "how beautiful; how perfect the picture!" Little do they dream of the sad story interlinked with this bit of pretty landscape, little reck they of the tragic scene these old trees looked down upon more than half a century ago.

After many years Bessie married. Stricken in years, now she sits in her easy chair and smiles as she watches the graceful gambols of her grandchildren. The traveller on the same line of railroad often sees her, an old lady with snowy hair parted smoothly on her placid brow, sitting out on the porch at a low white cottage by the wayside, rocking softly and dreamily to and fro, sometimes her knitting lying in her lap, and sometimes the broad pages of the open Bible with the soft summer breezes playing with its precious leaves. Sometimes her head rests on a pillow that loving ones have gently placed there, and she sits and dreams and her little, shrunken hands lie folded over the gracious promises that soothed her to sleep.

When she smiles at the visions she sees in dream-land, and a glory seems to settle down on her calm face and make it radiant and beautiful, who knows but the old love of her girlhood has come back to her and together they hold sweet communion on the verge of that land which is bathed in the golden glow of immortality. Who knows?

The Story-Teller.

WHO MELINDA MARRIED.

BY MADGE CARROL.

"SO you're back again with your old employers, and at a first-class salary. I'm very glad, I assure you, and so will my husband be when I tell him. Sorry you can't stay to tea with us on account of the children. How old is your oldest, Tommy?"

"Let me see." The individual addressed balanced his hat between his knees on both little fingers, and carefully studied its interior, as though the information he sought lurked somewhere under the lining. A great, blonde-bearded man, but he always was and always would be Tommy. Never being able to rid himself of a certain awkward bashfulness, nor ever having lost the big, innocent eyes, honest mouth and ruddy complexion that made him look like an overgrown schoolboy. "Amanda's eleven this June. Lucy was nine in February. Melinda seven, and Vinnie—that's the baby my wife left, you know—will be three to-morrow."

"All girls?"

"Yes, ma'am, all girls."

"How long since you left the city?"

"Let me see," and Tommy again consulted his hat. Although in Mrs. Sandburn's parlor, he couldn't be persuaded to part with his head covering. It was a life-long habit. Before he married, the girls used to say Tommy Whittlesey knew that if he let them take his hat, he'd never have the courage to get it again and go. Perhaps they were right; I don't know; at any rate he had contracted another habit, and that was referring to it in the way described. "I left the spring I was twenty-one, didn't I? Well, I've been away thirteen years. I married Amanda White just six months after I left."

"She made a good wife, didn't she?"

"The very best; but, then, it wasn't as though I'd married Melinda."

"No. I suppose not; and yet, Tommy, I tell you, as I've always told you, Melinda's not altogether worthy of you. Not that she isn't good principled, warm-hearted, and all that, but her views of life are false. Then, too, although she's my sister, my only one, I must say she sets too high a value on herself. Is not by any means as brilliant as she thinks she is. Doesn't know gold from glitter. Why, my dear, young friend, you might have been a pretty bad sort of man, but if you'd come along with a flash and dash, made believe to be somebody great, and courted in Jane Eyre's Rochester's style, you would have won her years ago."

"Then you think there's no chance for me. Is anybody else in the way?"

"Nobody, and never has been, excepting the girl herself. To my certain knowledge, she's had but one offer beside yours. That was from old Mr. Hulks, the great shipper. I thought Melinda would tear his eyes out. So, you see, she won't marry merely for money."

"Still, you think there's no chance for me? I daren't ask her, you know; she said the last time—when I came on after Amanda died, you remember—that if ever I did it again she'd never speak to me."

"Saying that she meant it, best not to venture. Let matters take their course. See her as often as possible, but keep a certain distance. Maybe things will work around somehow. She's got in with a new set lately—clever people—but they have a fancy they've discovered a new way to put the world to rights, and are just the ones to do it. It's all well enough, I suppose. Amuses them and don't hurt anybody, but I'm out of patience, for all. Why couldn't Melinda have married you years ago, in her first youth? She is so capable, so domestic—or was before she got in with these new folks—and as for children, I really believe mine think as much of her as they do of me. She's sharp with them at times, it's true, but then it always turns out for their best good, and they see it. See here, Tommy, I've an idea. She visits the Park the day the society meets—that's to-morrow—to commune with nature, she says. I know her favorite spot; she's always alone; you go there, take the children, and get somewhere near her."

"Take the children! I'd frighten her miles and miles away."

"No, you wouldn't. The more I reflect on this plan, the better I like it. Ask for a half-holiday, gather up your girls, and go."

The day was all that could be desired. A May-blue sky, with a drift of clouds like departing snow across it; warm, penetrating sunbeams; soft airs, alive with children's voices and bird-warblings.

Spring's blossom-host pitched their tents of white and pink on hill and valley-side; tender mists of green melted in golden distance. Earth and air were awake, jubilant, under the stir and whirl of new life and growth. Yet could not my heroine find herself in harmony with the scene. She succeeded in securing her favorite seat in the Park, a niche on the hillside, with an interlacing of boughs, and glimpses of rock and river. It contained only two settees. Occupying one, she spread her shawl on the other, thus keeping intruders at bay. A quiet little spot, festooned with hanging-vines and fringed with ferns; and yet to-day no restful influence pervaded it.

Melinda met Tommy Whittlesy just as he was leaving the afternoon previous. Somehow those big, blue, reproachful eyes met hers whichever way she looked. More especially did they haunt the page she tried in vain to read, and moved in her pencil's wake when she turned to writing for relief. Not that she cared for their owner. Oh, never a particle. Any time since her fifteenth birthday, she had but to say, "I love you," to make Tommy the happiest of men. Yet she never did say it—never intended saying it. True, life was unsatisfactory. One dream after another faded; still there was a hope of her becoming something, being somebody; tied to Tommy, that was gone. As Mrs. Whittlesy, her days would be bounded on the east by breakfast, south by dinner, north by supper, and west by a basket of undarned stockings.

No, she never had said yes—never intended to say yes—emphasizing her resolution in angles and triangles on the soft soil sparkling with its myriad particles of mica.

Was there ever—no, there never was—such impudence? Tommy Whittlesy and one, two, three, four feminine Whittlesys, walking in upon her seclusion quite as a matter of course. Yet, no, not altogether so. Tommy swayed awkwardly from side to side an instant, then, with a lift of the hat and a scrape meant for a bow, turned as red as the Giant of Battles, and dropped upon the other bench, also upon her shawl.

"This is Miss Denver, children," and Tommy almost stammered in his embarrassment. "Come and speak to the lady."

To rise and leave would be an acknowledgment of weakness; so, outwardly cool, yet inwardly burning, Melinda kept her seat, turning her attention to the children. A pink-dressed brood, each one a trifle overgrown, like their father, staring at her with his eyes, and making not the slightest pretence of manners.

"Who fastened your clothes?" she asked, seeing that Amanda's and Lucy's buttons began too soon and ended too late.

"The woman we board with."

"You're big enough to fasten them for each other. Come here, both of you."

After having straightened their backs, as Lucy afterward expressed it, she dismissed Amanda with, "Now look after your little sister, and turn your toes out. What's that on your dress?" to the third girl, who, singularly enough, reminded her of her own child-self.

"I don't know."

"It's a shame to have that pretty suit spoiled. I wonder if ammonia won't take it out? What's your name?"

"Melinda Denver Whittlesy."

Melinda senior actually flushed. "My name's Melinda Denver; did you know it? Keep your fingers out of your mouth!" and the sharpness of the tones betrayed unusual emotion of some sort.

Very shortly the oldest girls strayed away. Melinda said at once she must go, but taking Vinnie, who had got something in her shoe, delayed her. There proved to be nothing in that tiny pink boot. A hole in her stocking, through which peeped a toe as pink, caused the difficulty. Miss Denver rubbed the little foot, and was so long getting on the pink boot that the blonde, baby-head nodded against her breast, and at length found itself cradled there.

Tommy, sensible to a degree unparalleled in his history, asked to be excused for reading, and became so engrossed as to forget to turn his paper.

Below the river ran, flower-fringed rocks leaned out to catch a sunbeam, green boughs intertwined, the voices of unseen pleasure-seekers, mingled with bird-songs, made music in the air; dip of shadow, dart of wing, wind-whispers, how sweet it was!

While Melinda sat there with Tommy's youngest in her arms, and the man himself opposite, there came upon her a feeling that just such a scene was enacted once before. It was like the turning back of a leaf and finding the same passage, word for word, upon it. She was almost tempted to speak to her companion, and ask him about it, when all of a sudden there was a flutter of pink dresses, and Amanda and Lucy appeared before them, breathless.

"Is Melinda here?"

She was not, that was quite certain. Tommy took himself off, listening to their hurried explanations as he went, and the only woman in the world he ever loved was left alone with his baby.

The trio returned without the missing one. Thought there was a chance of finding her there. Their united voices arousing Vinnie, Melinda gave her into Tommy's arms.

"I'll go and see what I can do," she said, with the mien of a conqueror. "Children, you come right along with me. You're to tell me just where you went, and when you missed her. Tommy, you stay about here, there's a probability of her finding her way back."

Having issued her orders—short, sharp, decisive—Melinda hurried away; to be met by Tommy half an hour later, completely crest-fallen. Her search had failed. Tommy looked ready to drop; the girls sobbed bitterly, declaring "M'lin" was drowned in the river; while Melinda scanned the horizon for a guard whom she had not already consulted.

Suddenly a voice: "Madam, there's a little lost girl at the mansion, dressed like these; is she yours?"

"Yes, thank you, sir," replied Miss Denver, promptly, and headed the party that went toward the place indicated as fast as feet could carry them.

"We all go the same way," said Melinda, holding fast her namesake's hand, "and may as well start home at once."

"One word, Melinda. When the gentleman asked was this your little girl, you said yes; is she?"

"Of course," replied Miss Denver, her cheeks in a blaze. "These children need somebody to take care of them, and I'm the one to do it."

"Melinda Denver—excuse me, Mrs. Whittlesy, I should say—I'm surprised; completely so!" and the light of the new society shook her head sadly. "You told me again and again you never meant to marry that man."

"I haven't married him. I've married the children; that's all."

Still, Tommy looks as radiant as if it were himself.

RACHEL DILLOWAY'S SON.*

BY MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR.

CHAPTER XXIV.

IT was many days before Daisy was able to bear her weight upon the lame ankle. But, for a while, she hardly minded the confinement. Every pleasant morning, Rose and Roy wheeled the low lounge on which she lay, out on the verandah where, when the waves ran high, she could feel the touch of the salt spray upon her forehead. The child's couch became the centre round which the little household revolved. Rachel hovered about her with almost a mother's tenderness. Robert petted and played with her, and never came in without a store of pretty shells, sea-weeds, and mosses for her delectation. Roy sent to Linborough for such marvellous books, with pictures that were wonderful to behold. Janet told her stories, quaint and sweet as herself; and they two had such charming little dinners together, while the others were dining at the Ocean House. Daisy told Rose, confidentially—and at length announced the same fact to the assembled family—that she thought she was having ever so much better a time than if she had not sprained her ankle. To be sure, she could not run about, but what did that matter? She could look at the sea and feel it; and, then, every one was so kind to her.

Rose was very happy. In spite of the occasional hours of pain, the bloom seemed to be coming back to Daisy's cheeks again, and the light to the eyes that had grown so heavy. For herself, she was as one in a dream. Where had it all flown—the sense of isolation that had been so hard to bear? the feeling that she was shut out from the life to which she was born? that she had no longer any part or lot in the social world to which her mother had belonged? that it made no difference now, save as far as her own self-respect was concerned, whether she kept her youth, and freshness, and brightness, and whether her dresses were becoming or not? Life has lost much of its savor to a young girl, my friends, when she feels that it does not matter whether the pretty spring bonnet suits her complexion, or not!

"Now aren't you glad you took my advice, Rosy-posy?" said Daisy, one evening, as Rose was dressing for a hop at the Ocean House. "You would not have brought one of those lovely dresses and things, if it had not been for me."

Rose was glad as she put on the dainty, white dress, with its airy puffs and flutings, and the ornaments of frosted silver that she had not worn for over a twelvemonth. It had seemed such an absurdity when she packed them—merely to please Daisy; and, it maybe, moved by a thought of the dead mother, who was wont to say that a lady should never go anywhere without being prepared for all emergencies. Yes, she was glad, with a young girl's delight in freshness and daintiness; and in the consciousness that there were friendly, yet critical, eyes to see her, and to care whether she looked well or ill.

For these strangers of three weeks ago were friends now. Somehow, she felt that her life could never again be just what it had been before she knew them. Through them, she clasped hands with her kindred.

"Come and kiss me, Rose!" cried Daisy, her eyes suddenly brimming over. "I wish mamma could see you! You look just as lovely as Mrs. Dilloway."

There could be no higher compliment than that, Daisy thought. Rachel had won the child's heart completely.

"No," answered Rose, simply and honestly, "for I have not had her years to grow lovely in. No young girl could have a face like hers. There is so much in it, Daisy."

Daisy comprehended. "Yes," she said, with a gentle sigh. "But isn't it a little like what you read to me last Sunday? 'There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars?' You are not alike, but you are both lovely—and, Rosy-posy, that dress is too sweet for anything, now that you have the puffs pulled out!"

This climax was too much for Rose; and the little peal of laughter that followed was like the chiming of silver bells.

"What are you two so merry about?" asked Rachel, appearing in the door a moment after with a little basket in her hand, and glancing at Rose with well-pleased eyes. "Your toilet is just right, and hardly needs another touch. But Roy discovered, this afternoon, that there was a greenhouse over the bay, and he has just rowed across to get us some flowers. So here are roses for you, and pansies for me, and these violets must be for Daisy. They are just the color of her eyes."

The roses on her breast and in her hair were not brighter than those on Rose Sterling's cheeks as, an hour later, she and Roy floated down the long room, keeping time to the bewildering music.

* Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1874, by MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Robert and Rachel stood at the upper end of the hall watching them.

"That girl dances like a fairy," said Robert. "Rachel! I should not wonder if our boy had met his fate. What do you think?"

Her face flushed.

"Has he said anything to you?"

"Not a word. There is nothing to say—yet. They are as unconscious as children. But—if there ever should be?"

"Oh, I don't know!" she said, with a long breath. "I don't know whether it would be easy for me to take the second place. Yet I have always said I hoped Roy would marry young. I have always longed for a daughter."

"You can hardly hope to find a sweeter one than that fair girl yonder," said Robert. "Rachel, I suspect this had something to do—all unconsciously on his part—with Roy's disinclination to go abroad."

"Nonsense!" cried Rachel. "Why, he hardly knew her!"

"Can't help it, my dear madame. He has known her by sight for over a year; he has been interested in her, and, in a way, fancied her. She has been in his thoughts, after a certain vague fashion, as no girl or woman ever was before. I believe it has been a stimulus of which he was himself unaware, making him eager to live a man's life, and to do a man's work. If they had not met again, it would have passed like so many of the sweet, intangible dreams that help to form every young soul, and then, having done their work, vanish into thin air. But they did meet, you see, and that alters the case. It looks to me as if it might change a dream into a very sober reality."

"You take a good deal for granted, as men are prone to do," said Rachel, smiling. "It by no means follows that Miss Sterling would say 'yes,' to whatever question Roy might choose to ask her."

Robert looked at her narrowly. "Was it not hard work for you to say that?" he asked, laughing. "Mothers are supposed to believe their sons irresistible. But, seriously, if Roy really loves, I hope that love may crown his life. Men do not often marry their first loves—nor women either. But you, Rachel, have saved Roy from the thousand callow fancies of boyhood. You took the place of the shallow goddesses boys are prone to worship. He reached the bright threshold of his manhood heart free; and now, if he loves, I pray God to give him the desire of his soul, that he may be satisfied."

He turned away abruptly as the young pair approached, and Rachel saw him no more that night. The next morning, the uncle and nephew having gone off on some long-talked-of excursion, Mrs. Dilloway and Rose were pacing the sands in front of the verandah where Daisy lay, looking off on the far blue sea with a certain wistful longing. She had not been quite as well for a few days; and though she could walk a little, she did not seem inclined to try.

"Look at that child's eyes," said Rachel. "What can she be thinking of?"

"Mrs. Dilloway," answered Rose, stopping suddenly, "do you suppose it is the sprain that keeps her back? I have noticed for several days that she does not gain at all. For a week or two, in spite of her ankle, whether it was the change, or the excitement, or because you all made her so happy," laying her hand impulsively on Rachel's, "she seemed to be growing round and rosy. But it is not so now. She has that tired, languid air whenever she is left to herself."

"I have noticed it myself," said Rachel, "and I suspect the breath of the sea is too stimulating. She cannot bear it."

"But she cannot go back to Linborough," cried Rose, in dismay. "What can I do with her?"

Just then they both stooped to pick up Rose's handkerchief, which had fallen at their feet. Rachel reached it first, and the name in the corner caught her eye.

"'R. L. Sterling,'" she read, as she handed it to Rose. "It is odd that that name sounds so familiar to me."

The swift color rushed to Rose's face.

"Did your agent, Mr. Farrington, never mention it to you?" she asked, in a low voice.

"My agent—Mr. Farrington?" Rachel repeated, wonderingly. "Oh—those designs! I remember it all now. And they were yours? Why didn't you tell me, dear? They were yours, my child?"

"Yes, they were mine," answered Rose, half-laughing, half-crying. "I am one of your employes, you see, Mrs. Dilloway!"

"But the designs were beautiful—far better than you imagined, I suspect. Why did you not send us more?"

"I did. I sent others the week before we came here. We could not have come if it had not been for that, Mrs. Dilloway. The money was a god-send."

Rachel was silent for a moment, her color coming and going. She had not yet lost that pretty trick of her youth. Then she put her arm round Rose's slender waist, and kissed her.

"If there is anything in fate," she said, "I believe you belong to me—you and Daisy. At all events, what you have just told me makes the next step very clear. I am going to take you home with me, to Woodleigh; and you are to stay there until that child looks less like a spirit than she does to-day. Nay," she added, laughing, as Rose made a faint little murmur of dissent. "You just said you were one of my employes; and your first duty is to obey. Perhaps we can find a little cottage for you, after awhile, if you like the place, and it seems best for Daisy."

Daisy had fallen asleep. Janet was in her own room, looking over the clothes that had just been brought in from the laundry. Rachel and Rose sat down upon the steps of the verandah and had a long, quiet talk—such an one as, with all their liking for one another, they had never had before; during which Rose told the whole changeful story of her life, its struggles, and vicissitudes. They drew very near each other in that still hour of heart-communion.

"And now is it all settled?" asked Rachel, as a little boat appeared in the blue distance, and Roy's strong, steady pull at the oars sent it flying toward the shore. "We Woodleigh people are very clan-nish. We feel that we belong to each other; and are you not one of us? Say that you will go home with me, at least for a little while, until Daisy finds her bloom again!"

Rose said "Yes;" how could she help it? and then ran away to bathe her flushed cheeks, as the keel of the boat grated on the sands.

Great was the amazement of the two gentlemen when, in the course of that afternoon, Rose was presented to them as John Farrington's rara avis—the new designer who was destined, according to that gentleman's enthusiastic belief, to raise the calico-printing of the Dilloway Mills to the level of the fine arts!

"It is like a story-book," said Robert, warmly, as he clasped Rose's hand in his. "Are you sure there is not a fairy god-mother somewhere about here? Never say again that a woman cannot keep a secret! Did you know it, little Dot? Why didn't you tell me?"

"Because Rose told me not to," was the sober answer. "How could I? But I wanted to, dread-fully!"

Roy, after his first exclamation of astonishment, said nothing. He was beginning to feel as if the ways of Providence were past finding out.

"We are going home the day after to-morrow," Rachel announced, shortly afterward. "'We' meaning these two young ladies, Janet, and myself. You gentlemen can remain here, as long as you please."

"Thank you. The world seems to have turned a somersault since we went out this morning, Roy. What is your hurry, Mrs. Dilloway? I thought we were to remain another fortnight."

There was plenty of small talk and merry badinage for the next hour. Then, when Daisy, supported by Rose and Roy, had gone for a little walk round the point, to see the sun set, and the red lights kindle in the light-house tower, Robert turned gravely to Rachel.

"What is it?" he asked; "this new plan of yours? Are you really going to take these girls to Woodleigh?"

"I really am," was the answer. "Don't you see for yourself that Daisy must not stay here? And she must not go back to Linborough at present."

"What will come of it?"

"I do not know; and I am not going to trouble myself about it. It has never been my way, Robert," she added, earnestly. "All my life long I have tried to do what seemed best and right, and then not to worry about consequences. When God gives us light enough for the one next step, we must take it, and leave results with Him. Is it not plain enough in this case?"

"The next step?"

"Yes. We have been so strangely thrown together. Does it mean nothing? Why, the very money that brought them here came out of my pocket, figuratively speaking. Rose told me so to-day."

"I think you are entirely right," said Robert, laughing, "and I have not the slightest doubt that Roy thinks so, too. He is calling you 'blessed among women,' this very minute. There's no question about that."

Rachel looked up with a quick, bright glance.

"Robert, that must settle itself. If Heaven means them for each other, there is little doubt they will find it out. And I would quite as lief the knowledge should come to them under my roof as anywhere. I think, on the whole, I should prefer it to 'Aunt Jane's linter.'"

Young girls had been rare visitors at Dilloway House. There were no fair cousins or nieces to form a nucleus round which others might gather. Rose and Daisy had not been in the house a week, filling the house with the bright glow and freshness of girlhood, before their hostess began to feel as if she could never part with them.

She had been right as regarded Daisy. It was the air of the hills—not that of the sea—that she needed. Her ankle was nearly as well as ever, before they left the Gray Beaches; and Rose soon had the joy of seeing that her sister was growing plump, and round, and rosy. At the end of three delightful weeks—weeks that must be imagined rather than described—she began to talk of going back to Linborough.

"What for?" asked Rachel.

"Oh, my dear Mrs. Dilloway, you are spoiling me!" she cried. "I can never take up the old life again, if I stay here much longer. I must go home and go to work."

"You can do your work here as well as there," answered Mrs. Dilloway, coolly. "Besides, I can't spare Daisy yet. She cannot go until she has seen the hills light their torches in October. I promised her that when she first came here—didn't I, Dot?"

Thus hospitably urged, how could Rose help staying? And all the while the sweet home feeling grew stronger and stronger. She did not ask herself what it meant, or how this summer idyl would end. I hardly think she cared, the present was so all-sufficient. She was quietly content with the present hour, and asked no questions of the future.

Meanwhile Roy spent much of his time at the mills. He had begun his work, he said. He was going to learn the whole alphabet, from Alpha to Omega. He was going to know everything that John Farrington knew.

So you are not to suppose he was at Rose's feet all this time, playing the part of a gallant Esquire of Dames. She would have run away in a week if he had been.

But one night he came up from the mills, a little flushed and heated with his rapid walk. His mother was sitting on the piazza, with some soft, white wools in her lap, and her crochet-hook in her hand. The two girls were in the garden, strolling up and down the paths, pelting each other with the falling rose-leaves, and gathering the freshest and brightest buds for the vases in the drawing-room. Roy dropped on the steps at his mother's feet, nodding brightly in the direction of the fragrant shower.

"I'll be there presently, Daisy," he called, "and have a hand in that frolic."

"Are you tired?" she shouted in return.

"Frightfully," he rejoined. "You can't imagine such fatigue, little Dot," and his head sank upon his mother's knee.

She softly smoothed back the hair from his forehead; but his eyes were in the garden.

"Rosamond," he said, presently, in a low voice; "Rose of the world!"

Rachel's heart beat quickly. Was it coming—the story she dreaded to hear, and yet which, if she did not hear, she would feel herself defrauded of her birthright?

"Rose of the world!" he repeated, lifting the hand that lay upon his breast, and carrying it to his lips.

"Tell me, Roy," she whispered, bending over him. "Is it the one rose of all the world to you?"

He raised his eyes, filled with a sudden light, to hers.

"The one rose, mother," he said; "the sweetest rose in all the world. I have known it a long time, but I did not wish you to think me hasty or over-rash. Shall I gather it, if I can, and wear it on my breast for your joy—and mine? Speak, mother!"

Her tears were dropping fast.

"Yes, Roy," she answered.

There was silence between them—the silence that is holier than prayer.

In a few moments Roy rose, kissed his mother with quivering lips, and went into the garden.

Rachel watched him as he approached the two sisters, and stood still, at Daisy's command, while she fastened a rose-bud in his buttonhole. Then she went into the house, passing up the broad staircase into her own room.

Rose had been to Linborough the day before to see Aunt Jane, and to get a few articles they needed from the little home in the "linter." They were in a small trunk that had not yet been fully unpacked. A dress or two, a sacque for Daisy, and other dainty bits of feminine wearing apparel, lay upon the bed and chairs, as Rachel paused a moment at the door of their chamber. The window was open, and the fresh wind blowing in had swept some pretty laces to the floor. She stepped in to pick them up, inwardly commenting, after the manner of women, upon their fineness and the delicacy of the pattern.

"Their mother was a lady," she thought. "A woman of refined and delicate tastes. Everything they wear shows that. There's no sham, and no overdoing."

She stood at the window, with a little happy smile upon her lips, looking off into the far distance ere she closed the sash. How glad she ought to be that this young girl whom Roy loved was in every sense so fair, and pure, and sweet—so fitting a rose for him to wear upon his breast! Then she shut the window and turned away.

But, as she did so, a box that had been taken from the trunk and placed upon the bureau, caught her eye. She gave a little scream, her face crimsoned to the roots of her hair, and then turned white as ashes. Claspings both hands over her heart, she stood in a stooping attitude, not touching the box, but staring at it as if it had been a basilisk.

Gray shadows gathered about her eyes, her mouth. Her lips grew set and rigid. Her breathing was short and heavy; she gasped as one suffocating.

How came it there—that box? She had seen it before—shallow, oblong, of exquisite workmanship. Ebony, inlaid with pearl and gold. There was Aurora, resplendent in her rose-colored chariot. There was the rich blue of the lapis-lazuli. There were the arabesque designs and the curious devices. There was the straight, narrow slit for the key; and there was the key lying beside it. And—there was the monogram with the letters interlaced. Her eyes grew dim, and she could see no more.

She did not faint; though she never knew what happened during the next quarter of an hour. She must have walked out of that chamber, and down the whole length of the hall to her own room, as people walk in their sleep. For when she next knew that she was alive and in the world, she was sitting in her own little sewing-chair, alone. She wondered vaguely what was the matter, and if she had been ill, pressing both hands to her forehead. She wanted to remember something. What was it?

It all came back to her presently. That box—in Rose's room. Her box—no, not her box, but the box that she had locked up, buried, as it were, in the little recess under the stairs so many years ago, and that she had never looked at but once since. Once since that dreadful day—but she could not remember how long ago—she was seized with the conviction that it was all a delusion, that there was no such box; or that, if there were, it was all some horrible mistake. She had misinterpreted the letters, and distorted the facts. So she opened the door of the tomb, and forced herself to unlock the sarcophagus. She read the letters over again carefully—and—put them back. She had never touched them, or looked upon them from that hour to this. And now the box was there—in Rose's room. Her head whirled under the pressure of the swift tide of thought.

Pretty soon she got up and went into the closet. There was the little trap-door, undisturbed apparently, and invisible save to instructed eyes. She tried to slip the tiny bolt. It had rusted fast, and she could not move it, until she pried it with a pair of scissors.

It flew back at last. The box was there—just where she had put it with her own hands. She closed the door again, too bewildered for connected thought.

Were there two of them, then—perfect duplicates of each other? What did it mean? Was it merely a coincidence? Was it nothing more than a mere chance happening that the very counterpart of the box she had hidden away—the one bane and sorrow of her life—should be in Rose Sterling's hands?

And there were the monograms!

Suddenly it occurred to her that she had not examined that upon Rose's box closely. She had been so startled, that, while she had been aware of the existence of the monogram, she had made no attempt to decipher the characters.

The young people had not come in, for all was still below stairs. She must settle that question; and gliding swiftly and silently through the hall, she stood in Rose's chamber again. It was growing dark in the shadowy corners, but the red sunset light was still gilding the window. She took up the box and carried it into the golden glow.

The letters forming the monogram were I. L. She had a vague impression that they must be R. A. D., like those upon the other box. Thank God that they were not!

The lid yielded to the pressure of her trembling fingers, and moved by an irresistible impulse, she raised it. Innocent and peaceful looking it was, holding nothing but a few trinkets; an ivory cross, a coral necklace, and a string of amber beads, with a curiously-wrought clasp. Rachel could not smile yet, but she began to wonder if she had been frightened at a shadow.

It was strange, certainly; but there were many strange things in the world. Boxes like that might be made by the dozen, for aught she knew. It was by no means impossible.

She set the box back on the bureau, and turned to leave the room. Just then the last, long, slanting sunbeam shot across the valley, and fell upon her face. It fell upon the monogram, also, bringing out the letters with startling vividness.

"I. L.!" cried Rachel. "Isabel Leighton!"

CHAPTER XXV.

ISABEL LEIGHTON! Was she Rose Sterling's mother? Was that the cruel solution of this mystery?

Doubly cruel in that she had that very night bade Roy good-speed in his wooing, and told him to win his Rose of the world if he could! What wonder if it seemed to Rachel that this burden was more than she could bear?

She went, staggering under its weight, back to her own room again—the room so sanctified by joy, and pain, and loss; by struggle, and prayer, and conquest. Some one knocked at the door, and she opened it mechanically. It was a telegram from Robert, who had been in Linborough for the past week, reading thus:

"Off for New York on business for the museum. Grey goes with me. Back next week."

The dispatch fell from her hands. She must meet this new complication, then, as she had met all the sorrows of her life—alone.

But what difference would it make if Robert were there? What could she tell him? How could he help her? What could she say about the matter to him, or to any one else, without compromising her husband, whose honor, after the lapse of all these years, was still dearer to her than her own life? After hiding the sad story of his error in her own pitiful breast through all the lonely days of her widowhood, was she to betray it now? What was she to say to Roy, to whom all his life long the thought of his father had been a constant inspiration, an incentive to all high and noble endeavor? Could she tell him that the ideal of his worship was but common clay? Never, so help her all good angels!

And yet, if there had been any wrong, this woman, this Isabel Leighton, had been a party to it. Was it her daughter who, out of the whole "rosebud garland of girls," out of the whole bevy of fair young maidens the world over, who were waiting to be chosen as the happy, loyal wives of happy, loyal men—was it her daughter who, out of all these, must be Roy's wife? the mother of his children—his closest friend—supplanting, perhaps, even his own mother who had borne for him the unutterable agony?

Her watch slipped from her belt; the little, old-fashioned, open-faced watch, with its circlet of jewels, that her husband had given her on her wedding-day. Rachel glanced at it as she replaced it. It was not yet an hour since she was sitting on the piazza with her boy's head upon her knee, listening to the few words in which he told her the story of his love. Only forty-eight minutes; and yet since then the whole aspect of her life had changed. If only nothing had been said! If only she had been deaf and dumb and blind that night, when Roy came up from the mill! But she had listened to him with her whole heart, knowing how much his simple, earnest words meant. He was not given to heroics, or hyperboles. Yet she, who could read him so well, knew that all the pure passion of his loyal, manly nature was in that thought—"the one rose of all the world."

She had seen the light in his steady eyes when he turned away from her; the elevation of his whole carriage; the lifted bearing; the earnest purpose informing lip, and brow, and step. She had thought he was like a young king going to claim his own; not by might, but by the divinest right of love. She had been certain that before she saw him again, by some one—or by all—of love's innumerable languages, he would have revealed his secret to Rose. If, indeed, it was a secret. Rachel could not tell. There was a delicate, womanly reserve about Rose that was an impalpable veil. You knew that her heart beat warmly, and you felt its subtle magnetism. But you could not count its pulsations.

Why, Isabel Leighton might not be Rose's mother, after all! Rachel sprang to her feet as this thought darted tingling through her brain. She did not for one moment doubt that she had read the monogram aright. The law of mere coincidence could hardly reach so far as that. But it did not follow that because the box was in Rose's possession, its owner must have been her mother. It might have been her friend, aunt, cousin—anything.

Rachel went to her window and looked out. Some one must answer her questionings. Some voice, from heaven or on earth, must settle that point. And as if in response to her inarticulate cry, there was Daisy coming slowly up the gravel walk alone. She was stringing some red hips from the rose-bushes. As she came under the window, Rachel leaned out, speaking very quietly. She was not one to betray herself unawares by undue appearance of anxiety.

"Are you stringing a rosary, dear?" she asked. Then, after a little talk about the berries, she said: "I was thinking of your mother, Daisy. Rose told me of her decline and of her sudden death."

But I never have heard her name. What was it, dear? Her name before she was married?"

She held her breath to listen.

"Her name," said Daisy, slowly, intent on piercing the hip exactly in the centre. "Her name was Isabel. Isabel Leighton. Grandpa's name was Ambrose Leighton."

Isabel Leighton's daughter! Then she had warmed in her own bosom the viper that should sting her; and through this golden-haired woman who had lured her husband's heart away from her, she might lose her son, also. For how could she consent to this marriage? It was repugnant to every instinct of her womanhood.

But had she not already consented? It seemed to her, as she threw herself upon her bed, and buried her face in the pillow to shut out the late remaining daylight, that she had lost Roy in any event. It was not Rose Sterling's fault that she was born of this mother. Poor child—was it not rather her misfortune? Yet that she was born of her, placed an impassable distance between her and Rachel. Rachel felt, as she lay there in a cold tremor, that she could never give her a daughter's place in her heart; and if she did not, she knew well enough what her own teachings to her son had been. It was she herself who had taught him the words of the Master: "For this cause shall a man leave father and mother and cleave unto his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh."

But if he did not marry Rose? if he should yield to her entreaties and give up the whole matter? She felt that, in this case, she would have lost him all the same. There could never be between them again the sweet trust, the implicit confidence, the abiding faith, that had made her motherhood so blessed a relationship. For if she withdrew her consent, she could not explain herself to Roy; and how could he ever trust her, when she would seem to have proved herself so weak, so capricious, so utterly in the wrong? His heart would be with Isabel Leighton's daughter, whether he married her or not; and there was the sting of it.

It was just groping in the dark. She sat up, with the resolve that as soon as Roy came in she would send for him. All a-flush he would be, very probably, from his happy, successful wooing; for, strange to say, it never occurred to Rachel even to hope that Rose herself might cut this Gordian knot by a simple "nay!" All a-flush he would be; but she would send for him all the same. She would fall at his feet. Her soul should cry out to his, and she would say: "Roy, my life has had one great grief of which you never knew. I have learned this night that Rosamond Sterling is so closely connected with it that I cannot live and know she is your wife. I would rather die than see you marry her."

But what ineffable nonsense it seemed—like the maundering of a sentimental school-girl. Roy was too sensible, too manly, to be moved by such an utterance. She knew just how he would look at her with his clear, straightforward eyes, and answer: "Mother, if I must not marry Rose Sterling, tell me why! What is this grief of which you speak? Let me know all, and then I will do my best."

So that plan failed her.

It has taken me a long time to give you this faint glimpse of the changeful current of Rachel Dilloway's thoughts. But the current itself moved fast. They were just lighting the lamps downstairs now. She heard the servants moving about, closing the blinds, and dropping the curtains. Daisy had been sitting on the steps all this time, stringing the rest of her crimson hips. Where were Rose and Roy?

It was a soft, warm night, early in October. Fireflies were darting about in the meadows, forgetting that it was not midsummer. Once in a while a bat flapped its heavy wings almost in one's very face, and then sailed noiselessly away. The great, round moon was like a disk of burnished silver lying against the purple sky. The air was spicy with the breath of the late, odor-laden flowers, that seemed to hold the garnered sweetness of the whole summer in their chalice. And down at the foot of the garden stood the young pair, even as the first recorded lovers stood in their Eden, alone with God. Their hands were clasped; they leaned toward each other with a slight, unconscious leaning; their faces were solemn, tender, uplifted, as of those who saw a great light, and yet scarcely comprehended its meaning.

Roy turned at last with a slow smile, looking about him with a sort of wonder.

"I am glad that this is the scene of our engagement," he said; "this very garden where I have been gathering roses all my life. Rose, I thank God that to-night he has given me the best, and sweetest, and dearest of all!" and bending his head he kissed the pure, sweet lips that did not turn away from his caresses.

But presently Rose drew herself from his encircling arms.

"We—we know that we love each other," she said, blushing and smiling. "We could not quite help that, maybe. But that does not make us engaged. Your mother—"

"Oh, if that's all!" interrupted Roy—"Mother knows all about it. She will be glad to welcome her daughter, Rose. She loves you."

With that assurance Rose was well content, and Roy was silent for many minutes thinking.

"I wonder if my father knows all about it, too," he said, very softly, at last. "I wonder if he knows I have won my Rose, and if he rejoices with me. He has never been dead to me, Rose. He has been a vital power in my life as far back as I can remember."

"Being dead he yet speaketh," she whispered. "Is not that what it means?"

"He was so fond of roses," Roy went on. "Always, Janet says, even when a mere child. It was almost a passion with him, as it has been with me. I suppose 'a rose by any other name might smell as sweet,' " he quoted lightly; "but I have my doubts about it after all. It was your name that first made me turn to look at you one day, as you stood under the hop-vine, and Daisy kissed her hand to you with her merry 'good by, Rose!' That look sealed my fate, I suspect."

"How much do I not owe to my 'sponsors in baptism!'" was the laughing reply.

Rachel, sitting alone in her chamber, heard them come in, a few moments after; heard the low murmur of voices as they passed under her window, and knew that they paused for a few moments in the darkened porch, before they stepped into the glow and brightness of the hall. She understood it all perfectly well. It seemed to her that she could hear the very words that Roy whispered, as he led his betrothed wife over the threshold of his own ancestral home.

Two hours ago she would have been solemnly glad. But now—!

There was a little stir and bustle down stairs; the opening and shutting of doors; questions and answers; the drawing up of chairs about the large library table. Presently some one touched the keys of the grand-piano, and a "song without words" told its own sweet story. Then two voices—a clear, bird-like soprano, and a strong, sweet tenor—swelled out on the night air; Rose and Roy chanting: "Cast thy burden on the Lord."

"He will sustain—and—comfort—thee!" sang the blended voices in long and lingering cadence, tender, thrilling, triumphant.

Then the music ceased. She heard Roy's step on the stairs—a light, bounding step, as of winged feet. He came down the hall; he tapped at her door.

"Mother! mother!" he cried. "Where are you?"

Ah, how it carried her back over the tide of years! It was the old, old question of his very babyhood. She did not answer. She could not.

"Mother!" he repeated, knocking louder, "where have you hidden yourself? Why don't you come down? We want you."

"I think I won't go down again to-night, Roy," she answered quietly, after a moment's thought. "I am rather tired, and shall go to bed early. Good night."

"But come to the door a minute," he said, "just one minute, mother!"

She knew what he wanted. He had something to tell her. But she could not listen that night; she had not strength enough. He must wait. She could not look upon his face again until she had settled this whole grievous question, and had determined what to do.

"Just a minute, mother!"

"I cannot open the door to-night, Roy," she said. "Do not tease me."

He turned away and walked slowly down-stairs, disappointed and ill at ease. She undressed herself in the dark, in a sort of desperation, and crept into bed.

She remembered how once before she had refused, in a moment of sore anguish, to open the door of that very room to Roy; and it seemed to her that she could hear the wail of the piteous little voice that rose up in dismay and expostulation. That was a child's voice. The man turned silently away, and made no sign.

She remembered, too, how the child had aroused her from a trance of sorrow by the touch of his soft, caressing hands; and how he had said in his baby accents: "I always shall wake you up when you have had dreams, mamma!"

He could not waken her now. He could not help her in any way. Her motherhood seemed to her of no avail. She had no son to lean upon.

Then, from the far corners of the room, there seemed to come other well-remembered words—words that had echoed through that chamber more than once. They were these: "My son shall not be punished for his father's sake."

Who had spoken them?

Yet, even as she recalled them, another voice rang through the chambers of her memory, saying: "I will visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, even unto the third and fourth generation."

(To be continued.)

THE BROCADED SILK.

"GOODNESS gracious, what a cheerful night!" wearily sighed Nellie, as she sank into the old arm-chair, and held two mud-disguised feet out toward the fire.

It certainly was a "cheerful night," if "cheerful" be taken ironically. It had been an unpleasant day, beginning with enough snow to make the ground white, and then changing to a drizzling rain, turning each street into a greasy slide, which made walking an abomination and a snare, and inspired one with bitter hatred toward each rib of one's fellow-passengers' umbrellas as they flaunted the rain-drops into one's face.

"Why, Nellie dear, you don't look as if you would 'rise and rin' even 'to see your dearie'—does she, mother?" said Arthur, looking at her critically.

"No, indeed, dear," was the reply; "and the sooner her things are off the better."

It needed no fewer than three gentle admonitions from our mother to start Nellie up-stairs to change her soaking dress and shoes. The waterproof cloak—there was only one in the family—was out at a music lesson. It came in presently with the one who was wanting to complete the "group"—our little Clarie, as our mother always called her, I suppose because she was the youngest, for she was a head taller than Nellie, and a head and shoulders taller than I was, which I always thought was a pity, for I was the oldest of them all, and ought to have been—after our mother—the "head of the family;" but they all treated me as if I was six years old, and I have taken more good advice in the course of my life than the celebrated old man who once had a donkey to sell.

Of course we were poor. Nellie and Clarie did not give French and music lessons at all hours of the day, and in all sorts of weather, just for amusement. We were in hopes that some one would leave us "something" "some day;" but, as we had no idea who he was, nor when he would do it, we were obliged to work hard for our living in the meantime. We must all have been "Saturday's bairns," I think, if there is any truth in the old rhyme.

Next to the legacy—which, en passant, has not come yet—our hopes were centred in Arthur, as the coming man who was to raise the fortunes of the family. He was only eighteen at the time of which I am writing, but was already, for a young man of his age, in receipt of a very good salary as a merchant's clerk. However, that was not enough for everybody, so Nellie gave French lessons and Clarie music lessons, and I helped our mother to keep house and do the sewing and mending for the family, and in my spare hours I "copied" for a lawyer. We managed to keep the house going and our clothes respectable; but such turning and twisting it took to do it! I think there are some people in this world to whom certain passages in the lives of other people would be a perfect revelation. That is rather vague, I admit; but I was thinking of the people who, when they want anything reasonable, go out and buy it. Now, if it became absolutely necessary that one of us should have a new dress, it was a matter of debate in solemn family council for two or three weeks, and we tried to discover "how we could make up for it" by going without something else. And as for a new carpet—the fate of a nation has been settled with less consultation. There is this to be said, however—people who get things whenever they want them certainly cannot enjoy them as poor people do.

On this stormy afternoon we gathered round the grate, as it began to grow too dark for us to write or sew any longer, and took the full comfort of our "blind man's holiday." It was Saturday evening, and we were all glad of that; and Arthur had received that day—it was early in the year—what he called a love-token from his employer, in the shape of a ten-pound note; and, as there were at least fifty ten-pound-note ways of spending it, the conversation was rather animated. We did have good times in that shabby little parlor! I often smile to myself now, recalling the "smart speeches" that my mother and the girls and Arthur used to make. I could not make them myself, which was as well perhaps, for I served as "admiring audience."

We had just begun to think it was time to light the gas and go to work again, when the maid-of-all-work came in with two letters—one for my mother and one for Clarie. The gas was lighted at once, and the two favorites of fortune sat down to read their letters. They finished them together, and Clarie turned to my mother with a flushed cheek and an "O mother!" of regret and very faint hope.

Of course they were besieged with inquiries, and the letters were read aloud. Clarie's was from her "dearest friend"—no, it was not a lover, it was a girl-friend—and mother's was from the said friend's married sister, Mrs. Merivale, and the gist of both was an earnest invitation to Clarie to come to Yorkshire for her friend's approaching wedding, to be one of the bridesmaids, and to stay for the ensuing festivities.

We all knew there was no quicker way to spend money than in travelling. Yorkshire was a long way from home, too. This, as Arthur, dear fellow, eagerly suggested, might be met with part of the ten pounds; but people cannot be bridesmaids at weddings, and go to parties for two or three weeks afterwards, with only one "best dress"—no matter how handsome the dress may be—and Clarie's was nothing extraordinary. To be sure, she looked lovely whatever dress she had on; but even lovely-looking people might feel a little uncomfortable at a wedding, if they, being bridesmaids, had on dark-green poplins. So, after a great deal of discussion and a little wild speech from Arthur, who could not bear to see Clarie's disappointment, it was sorrowfully decided that Clarie must decline. There was nothing we could sell conveniently, though the suggestions on the subject made a little diversion—for somehow we could not help joking, if we were as poor as rats; and I think that was one reason why we stood poverty as well as we did. Nellie and I offered to sell our hair, but mine was of a shade of red which Arthur declared was matchless; and Nellie's was about two inches long, and in such close little curls that we all told her that whoever she made the offer to would think she was "fishing" for an offer for her head.

We subsided at last, and everybody's face was a little serious, for we felt sorry about Clarie. She was far from strong, and the endless round in which she was engaged did not tend to make her stronger; indeed, she was not fit to face the storms she often had to encounter in going to give her lessons, as a troublesome cough was proving. But we had to "accept the inevitable," so Clarie took her desk and began her answer, "to put herself out of her misery," she said, when Arthur, who was reading the evening paper, gave an exclamation, and said excitedly: "Hold up a minute, Clarie. Will it make any difference if you don't write that till Monday evening?"

"No, I suppose not," she answered, reluctantly. "It is not to be till next month; but I wanted to have it off my mind. Why, Arthur?"

"Never you mind why," responded that young gentleman, loftily; "if it really doesn't matter, just please to wait; I'd do that much for you any day."

Half laughingly, Clarie replied: "Well, I 'learned to labor' some time ago, so now I suppose I may as well 'learn to wait,' and took up her sewing again.

She knew it was useless to question Arthur; his air of mystery was overwhelming. After he had gone to bed we studied the paper attentively, hoping to find out the cause of his request, but in vain.

So our mother stopped at Arthur's door on her way to bed, and gave him a gentle admonition "not to do anything foolish," which was met with a prompt, "I don't mean to, ma'am."

The next day being Sunday, we had to stifle our curiosity and impatience. Monday morning came, and we indulged in various speculations as to what Arthur's mighty secret might be. I could see that our mother was a little uneasy, and Clarie, too, for it would be "just like him," as our mother said, "to get out of his newly-acquired 'fortune' what he thought was necessary to enable Clarie to go."

"And, if he should do so," Clarie said, "which prudence forbid, I still could not go, for you know I have no trunk."

This was sadly true. The "family trunk"—it was the one our mother had on her wedding journey—was "past all surgery," having been ruthlessly handled by a mighty Irish porter on its last trip.

Arthur came rushing in half an hour before dinner-time, still excited, and still deigning no information, save that he had leave of absence from the office that afternoon, and that he wanted me to "hurry up dinner," as he had important business to transact. He ate his dinner hastily, and we saw no more of him for the afternoon. He came in just at dusk, evidently flushed with triumph, and took up a post of observation at the window, where he had not waited long before he went quickly to the front door. Clarie and I were in the room, and we went to the window, wondering what it could all mean, and half expecting to see the forty white slaves leading forty black ones, with basins of jewels on their heads, although, as Clarie remarked, we had not seen him rub the lamp. There was only one man there, however—a porter—wheeling a very stylish-looking trunk up to the door, which, with Arthur's assistance, he speedily transferred to the hall.

"Where will you have it, Clarie?" asked Arthur, composedly. "You'd better make up your mind before the man goes—it is too heavy for me to carry it by myself."

I was speechless with amazement, and thought I should certainly wake up presently and find it all a dream; but Clarie behaved admirably.

"It had better go into the sewing-room, Arthur," she said, with composure equal to his own; and into the sewing-room it was accordingly taken by Arthur and the porter—upon which the latter was dismissed in a lordly style by Arthur, and then that potentate was driven into the parlor at the point of a needle.

Nellie was cutting the bread for tea, and had come to see what the commotion meant, followed by our mother; and Arthur was assailed with questions by everybody at once.

"If you will all stop talking for a few minutes, I shall be very happy to tell you," said the hero of the evening; and then it occurred to us that he could make his explanation much better if we all kept still—which we accordingly did.

"Now you will please not interrupt me," he began, majestically; "and, when I have finished, you can all say what you please. I saw in the paper on Saturday evening that there was to be a railway sale to-day of unclaimed trunks and parcels; and it occurred to me that I might find a trunk there that would do for Clarie. I did not expect her to use what was inside it, unless it was something very superb; but I thought perhaps we could raise the wind for a new dress or two, if we only had the trunk. So I went to the sale this afternoon, and I shall never again doubt that 'Fortune favors the brave,' for it was raining cats and dogs, and there was scarcely any one there; and this trunk was put up toward the last, when some of the bidders had got tired and gone home. I had looked at it carefully before the sale commenced. There is no mark on it anywhere—it has not even a card; it is, besides, nearly new.

And so I bid for it; and, if there were any chance of your guessing rightly, I would make you guess how much I gave for it; but there is not the least, ladies," said Arthur, holding up an imaginary hammer, and making his voice sound as much like the auctioneer's as possible. "This trunk, which is nearly new, and quite as good as if it were, bound with iron, and with a hump on its back, which adapts it to carry several bonnets of the present fashion, and with room for any reasonable young woman's entire wardrobe inside it, went for the incredibly low price of two pounds."

The orator had evidently finished; but I will not attempt to give the remarks that followed. Clarie thanked and kissed him; and, although we all felt uncomfortable about owning a trunk procured in this manner, we tried not to damp his pleasure by letting him see it. We agreed to wait until after tea to examine the contents of the newly-acquired treasure; so we adjourned to the dining-room, full of excitement, and speculating largely as to what the mysterious article might disclose. We were too full of curiosity to be long at table, and as soon as tea was over we adjourned to the sewing-room to investigate the mystery, when it suddenly occurred to us that it would be easier to do so if we had a key to the trunk. Arthur, nothing daunted, set off to a locksmith's, whence he quickly returned with a large bunch of keys to try. We had come nearly to the end of the bunch, and were just beginning to think we should have to wrench the lock off, when Arthur managed to unlock it with a key that did not quite fit; then he motioned us all to the other side of the room, and said that Clarie was the proper person to make the investigation.

"It was a little like having the 'wonderful lamp' to get that trunk and its contents for two pounds," Arthur said.

It was filled with beautiful dresses, chosen and made with a taste that bespoke a lady-like owner. The place for the bonnets was occupied with pretty fichus and sleeves—not of lace, however, but of blonde, which is quite a different thing, as every woman knows. Then there were kid gloves—half-a-dozen pairs at least—it is true they were sixes, and Clarie's number was five and three-quarters, but that was a trifle—and pretty ribbons, and belts for the different dresses. Some of the dresses had been worn a little, others were quite new. There was no jewellery, and not a single article of white clothing, except the blonde things, so that of course nothing was marked. The probabilities were that it was one of a number of trunks with which some one had started for a long sojourn at some watering-place. The dresses had evidently belonged to some rich and rather fashionable person of about our mother's age; for there were two or three small articles of real lace among the variety of blonde things, which were evidently intended to conceal the fact that "the parting was all too wide for her ladyship's head." At the very bottom of the trunk was one dress which had never been made up, and looked as if it were meant for some one younger than the owner of the other things must have been. It was a curious article, looking as if it had been made to order in some foreign country—a heavy white silk, brocaded with pink rosebuds, which were so beautiful that we almost thought they must have been wrought with a needle.

The debate that followed, when everything had been inspected, lasted until nearly midnight. Clarie declared she could not use the things with any comfort, at least until after the trunk had been advertised. Arthur reassured her on this point, by the information that it had been advertised by the railway company, and that it was only after a sufficient time had elapsed to allow of an answer coming from any part of the United Kingdom that the sale had taken place. This was some consolation, but still it did not reconcile Clarie to the idea of wearing clothes that had belonged to some one else. I could see that our mother had the same feeling, and that she would have preferred that Clarie should give up the visit, rather than use these things. She felt less scruple about the trunk, and even suggested that Clarie should buy one or two dresses, simple and inexpensive; but Clarie well knew the pinching that would come upon the rest of us, if she consented to this.

At last she agreed to go, using only such of the dresses as were necessary to make her present a respectable appearance. Arthur was triumphant again, and mother, Nellie, Clarie and I all stitched away, at every spare moment we had, at the dresses, which were so ample that there was no difficulty in altering them to great advantage to fit Clarie's slender figure.

When she wrote her letter of acceptance, she inquired particularly how the bridesmaids were to dress, and received, of course, a minute description in reply. We could not help thinking that her warm-hearted friend had adapted the dress to Clarie's circumstances, for the material she mentioned was simple white tulle. Clarie was filled with dismay, however, at the announcement. The fact that there was a heavy white silk among the dresses had chiefly induced her to consent; and now, determined that no more should be spent on her, she again declared her intention of declining. But here one of the family, who does not care to be particularized, came to the rescue, and sternly forbade Clarie to write the proposed letter, saying, with an appearance of conviction that hid a quaking heart, that the dress should be forthcoming in time, and that none of the family should do without anything else to obtain it. Clarie, beginning to feel herself in the hands of destiny, submitted; and the aforesaid individual wasted a small amount of midnight gas, while she wrote out of her large experience a very poor "article" for one of the magazines, which, strange to say, was accepted, and, what was much more important, paid for, and the dress was bought.

So at last everything was ready, including the rosebud dress—which was so beautiful that we had persuaded Clarie into having it made up—and our darling set off one bright winter morning, full of pleasant excitement and delightful anticipations, and almost forgetting the compunctions about the trunk and its contents. Arthur had painted her name on one end of the trunk and her initials on the other: and it was so like the trunks of forty other people at the station that Clarie said that she did not more than half expect to have it demanded of her before she reached the end of her journey. She had made arrangements with her scholars for an absence of three weeks, and we all rejoiced in her temporary freedom, hoping much from its effect upon her health.

"Of course," she said, as we stood on the platform waiting for the train, "I shall tell Alice and Rosie how I came by my 'fine feathers,' or else they would think I had been robbing a bank, or making mother sell the spoons; but I do not know that any one else need know it."

We all agreed that it concerned no one else; and then the train came, and away she went, her bright face at the window as long as we could see it.

Her first two or three letters were radiant; the wedding had "gone off" beautifully, and the bride had been fêted by a host of relatives and friends. Then came a short, hurried note—she had been gone about ten days—saying that we might expect her home next day, and asking Arthur to meet her at the station. We were still wondering about this, and forming anxious conjectures as to the cause of this change in her plans, when the next post brought a longer but equally unsatisfactory letter, saying that Mrs. Merivale would not hear of her going before the three weeks were up, and was much grieved that she had limited herself to that space of time: so that, "to please Rosie, and for other reasons," she had consented to stay.

"I know," she wrote, "that you will all think me very mysterious and 'contrary,' but I really cannot explain until I see you; it would take more paper than I have with me to write it all out, and I never did like to borrow."

Of course there was but one opinion in the family—it must be a love affair; and we all agreed in thinking that Clarie was treating us very shabbily, and that she certainly had paper enough with her to tell us his name and where he lived, and a few other important particulars, such as the color of his eyes and hair. But we were well aware that the youngest daughter of the house had her share of firmness, and that it would be useless to ask any questions until "her ladyship" came home. We were so fully persuaded that it was a love affair that we fell into a way of talking and speculating about the "great unknown" which has since struck me as excessively funny. Clarie had always been fastidious, and the family was divided in its mind as to whether the "great unknown" would be the impossible collection of perfections which we had occasionally heard described, or one of the extraordinary ordinary men who too often take the places reserved for paragons.

Our impatience made Clarie's absence seem longer, but it came to an end at last, and the day arrived which was to bring the absentee back to us. Nellie and Arthur went to the station, while mother and I put the finishing touches to Clarie's room, and to the preparations for dinner and tea in one, which we had decided would be an acceptable offering to the traveller.

"Though, to be sure," said Nellie, "if she is in love, we are wasting provisions."

At last she came, the dear youngest, without her cough, and looking so much better for her holiday that I think we all felt as if we had had a holiday ourselves. We half expected to see the "great unknown" with her, and I said, a little disappointedly, when she was fairly settled in the parlor: "So he did not come with you?"

"You, too!" she exclaimed, half laughing and half crying. "What ails all you children? Mother is the only member of the family still in her senses, for Nell and Arthur no sooner had me fairly out of the train than they said the very same thing to me, and when I asked what on earth they meant, they called me a humbug. Now, mother, what do they mean?"

"Why, my dear," began our mother, "it is only what your letters led us to expect. You have made a great mystery about it—more, I think, than was necessary to your own family—but I hope we shall hear all about him now."

"My last hope is gone!" exclaimed Clarie, in despair. "Mother is as bad as the rest of you; but, if any one would tell me what you are all driving at—"

I thought it high time to cut the knot.

"Why, Clarie," I said, "aren't you engaged to be married? Or, at least, we thought that must be the secret."

"You've been asleep on the Queen's highway, little woman," said Clarie, laughing, "or you would never have dreamt of such a thing. No, you dear, foolish folk, I have not got into any such foolish scrape as that. I did not find what you call my impossible combination in Yorkshire; my mystery is much more prosaic than that, and I am sorry for all your disappointment. But, indeed, I am as hungry as a hawk; let me eat first, and I promise to talk afterward, and tell you a story that will last half the evening, although it is not a love story."

When tea was over, we all drew round the fire, with the modern Scheherazade in the middle of the group, and also in the biggest chair, in consideration of her fatigue.

"You know," she began, "what a discussion we had as to whether we should or should not make up that beautiful odd piece of new silk that was in that trunk?" We all nodded. "Well, 'thereby hangs the tale' which I am about to tell you. I have myself to thank for consenting to have it made; but somehow I fancied it more than all the others, because I knew it had never been worn. Of course I told Rosie all about the trunk and things, and she said that Arthur was an angel, and that I might tell him so, and that she thought it was good fun, and that I need not have hesitated a moment—she wouldn't. She promised not to mention it, however, for, as I suggested to her, other people might not look at it precisely as she did."

"I wore my bridesmaid's dress at the first two or three parties; but one morning, as we were talking about a particularly large and magnificent one which was to take place that evening, Rosie insisted that I should wear my 'rosebud' dress. One of her reasons, she said, for wanting me to look my best was that an aunt of her husband's was to come that afternoon, and would probably accompany us in the evening. She was very handsome, and went into society a great deal; and Rosie said, if I made a good impression, it would reflect credit on her for her choice of a friend. Of course this was all her nonsense; but I saw she really wanted me to wear the dress; so, to please her, I yielded, although I felt a greater reluctance to put it on than I thought I should.

"Mrs. Clifford—the aunt—arrived in the afternoon, but I did not see anything of her until we went to tea; then I was introduced, and fell in love with her immediately. She is one of the most fascinating women I have ever met—very handsome, and just a little bit stately, with the sweetest voice I have ever heard. She must be very 'well preserved,' for she certainly does not look old enough to be Mr. Merivale's aunt, except that her hair is white; she wears it in lovely soft curls at her temples, and it looks as thick as mine. She is an Italian by extraction, but has spent most of her life in this country. She must have seen how she fascinated me; and she was very gracious—though, to be sure, she was that to everybody. Rosie told me after tea, when we went up to dress, that she should be jealous of me if her aunt liked me much, for she was as much in love with her as I was."

"Rosie came into my room when she was dressed, and fixed the flowers in my hair—some rosebuds as nearly like those in the dress as possible, which she had selected for me without my knowledge—and said all sorts of flattering things about how I looked; and then we went down to the drawing-room together. Mrs. Clifford was already there, standing before the fire, and looking like an empress in her purple velvet dress. As soon as we came in, and she caught sight of us, I saw her give a great start and then turn pale. If she had not been such a thorough lady, she would have stared, and my guilty conscience about the dress made me blush."

"Doesn't she look lovely, Aunt Margaret?" said Rosie, like a goose; though I will do her the justice to say that she had not spoken of what I wore."

"She would justly regard such a remark from so new an acquaintance as I am in the light of an impertinence," observed Mrs. Clifford, with dignity."

"Poor little Rose froze in a moment. You may imagine I did not feel much more comfortable; and we were all glad—at least I know I was—that Mr. Merivale came in just then and told us the carriage was ready. He did not notice how constrained we all were—being 'only a man,' you know—and talked very pleasantly all the way; but, although Rosie and I did our best to second him, we felt too much chilled to succeed very well. Rosie—poor child!—thought that she, with her unlucky speech, was 'the cause of our anguish;' but I had a feeling in my heart that it was something worse. I knew that I had met with the rightful owner of my trunk; still I could not see why she had turned pale on recognizing the dress. I do not think that either Rosie or I enjoyed the party. I had the pleasure of thinking that I was the 'innocent cause,' besides the knowledge that I must either enter into an explanation with Mrs. Clifford of my own accord, or have her ask me for one, or suffer from her freezing manner should she be too proud to say anything.

"My dilemma had three horns, you see, so I chose the first. When we came home, Mrs. Clifford and I were left alone together in the drawing-room for a few minutes; so I resolved to take action, and asked her if I might come to her room for a little while, when we went up-stairs, as I had something to say to her. She looked surprised, but said, 'Certainly,' and, before anything more could be said, Rosie came back, and we all went up-stairs. Rose was so sleepy that she just bade me good-night at my door, instead of coming into my room to talk over the party, as she usually did; I hurriedly took off the hateful dress, and wrote you the little note that surprised you all so much, and then put on my wrapper, and, with the calmness of despair, went and tapped at Mrs. Clifford's door. She let me in, and asked me to sit down, and then sat down herself quite near me. She did not look so freezing as she had looked all the evening. I did not wait for her to ask me what I wanted, but plunged into my subject, and told her the story from beginning to end, not making out that we were in a destitute condition generally, but trying to make her understand that it was only extras we had to do without. She never said a word until I stopped, and then, when I looked up to see how she took it, she came and stood right in front of me, and took my face in her hands, and kissed me. I burst out crying at this, like a great baby; but I could not help it, for I felt so relieved, and it was so sweet of her to behave in that way. She petted and comforted me, just as you might have done, mother; and when I was quiet again, she said: 'My child, you have saved us both much pain by your frankness, and relieved my mind in a manner of which you can form no idea until you hear my part of the story.' And then she told me all about the trunk.

"She lost it more than a year ago, as she was travelling to Italy on a visit. She had several trunks, and this was a new one she bought expressly to hold some dresses and laces after the others were filled. Through the carelessness of her son, who had charge of all her luggage, this trunk was sent off without any name or direction—without even a card on it. The trunk having nothing whatever by which it might be distinguished, she gave up all hope of recovering it. Her nephew did inquire and advertise for it after she and her son had gone, but was never able to hear anything of it. She resigned herself to her fate, caring more for the loss of that beautiful dress—which she was taking over to a favorite niece of hers—than she did for her own things. That was my 'rosebud' dress. But now comes the real romance of the trunk, which I have been saving till the last, seeing that it most concerns myself.

"Mrs. Clifford asked me if I had any objection to her seeing the trunk, as she had a particular reason for wishing to do so. Of course I had not; so she came with me to my room, where it was lying, and waited for me to raise the lid. Then she asked me if I had any papers in that little pocket on one of the trays that you perhaps remember seeing. I said I had not; whereupon she asked me for a penknife, and opened the pocket and passed the blade along the inner edge somewhere. She smiled at my look of astonishment, saying that she would explain her strange proceedings in a moment; and from between the two linings which she had separated in this way she drew out a little folded paper. Then she took my hand and said, with her voice all trembling: 'My child, how can I ever thank you?'

"She could not say anything more for a few minutes, but when she could speak steadily again she told me what it all meant. I do not understand legal technicalities, but the paper was a deed or something which involved the possession of nearly all her property. I did not quite understand her statement, but it was something to this effect: when she first lost her trunk, she was not at all anxious about the document, for there was another just as good with her lawyer; but his office was burnt down within a month or two afterwards, and a relation of her husband's—her husband died many years ago—had laid claim to the property. She had no proof to sustain her rights—though of course everybody who knew her believed her to be the rightful owner—and now this deed, or whatever it was, might save the property for her. She had to go on to London to consult with her lawyer about it, and was going to begin a fresh search for the trunk the next day. The reason she had turned so pale when she saw me in that dress was that the niece to whom she was taking it had died soon after Mrs. Clifford last went to Italy. I had reminded her of this niece, she said, when she first met me, and when she saw me in that dress she was painfully startled.

"I still meant to come home the next day after we had had this talk, for I thought it would be pleasanter for everybody, and so I told Rosie in the morning after she had heard all about it. But they were both so loving, and really seemed to want me to stay so much, that I concluded to do so. Mrs. Clifford would not hear of taking the trunk and other things back. At first I felt discomposed about it. But if you could only have heard how she talked! She said that she had never had a daughter, and that it would pain her if I did not accept the things as a remembrance of the great service I had done her. As if I had done it on purpose! And Rosie sided with her, so that I had to yield; and Mrs. Clifford said I was to be sure and have the rest of the dresses made up when I went home—it would please her so to know that I was wearing them.

"And now comes that which most relates to myself. Mrs. Clifford is going back to Italy in three or four weeks to visit her son, who is married and settled there, and she says she is commissioned by her daughter-in-law to bring a governess for her children—and she wants to take me. The salary is just three times as much as I get now for my music lessons; and Mrs. Clifford says that, although she may be partial, she thinks that I cannot fail to like her relations, and to be happy with them. She did not want me to decide without consulting mother and all of you, but she would like an answer as soon as possible. There—my story's ended! And now, my very patient and attentive audience, you may all make your remarks."

These were many, as may be supposed, and we sat up talking of Clarie's good fortune till our mother fairly drove us to bed. Of course it was decided that Clarie should accept the situation.

Mrs. Clifford answered her note of acceptance with one of cordial thanks, in which she begged permission to stay a night with us on her way to her son's home; afterwards Clarie and she could proceed together. It was a little out of her way, we knew, and Clarie had expected to meet her at the railway-station, so that we felt very much pleased with the thoughtful kindness which the proposal showed. She came, and we were all as much charmed with her as Clarie had been, and it took away much of the sorrow of parting with our darling when we saw what a friend she had secured.

Clarie passed three happy years in her Italian home—for such she felt it to be—coming home for her vacation every summer, and looking stronger and prettier each time, we thought. She often saw the kind friend who had been the cause of her good fortune, and the love between them seemed to increase with each meeting. At the end of these years two of the children of whom Clarie had charge were sent to school; and, although her employers urged her to stay until the third should be prepared for school also, she could not disappoint Arthur by turning a deaf ear to his proud and happy letter of entreaty that she would come to the home where he could "keep us all now, and let us do nothing from morning till night if we liked." So we are all together once more—not "doing nothing from morning till night" by any means, but consulting our own inclinations about the style of our work a little more than we used to do.

Arthur talked of buying another trunk for himself, and setting out to make his fortune, but concluded to stick to the surer—if somewhat slower—way in which he had started; and he has had no reason to regret having done so.

THE softest road is not always the best road. It is on the smooth ice we slip; a rough path is usually safer for our feet.

ONE cheerful face in a household will keep everything bright and warm within. Envy, hatred, malice, selfishness, despondency, and a host of evil passions, may lurk around the door, they may even look within, but they can never enter and abide there; the cheerful face will put them to shame and flight.

"As no one," says Mrs. Steele, "is abused save to a willing listener, the friend who tells you she has heard you calumniated must be ranked with the calumniators." She is even worse than they are; for, if it had not been for her, you might never have known the unpleasant things they said of you. This, at any rate, is one of those numerous circumstances in which ignorance is really bliss.

DEBORAH NORMAN:*

HER WORK AND HER REWARD.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER IX.

ON retiring from the residence of Deacon Strong, Deborah Norman made a visit to "Coulter's Row." She found Mrs. Pyne more comfortable than she had expected. Her room had been put in order by some of the women upon whom she had urged the duty of caring for a sick neighbor; and many things needed for the baby and her mother had been supplied from their scanty stores.

"Where is thy husband?" asked Deborah of the sick wife.

The pale face of the woman brightened as she answered: "He's at Mr. Logan's again to-day. He worked there all yesterday, and Mr. Logan sent us sugar, and tea, and flour, and ever so many things we needed—a great deal more I am sure than the wages would have bought; and he told John to come again this morning, as he had something more for him to do. And John says he's never going to drink anything again as long as he lives."

A glad expression broke into the woman's countenance.

"Oh, if he'll only keep to it!" she added. "John's industrious, and capable, and honest. There's no fear about our getting along if he'll only let drink alone."

The light faded from her wan face, and a dreary expression came over it.

"His help must come from God," said Deborah. "Thou remembers what I said yesterday? If we look to our Father in Heaven, He will give us strength to overcome. Has thee a Bible?"

The woman shook her head. "We had a large family Bible once; and our marriage was in it, and the births and deaths of our children. But it went with the rest, when things got to the worst. How, I don't know." She caught her breath and sobbed.

Deborah drew from her pocket a small Testament, and, opening it, read from one of the Gospels a few comforting passages. Then closing the book, she said: "There is a power in God's Holy Word by which we may conquer in every temptation. I will leave this Testament; and I want thee to promise me to read in it every day; and not only to read in it thyself, but to get thy husband to read it also. When he comes home at dinner-time to-day, show him the book, and say that I left it particularly for him, and that I want him to read a chapter before he goes away in the morning, and a chapter before he goes to bed at night; and not to read it only, but to think often through the day of its precepts and its promises."

A few of the women who met Deborah on the day before, hearing that she had called again, came into Mrs. Pyne's room, some drawn by curiosity, some by the hope of a little charity toward themselves, and some attracted by a latent desire to come once more under the influences which had moved them so strangely; the tender impressions of which they were not yet able to shake off.

Deborah spoke kindly to them all, saying how pleasant it was to see the comfort their neighborly care had brought to their sick sister. "God sees and knows it all," she said in her sweet, assuring way; "for He is everywhere present. Not alone in temples and in great congregations, but in poor, little places like this. And where two or three are gathered together in His name, He tells us that He is in their midst. I think you must all have felt His presence yesterday. I am sure I did. The house of God and the gate of Heaven are not always grand and glorious to human eyes; but often very humble and poor. It was not to the rich, and great, and powerful that our blessed Lord came two thousand years ago, but to the lost sheep of the House of Israel. He fed the hungry, and clothed the naked, and healed the sick, and gave comfort to those who mourned. He is still the same kind and loving Saviour; and though we cannot see Him with our bodily eyes, He is yet very near to each one of us. 'Behold,' He says, 'I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.' Let me read you some of the beautiful and precious things He said to His disciples. And He is saying them always to those who try to follow Him, even though they be very far off, and though they halt and stumble in their steps."

And she opened to Matthew and read a portion of the Lord's Sermon on the Mount. After this she prayed with them; and so tenderly uttered and in such homely phrase, as fitting the occasion, were her petitions, that most of the women had wet eyes when they rose from their knees.

Then she took each of them by the hand in turn, saying an encouraging word, and particularly enjoining on them to be considerate of each other and helpful when it lay in their power.

"And don't forget our sick sister here," she added. "It does my heart good to see how much has been done for her. How nice and clean her room has been made, and how many little comforts have been brought to her. And I can see in your faces that you are all glad and happy over what has been done; and is not that feeling a sweet reward? Surely it is! Do you know what it means? The Saviour stood and knocked at the door of your hearts; and you opened the door when you put forth a hand to help and comfort our sick and suffering neighbor; when you obeyed His divine precept, 'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.' And then He was able to come in and bless you."

"Dear sisters! I am not talking idly. The Lord our God has indeed been very near to you all, even in your very hearts. Oh, do not cast Him out, and shut and bar the door! Do not turn away from Him. I know your lot is hard. That some of you have want, and suffering, and sin to contend with, and that temptation meets you at every turn. So much the greater need have you of a divine Helper and Saviour. So much the greater need of a Friend who will stick closer than a brother. You all know what is right and what is wrong. Doing right is obeying God's laws; doing wrong is breaking them. Doing right brings us so near to Him that He can help and bless us; doing wrong sets us off to a distance—shuts the door against Him—and leaves us helpless among the enemies who are seeking to destroy our souls. Doing right is coming into the light and warmth of God's presence; doing wrong is going away in cold and darkness."

So she talked with them, until she lifted their souls into a higher region, and enabled them to see by a new light, until juster ideas of God than they had heretofore known became clear to their minds, and a sense of His love, and care, and perpetual effort to save the lowliest, and vilest, and most sinful of His unhappy children, took hold of their perceptions.

"We have had a pleasant time together in this room," said Deborah, as she was going away. "Will you all meet me here again to-morrow morning?"

They promised with a hearty assent.

"And don't forget," she added, "that the pleasantness and profit of our meeting to-morrow will be all the greater for our good life till then. What I mean by a good life, is keeping ourselves from wrong doing; for not to do evil is the first step in doing good. Indeed, it has been said that not to do evil is to do good. But each one of you understands her duty well enough. As far as you see it, try to do it; and the very effort will bring God nearer and make doing right an easier thing than any of you imagine. Oh, my sisters! God loves and cares for each one of you as much as He does for the purest and saintliest in the land; and if you will turn to Him and let Him be your Friend, He will lead you into straight paths and make the dreary wastes of life blossom as the rose."

She went away, leaving the women to talk for a while together, and strengthen each other in good resolutions. Mrs. Pyne's small garret received a few more orderly touches; her bed was made a little softer; a bowl of warm gruel was prepared, and the baby's comfort looked after. The poor chamber would not have been known as the dreary one into which Deborah Norman came on the day before. Not by her own hands had these changes been wrought, but by the hands of those into whom she had been able to infuse a portion of that spirit by which her own life was influenced.

Sandy Spieler tried, but in vain, to throw off the effect produced by Deborah's visit. As he had declared it would be, so it proved; for he could not look at a certain place in his bar-room without seeing the form of the kneeling young Quakeress, with her pure and saintly face uplifted to heaven. He still felt the gentle pressure of her hand in his; still heard the sweet but serious tones of her voice as she talked with God as to a friend, face to face, and asked that he might be led to see the evil work he was doing and moved to abandon it. There were periods, in the wakeful night that followed, in which he felt real distress of mind; and in which he more than half resolved to shut the door of his saloon and pour his liquor into the street.

He was not a thoroughly bad man, caring little as to who suffered so he obtained the desire of his heart. His childhood had not been passed among the base and vicious, but in a Christian home, back to which his memory could never go without unveiling the image of his mother with a white-robed child kneeling before her and saying his evening prayer. She died while he was yet a little boy, and then he drifted out upon a sea of temptation, and lost the better influences that would have led him to a higher and nobler manhood than the one he had obtained. He had sought in many ways to earn his livelihood; but never took the gains of dishonesty or oppression. Something that remained with him from childhood held him back, and kept him from the reckless abandonment of many of those with whom he was thrown into association. He had been in Spangler's employment as an agent when the stages ran between Kedron and the State capitol, but lost his position when the railroad threw out the stage line; and not finding anything to do that just suited him, took the advice of Spangler, who advanced him a few hundred dollars, and opened a drinking-saloon. The business had been profitable, and Spieler, at the time of his introduction to the reader, was in possession of a snug little property, and was growing more comfortably off each year.

It cannot be said that he liked his business. There were many things about it that were disagreeable and annoying; and many things that often disturbed his peace of mind. The fall of young men always troubled him; and it was no uncommon thing for him to refuse a second or a third glass, when he saw that a customer had already taken sufficient to confuse his brain.

Desperate wives and sad-hearted mothers came, sometimes, to the bar-room of Sandy Spieler, and begged him not to sell liquor to their husbands or their sons. Such visitations were particularly unpleasant. He was not hardened or brutal enough to spurn them with insult. Their tearful eyes, their suffering faces and pleading sentences, made a painful impression on his feelings that did not quickly pass away.

On the morning that succeeded Deborah's visit, Spieler had in an unusual number of people, among whom were Spangler and the young man named Howe. An incident so singular and almost startling in its character as the visit referred to, had already become town talk, and given to Spieler's bar-room a kind of notoriety that attracted more than its ordinary run of customers.

Spangler, loud and coarse, threw off his vulgar jests and witticisms, at which the company laughed as usual. He did not spare the young Quakeress in his vile talk; but to this few gave a hearty response; and it was noticed that Spieler looked grave and disapproving.

"Where's Parson Gilbert?" asked Spangler, looking about the room.

"Oh, he'll be along soon," replied Howe, with a laugh.

"Get the anxious-bench ready, Sandy, my boy!" And Spangler laid his hand on a settee. "We're going to have a prayer-meeting. Catch hold, Victor! There! Right in front of the bar—pulpit I mean—and we'll call it the chan—"

"Stop!" cried Spieler, in a quick, angry voice, ere Spangler could utter the word that was on his lips. "There's been enough of this!"

"Highly-tighty!" ejaculated Spangler, as he raised himself erect. "What's to pay now? Hold your horses, my boy, and don't let's have a smash up!"

"Hold your own horses," replied Spieler, his brows growing hot; "or turn them into another road."

"Not at your bidding," said Spangler, the surprise which had come into his face changing to an angry frown.

At this moment the door of the bar-room opened, and Deborah came in so noiselessly that no one heard the sound of her entrance. But all who were looking at the saloon-keeper saw him start, and his countenance change. A moment afterwards, and the hush was so deep that the fall of a pin could have been heard on the floor.

The face of Deborah Norman, as she advanced a few steps into the room, was pale almost to whiteness; but the very peace of God rested upon it. Out of her calm, tender eyes an angel looked in love and pity. Even Spangler felt a subduing power. She stood silent for a little while; then her voice broke out clear and serious, every heart answering with a strange thrill: "If I could say, 'Peace be unto this house!' how gladly would I say it. But I cannot."

Then she was silent for a brief space longer. No one could speak or in any way set her at defiance. There was a spell like that of some fabled enchantress in her presence.

"We are all God's children," she said, her voice rising to a firmer pitch; "and He loves us with an equal love; letting His sun shine upon the evil and the good, and sending his rain upon the just and the unjust. To those who keep His laws, He gives a peace that passeth all understanding—a peace that He cannot give to those who set His counsels at naught, because in so doing they shut their hearts against Him. We keep His laws when we do good to the neighbor; and we break them when we do evil."

She was silent again for some moments; but the weird power of her presence remained unbroken.

"We cannot exist for a single instant without Him," she went on, with a deeper impressiveness in her tones. "Nor can we hide ourselves from His presence. He is with us in the daytime and in the night; sees all that we do, and knows our most secret thoughts and purposes. Should we not be very circumspect, my friends—very careful as to what we do and say—thus living each moment under the eyes of God? A pure, and loving, and just, and merciful God? Think of it, friends! And do not feel angry with His servant, who comes moved by His Spirit, and not of her own accord, to speak to you of these things. She would rather hide herself in some secret place than appear in your presence; but she cannot keep back this testimony and be innocent before God."

Then, sinking upon her knees in the midst of this company of deeply-impressed men, Deborah

Norman lifted her sweet face and large, tender eyes heavenward, and in a clear voice, the alight tremor of which betrayed the strain on her feelings, prayed, briefly, thus:

"There is an evil thing, Lord, in our midst, and the hurt of the people is very great. A cry of bitter anguish is going up to Thee night and day. Out of this place in which we now call unto Thee for help, a stream of desolation pours its waters of sorrow and despair. They are very bitter, and destroy every green and beautiful thing that comes in their way. Standing in Thy presence, now, is one made in Thy image and likeness; born that he might become an angel; endowed with infinite capacities for doing good. His hand is on the source of this fiery stream. At his will it flows; at his will it can cease. Touch his heart, oh, tender and loving God! Open his eyes that he may see the awful work that he is doing. Lead him into a better way. Let him not be angry with Thy servant, whom Thou hast sent hither, for her seeming boldness. Thou knowest her heart, and how she has striven with Thy Spirit that she might not do this thing. Pity and help us all in our weakness; and if we cannot do any good to our neighbor, hold us back, Lord, from doing him any harm. And may Thy peace dwell in our hearts. Amen."

She arose quickly, like one who had been compelled to stand at a post of danger up to an appointed moment, and then, in returning weakness, fled away. Dropping her eyes to the floor, she went out hastily, not looking to the right nor to the left.

The first to speak, because the least impressed, was Len Spangler. Wheeling round to the bar, over which Spieler was leaning with his head bent forward, he reached out one of his hands, saying, with affected eagerness: "Brandy! Quick! Or I shall faint! That young woman will be the death of me!"

But Spieler did not stir from his position; he only lifted his eyes to the face of Spangler and looked at him in an absent kind of way.

"Brandy, man! Are you moonstruck?" exclaimed the latter, with rising impatience.

At this Spieler drew himself up slowly, and stood with the air of a man in debate over some question involving grave considerations. His singular manner and the growing excitement of Spangler caused the rest of the company to move forward, curious to see what would follow. A bottle of spirits was standing on the counter.

"Brandy! Do you hear?" shouted Spangler.

At this Spieler's mind leaped to a decision. His eyes flashed with a sudden light; his mouth became firm. Reaching for the bottle that stood before him; he put it back upon the shelf from which he had taken it just as Deborah came in, and said in a low but resolute voice: "No more brandy! I am done with this business!"

The blank amazement which came into Spangler's face was curious to see. It had in it something almost ludicrous. He stepped back several paces from the bar, looking at the saloon-keeper as at some strange apparition. Before he could speak, Spieler continued: "If any one here wishes to try his hand at this business, there's a chance open to him. As for me, I've sold my last drink."

"I swear!" ejaculated Spangler, his countenance expressing the utmost astonishment.

"And I swear, too," said Spieler, turning to the shelves behind his bar, and pushing back the decanters one after another, as if to add an emphasis to his purpose.

"You can't be in earnest, Sandy Spieler!" remarked one of the company.

"Never more so in my life," he returned. "If you can stand praying like that, all right, come along and try it. I'll sell out cheap."

The man shook his head, saying: "I might have taken your offer a week ago; but don't just fancy the look of things now. If prayer-meetings are to be mixed up with liquor-selling, I shall not try my hand at the business."

"Wouldn't advise you," returned Spieler. "If the devil were to come here and kick up a row, I'd pitch in and see who'd come off second best; but I can't fight with angels. Don't know what to do with them. And then, you see," lowering his voice, "we may laugh and joke and say what we please about it, but they have One on their side who is stronger than we are."

There was an impressiveness in Spieler's manner that gave power to what he said and made it felt by all except Spangler, who broke in upon him with oaths and jeers. He parried these without any show of resentment; but kept firm to his expressed determination.

"If you want the place you can have it at your own price," he said. "I'm out of the business from this hour and don't mean to sell another glass. Much obliged to you all for your custom. We've had some jolly times; but I'm afraid some have had to pay the piper who didn't enjoy the music, and that while we were merry many were sad because of our merriment. It isn't an agreeable thought, when we come right down to it, that in our gains others have loss, and in our pleasures others have sorrow. There is no good in this business except the money-good that comes over the counter; what goes over helps no one and hurts many. You all know this as well as I do. Peter!" He turned to a bar-tender.

The man came forward, saying: "Well, sir?"

"Shut up the windows, and close the doors."

"Sir?" In no feigned surprise.

"Shut the doors and windows."

"Yes, sir." And the man moved to do his bidding.

"Well, if you aren't the cussedest fool I ever heard of!" cried Spangler.

"Perhaps I am; but you know the fools are not all dead," returned Spieler, turning off the rough speech with a laugh.

The shutters were closed and the blinds put up. One after another of Spieler's customers went drifting out slowly, and going off thoughtful and serious, until only Len Spangler remained. By this time even his excitement had cooled down considerably.

"This does beat the devil, Sandy!" he said, in a tone of remonstrance, when they were alone. "Have you lost your seven senses?"

"I don't know how many senses I've lost, Mr. Spangler," was the steadily-spoken reply, "but I've found something that was mislaid a good many years ago."

"What do you call it?"

"Humanity."

"Faugh!"

"I heard you denounce Deacon Strong only yesterday for his inhumanity toward that young girl Victor Howe was telling us about, because he docked her four and a half days' wages for three days lost through sickness."

"A cursed hypocrite!" exclaimed Spangler, almost savagely.

"It was hard and inhuman, certainly; but what better am I if I take from some half-crazed wretch the money that should buy bread for his starving children, and put it into my own till, giving him in return a draught that will make him madder than before?"

"Oh, pshaw! Don't pile it on after that fashion! You do nothing of the kind."

"It comes so near to it often, that the difference lies only in words," returned Spieler. "Deacon Strong grinds and robs the poor in one way, and tavern-keepers in another. We're all in the same boat."

"But you're not a set of whining hypocrites. You don't pretend to be serving God while working for the devil."

"Thank you for the last word, Mr. Spangler! It comes in pat, and strikes the nail I have just driven in a clinching blow."

"You never pretended that you were working for God," said the other, with a laugh.

"No; I was working for myself and the devil, as you said just now; trying, like your Deacon Strong, to get as much and give as little as possible. To make money, no matter who lost it or who was hurt. That's the long and short of it, and there's no use in trying to put any other face on the thing. It may be very generous in me to hand out a few dollars, as I did last week, to keep a poor sick woman from starving, because Deacon Strong had, on some shabby pretense, held back her daughter's wages. But my self-praise and denunciation of the deacon ar'n't worth much as things are. If the money that sick woman's husband pays every week to tavern-keepers—I've had my full share of it, as you know—had been taken home, there'd have been no necessity for the girl's working in Strong's mill, and no lack of bread for his wife and children."

"You didn't compel him to drink at your bar," was answered.

"I took his money and gave him drink when I knew that his wife and children were cold and hungry," said Spieler. "I spoke to him pleasantly, and made him welcome. I encouraged him to visit my saloon that I might get the bread-money of his starving babes. It was I who helped to send his poor weakly child to labor for long, tiresome hours in the deacon's mill, that she might earn the bread the price of which was in my till!"

"Good heavens, Sandy! Are you losing your your mind? What's come over you?"

"You're not a fool, Spangler. You know what's what as well as any other man. I'm talking on the square, and you know it. Neither you nor I go through the world with our eyes shut. When I went into this business, I understood what I was doing, and knew that so long as I remained in it I would do more harm than good. But I was cornered like, and this seemed the only way out. You stood my friend and helped me to a start. I never meant to stay in it longer than was needed to get a pile. I haven't got a very big one yet, but I'm going out. I heard a preacher say once that money got through fraud, or wrong, or any hurt to the neighbor, never did good to any one, and often proved a curse. And I shouldn't wonder if he was right. Tavern-keepers, as a class, don't come out very well in the long run. They're not a happy, contented or prosperous set of men. Trouble is always coming to them in one way or another; and they are almost always cursed in their children, if they have any. They make a good deal of money when they stick close to business; but, somehow, it slips easily through their fingers, and if they happen to get a liking for drink, it's all over with them in a few years. And then, you see, this business doesn't bring a man into safe company. If he's at all weak or confiding, his 'friends' will clean him out in little or no time, and then kick him into the gutter if he complains of ill usage."

"Good for you, Sandy!" exclaimed Spangler, half-amused and half-surprised. "I see where you're drifting. Going into the temperance-lecture business."

"No, going out of the drunkard-making business," replied the other. "It's of no use mincing words. You know, and I know, that the greatest curse of this and every other American city is to be found in bars and drinking-saloons. That two-thirds of all the misery and crime from which the people suffer flow directly from them. We've had our own time abusing Deacon Strong for robbing the poor of their hard-earned wages; but if there were no taverns in Kedron to drain the life out of them first, and then drive helpless women and children to his mill in order to save themselves from starvation, he would find less opportunity for grinding oppression. We take the loaf, and he scrimps the crust. It's an upper and a lower millstone business; and God help the wretches who get between them!"

There was an impressiveness in the manner of Sandy Spieler that added force to what he said. The effect on Spangler was a surprise to him.

"God help them, sure enough!" responded that individual, with an emphasis that revealed a change in both sentiment and feeling.

"It's the old story of the mote and the beam, Mr. Spangler. I shall see much clearer to pluck the mote out of Deacon Strong's eye if I get the beam out of my own."

"That's Scripture," said Spangler, with returning levity. "Hope you're not going to turn preacher, my boy!"

"There's no harm in Scripture and a sight of good," was replied. "If we all went by Scripture, we'd be better and happier, I'm thinking."

"Do as you'd be done by. That's Scripture, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"It's in Deacon Strong's Bible, I presume."

"Oh, certainly."

"How does he get over it?"

"Can't say: but he's long-headed and sharp-witted, and thinks, no doubt, that he can hocus the Judge at the last day. But I call it a risky business for a deacon. If I belonged to his regiment, and paid as little regard to army orders as he does, I shouldn't expect much mercy when the court-martial was ordered on my case. He'll be brought up with a round turn one of these days; you may bet on that."

"Isn't Vic Howe after one of the girls who works in his mill?"

"Yes, I believe so."

"Who is she?"

"Don't know. He's been buzzing about her for the last few weeks; and cursing old Strong up hill and down."

"What for?"

"The girl isn't able to work two-thirds of her time, and the deacon, to make it even, docks her one-third, or something like that."

"Is she handsome?"

"So Vic says."

"More's the pity for her. Howe isn't a saint, you know. What's her name?"

"I've heard it; but I forget. Oh! it's Williams—Fanny Williams."

"Williams—Williams? Fanny Williams, did you say?" inquired Spangler, his manner changing suddenly.

"Yes, that's the name."

Spangler stood thinking for several moments, an unusually sober expression on his face. He did not again refer to the subject, but entered into a new discussion with Spieler about his proposed abandonment of the liquor traffic, urging him to reconsider the matter and not throw himself entirely out until he saw an opportunity to get into some other business. But Sandy was not to be moved.

"It's no use to talk about it," he answered, finally. "That young Quakeress has killed the business for me. She's set me to thinking in a way I never thought before. If I were a devil and didn't care who went to hell, it would be different; but I'm not. I do care. And there's another thing; I can never again stand at this bar and look down the room without seeing Deborah Norman kneeling on the floor, with her pure, pale face looking up to heaven. You may laugh, if you will; but it's so. I'm not hard enough for this trade, and I'm going out of it."

CHAPTER X.

ON leaving Spieler's saloon, Deborah took her way homeward with hurrying feet, not pausing until she reached Mrs. Conrad's and gained the seclusion of her own chamber. Her face was pale; the brows a little contracted as if she were suffering in mind or body; her lips pressed closely together. The moment she was inside of her room, she dropped upon the bed, burying her face in a pillow. For full twenty minutes she lay as motionless as one asleep.

When she awoke, at length, and pushed back the hair from her temples, there was a flush on her face, a wonderful depth and brightness in her eyes, and a serene softness on the lips a little while before so pale and compressed. She had been communing with God. Angels had come very near to her as she lifted her heart and prayed for strength and courage to walk as the Spirit seemed leading her, and their peace and blessedness were filling her soul. Her reward was with her; and she found it inexpressibly sweet. Whether any good would come of what she had been doing she knew not; but whenever a question as to results arose in her mind, she answered it with this well-known text: "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand, for thou canst not tell which shall prosper, this or that."

Deborah had been home for about half an hour, when Mrs. Conrad knocked at her door, and then came in. Her eyebrows were arched considerably higher than usual, and Deborah saw that she had some communication of more than common interest to make.

"Who do you think has called to see you?" she asked, looking mysterious.

"I am not good at guessing," Deborah replied, keeping out of her voice and manner any sign of curiosity.

"I don't believe you'd guess in a week. Why, Deacon Strong?"

"Deacon Strong, did thee say?" Deborah was not able to master her surprise.

"Yes; it's Deacon Strong, the old heathen! if he does call himself a Christian. He's a whited sepulchre, if there ever was one!"

"Judge not that ye be not judged; for with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye mete it shall be measured unto you again," said Deborah, in a tone of quiet reproof.

But Mrs. Conrad was not to be put down by a text of Scripture, particularly when she had another as good for her own side.

"By their fruits ye shall know them, Miss Norman. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of God, but he that doeth the will of my Father. And I hardly think you will call grinding the poor, or renting houses for rum-selling and even worse, if that be possible, doing the will of our Father in Heaven! I'm sure I don't; and I'm not half so nice as you are about somethings. Shall I tell him you're coming down?"

"Yes. I'll see him in a moment."

Deborah found Deacon Strong walking uneasily about the little parlor. He stood still, turning around with a quick motion when he heard her light step at the entry door.

"Miss Norman," he said, in a respectful voice, as he held out his hand. She gave him hers, and he grasped the soft, little member with a nervous pressure.

"Will thee take a chair?" returned the maiden, not a shade of excitement in her manner, and she pointed to a seat. The deacon sat down, and Deborah took a chair near him.

It was some moments before the visitor was able to compose himself enough to speak in an even tone of voice.

"What you said to me this morning," he began, "has set me to thinking, and troubles me."

"May the trouble bring thee peace, friend Strong; as I am sure it will, if thee lets the Spirit of God lead thee," replied Deborah, in her sweet, penetrative voice that stirred the deacon's heart, and made it burn within him."

"Something has happened since then that troubles me still more. There is a soul in peril; a soul for whose safety I am in great concern." The deacon grew visibly agitated.

"If this be so, God has laid upon thee a great responsibility, and I do not wonder thee feels troubled," replied Deborah, with a solemn warning in her tones.

"Do you know a young girl named Fanny Williams?"

But Deborah had not heard of her.

"She has been working in my mill," said the deacon, "but went away this morning. She's pretty, and fond of dress, and is keeping company with a young man who will lead her, I fear, into no good—an idle, godless fellow, who spends half his time in taverns."

"I don't wonder thee feels anxious about her, friend Strong," returned Deborah, with a quiver of concern in her voice. "Does thee know anything about the girl's family?"

The deacon shook his head.

"How long as she been in thy mill?"

"For nearly a year, I think."

"And thee hasn't learned anything about her family, nor how she lives at home in all this time?"

"We can't, as a rule, look after the people who work for us, Miss Norman. We pay them their wages, and there the matter ends. The presumption is that they know how to take care of themselves. If they do not, there are people whose duty it is to look after them, and to whom they can go in time of need. Business is business. Looking after the social needs and well-being of individuals in any community is another thing. You cannot mix the two together any more than you can mix oil and water."

The face of Deborah became very serious, and the deacon saw that she was no better satisfied with his excuse than he was himself.

"Does thee know where the girl lives?" she asked.

"She has a room, my overseer tells me, near the corner of James and Myrtle Streets."

"Then she is not living with her mother, or sister, or friend?"

"No; as I understand it, she rents a room and lives in it by herself."

"Not always a good way," said Deborah.

"Then she must be a lone girl in Kedron?"

"I think so."

"Pretty and fond of dress?"

"Yes."

"And keeping company with a young man who does not bear a good character?"

"I wouldn't just like to say that his character is bad, Miss Norman. But he's a godless young man; and, in my opinion, no more to be trusted with a young girl like Fanny Williams than a wolf with a lamb."

"You say that she left thy mill this morning?"

"Yes."

"Why did she do so?"

The deacon hesitated, and showed some uneasiness of manner as he replied: "There was a little trouble between her and the overseer about wages. She loses a great deal of time, and is short every week."

"Why does she lose so much time?" asked Deborah.

"Her excuse is sickness."

"Indeed! Is she frail in constitution?"

"I don't think her very strong. She is troubled with sick headaches, I believe."

"How much time does she generally lose in a week?"

"Never less than two or three days. She lost three days last week."

"Poor child!" said Deborah, her voice full of pity. She had heard of the mill-owner's hard system of docking, and was beginning to understand something of the girl's desperate condition. If she were losing three days in a week from sickness, and had nothing but her own meager earnings to depend upon; if she were young and pretty, and fond of dress; if she were weak from hunger and sickness; if she had no wise, true and loving friend to watch over and care for her in her extremity, and with a tempter by her side, then indeed was her soul in danger!

Deborah laid her hands across her bosom, and dropping her eyes to the floor, sat for some moments without speaking. She was looking up with a question on her lips, when the deacon, who had glanced from the window, exclaimed: "There they are now!"

Following the direction of Deacon Strong's eyes, Deborah saw a young man and woman moving slowly along the sidewalk, he talking very earnestly, and she leaning toward him in a weak, confiding manner.

"What is the young man's name?" asked Deborah, as she arose with a quick movement, and the air of one who had formed a sudden purpose.

"Victor Howe," replied the deacon.

"And the girl's?"

"Fanny Williams."

"Is there anything thee would have me say to her?" asked Deborah, already moving toward the door.

"What are you going to do?" The deacon had risen also, and was showing considerable agitation.

"Save a soul, if I can," Deborah answered, disappearing through the door. Her light steps sounded along the narrow hall and up the short flight of stairs. In a few moments she came down, moving lightly but swiftly. She had drawn on her bonnet and shawl.

"Farewell! I will call and see thee at thy house," she said, stopping for an instant at the parlor door, and then passing into the street.

It took Deacon Strong a considerable time to get out of the mental bewilderment into which he was thrown. Mrs. Conrad, whose curiosity had been greatly excited by his visit to Deborah, was very naturally surprised at seeing the latter go off in so hurried a manner, leaving the deacon alone in the parlor. It gave her an excuse to present herself, and she did not fail to take advantage thereof. On seeing Mrs. Conrad, the deacon's heavy brows fell, and his hard mouth shut firmly. Not that he knew her, or had anything against her; but the intrusion of any third party was annoying. He bowed formally, not speaking, and passing her at the door, went out.

"Old hunks!" ejaculated Mrs. Conrad, in infinite contempt. "Old heathen! Old skinkflint! If I had my will of you!" And she stretched out toward his retiring form a firmly-clenched hand.

"What's in the wind now, I wonder?" she queried, in a more subdued voice, as she seated herself in a rocking-chair, and clapping her hands over her knees, began moving her body backward and forward. "Deacon Strong calling to see Miss Norman, and she going off in hot haste as if the sheriff was after her! I can't make it out. What can he want with her? Somebody's in trouble about something, of course! When people get into trouble, they're quick enough to run after Miss Norman. But Deacon Strong! I'm just beat out!" And she rocked herself more vigorously.

On going into the street, Deborah saw Victor Howe and Miss Williams standing on the pavement not far off; the young man still talking earnestly. When they passed the window, she was leaning toward him in a half-fond, confiding manner. Now she stood quite erect, and a little drawn away from him. Deborah could see her face. It was white and thin, and the expression sad and almost helpless. She came forward without a sign of haste or purpose in her manner, pausing as she reached them. Laying a hand gently on the girl, who started and flushed with surprise, Deborah said, in that soft, sweet voice which nothing seemed able to resist: "Come, dear, I am going home with thee!"

As Miss Norman spoke, Howe, who had not observed her approach, turned with a start. No words passed between them. Only for an instant did the young man look into Deborah's calm, but sorrowful and accusing eyes. He could not bear their steady gaze. Dropping his own to the ground, he turned and walked away, leaving the weak soul he might have tempted to ruin in the safe guardianship of an angel, before whose pure presence he was unable to stand.

As the young man left them, Deborah drew her arm into one of the girl's, and pressing her closely to her side, said, in a voice tender and loving as a mother's: "Thee is sick, dear, and must go right home. Come."

Deborah drew upon the arm she had taken, and Fanny yielded as passively as a child; not speaking or in any way manifesting surprise. As they walked along, Deborah noticed that the girl leaned upon her more and more heavily, like one very tired and failing in strength. They were not very far from the neighborhood of James and Myrtle Streets, and soon reached the poor dwelling in which Miss Williams had her room. Not until then had either spoken again. At the door, Fanny drew herself away from Deborah and said: "Thank you very much! It was kind and good to bring me home."

Her voice was steady as she commenced speaking, but it broke down into a sob as she closed the sentence; then, like one struck with sudden faintness, she reached out and caught hold of Miss Norman and began trembling violently.

"I am going in with thee," said the latter, drawing an arm about the girl and moving toward the door. They passed in and up to a little back chamber, in which were a low, narrow bed, two or three chairs, a toilet-table and a washstand. Beyond these there was nothing that could be called furniture. On the mantelpiece were a few pieces of ornamental glass and china and two photograph stands holding carte-de-visite portraits. Three or four small pictures, with home-made, rustic frames hung on the walls; and a white muslin curtain was drawn across the window. Everything looked orderly, and the atmosphere of the room was sweet and wholesome.

They did not reach this little chamber a moment too soon. Scarcely were they inside, ere the failing strength of Miss Williams gave way, and Deborah's full strength was required to lift her upon the bed. She sunk back upon the pillows with a heavy sigh. As Deborah bent over her, she saw a deep pallor settle upon her face. She spoke to her, but she did not answer—shook her, but there was no response. The girl had fainted.

Tenderly, as if she had been her sister, Deborah loosened her garments, and after removing some of them, placed her in bed. She then took water, and after bathing her face and hands, chafed her limbs, and did all in her power, by simple means, to restore the vital action which had become temporarily suspended. She preferred not to summon aid if she could herself restore the fainting girl to life. It was half an hour before signs of returning animation were visible; and nearly an hour before consciousness was fully restored. But life did not flow back with even the old force. The heart-beats were very feeble; and the strength that came was scarcely more than the strength of an infant. The poor girl could not lift her head from the pillow, and the hands she attempted to raise fell powerless by her side. The eyes that looked up at the pure face bending over her, were pitiful in their expression of utter helplessness.

"It is all well," murmured Deborah, touching Fanny's lips with a soft kiss. "God does not forget His lambs."

The girl shut her eyes quickly to hold back the sudden rush of tears. But the closed lids would not keep them in. They pressed through and fell in great drops over her cheeks.

"If thee needs a friend, thee can have one now, Fanny. Thee sees that I know thy name. Thee has a loving Father in Heaven, who knoweth all thy ways, and the hardness of the paths thy feet have been treading. He pities and cares for thee, and has sent me to thy side to hold thee up in weakness."

She kissed her again. Sobs followed the gush of tears. Then Deborah put an arm under her neck and drew her head against her bosom, smoothing, as she did so, the hair from her temples, and sending sweet thrills, like magnetic pulses, through all her nerves. To the lonely, friendless girl it was like an introduction into Heaven! How her heart had yearned through weary years for love—for love like this—mother-love! sister-love!

But more than simple love must be offered now. The ministrations of love were needed, and must be quickly given. Food for the exhausted body was a pressing necessity; and to the provision of this Deborah now set herself.

She found the woman in whose house Fanny lived kindly disposed toward her, and ready to do anything that lay in her power. From her she learned many things of which she desired to be informed in order that she might act intelligently. All that the reader knows about Fanny's steadily falling health, loss of time at the mill and diminishing income, Deborah learned, and a great deal more besides, that deepened her interest in the case. The girl, as Deacon Strong had alleged, was fond of dress, and a little vain of her person; but not a word could be said against her conduct or her character. Of late, however, the woman said that she had been troubled about her, because of a young man who was calling for her almost every evening and taking her out to walk. She had asked Fanny about him two or three times, but the girl's replies made her feel less easy in her mind. She had seen the young man's face two or three times, and didn't like his looks. Why, she was not just able to say. It was a feeling she had. She did not know his name. But of one thing she was very positive, Fanny's health was breaking down rapidly.

"She's just starving, and that's the mortal truth Miss Norman; and I'm only too glad you've found her out!" was the closing and emphatic sentence in one of her answers to Deborah's many questions.

"Not literally starving! thee does not mean that?" said Deborah.

"Yes, Miss, just that. It's a case of slow starvation. I've seen for a good while how it was going. If they'd paid her at the mill for what she earned every week, instead of docking her for more time than she lost, because of her dreadful headaches, she might have kept up better. But they pinched so much off that what was left wouldn't pay her rent and buy enough good food to keep her alive. And then you see, she's one of the kind of girls that don't care for eating; one of the kind that's as hungry for a bit of ribbon as for a slice of bread. She's been living on mere slops for I don't know how long. I've talked to and scolded her; but it didn't do any good."

Deborah's first duty to Fanny Williams was plain. She must have nourishing food, tender care, and freedom from depressing anxiety about the future. She must be made to feel that she had a friend who would be to her as a sister or a mother. She must be lifted up and held up until able to walk in her own strength again. Then her feet could be led into an easier and safer way than that in which she had stumbled and well nigh fallen to rise no more.

After doing all that the girl's present condition required, Deborah went away leaving a kiss of tender assurance on her lips and promising to see her again before evening.

From the poor little chamber where the sick girl lay, Deborah went to the large and well-appointed residence of Deacon Strong, whom she found anxiously awaiting her appearance. There was a troubled, questioning look on his heavy face as she came in. He offered a chair in silence and waited for her to speak.

"Thee wishes to know about Fanny Williams?" said Deborah, resting her calm eyes upon the deacon.

"Yes—yes. What of her?"

"I took her home."

The deacon drew a breath of relief.

"What did she say?" he asked.

"Nothing. She's too sick."

"Sick! She did not look sick when I saw her this morning, nor when she passed your house."

"There's a point beyond which we may not strain anything. It will break if we do," answered Deborah. "Human strength is no exception to the rule. The strain upon this poor, friendless girl, has been too great."

Deborah's eyes, that were still resting upon the deacon, had in them this accusation: "Thou art the man?"

"I knew nothing about her—nothing of any strain," answered the mill owner, a little fretfully, as one who felt himself unjustly put to fault.

"Perhaps not; but in walking through this world we all have need to consider our steps lest we tread some weak or helpless one under our feet," replied Deborah. "The crushed limb does not suffer any the less because the iron heel that tramples upon it is unconscious of pain."

She saw the veins swell into cords on the deacon's temples.

"Our Lord was very tender and considerate of the poor and weak ones of the earth," continued Deborah. "None of them were ever wounded by the unheeding tread of His blessed feet. And shall we not also take heed unto our steps? If we would be His disciples, must we not walk as He walked, and consider the poor as He considered them? Are they not His legacy unto us? 'The poor ye have always with you.'"

She paused, waiting for the deacon to reply.

"If," he said, "the girl has suffered through my neglect, or because of any undue pressure of our rules, I am ready to make any amend that lies in my power. Can I do more?"

"Yes, thee may do a great deal more, friend Strong, if thee will."

"What?" Deep lines cut themselves into his forehead.

"Thee may look to it that others suffer not in like manner through thy neglect or because of thy business requirements. Flesh and blood are weak and sensitive things, and cannot be dealt with as we deal with iron and brass. They cover human souls, for each one of whom Christ died, and for whose salvation all Heaven is concerned. 'What will it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what will a man give in exchange for his soul?' These sees, by our Lord's own words, of what priceless value are human souls. Ah! if any are lost through us, will they not be required at our hands? There are, I am told, more than a hundred souls in thy mill. Does thee think of them only as so many machines that are to do a certain amount of work; and has thee no thought or care for them beyond this?"

Deborah was pressing the deacon too closely. She saw it by the change in his countenance, and a certain restlessness of movement, as if he were trying to hold down his rising anger.

"If," she said, after a slight pause, her tone and manner changing, "the Spirit did not constrain me, I would not say all this. But I cannot remain guiltless and keep silence. I pray thee, be not offended. It is of God's providence that I am here. Does thee not believe this?"

She waited for the deacon to reply, knowing that if he reflected for an instant his state of mind would change. She saw the change in his face, though he did not answer her question.

"I will say no more to thee now if thee is unwilling to hear," she remarked, with a gentleness of manner that subdued the deacon and brought him again within the sphere of her subtle influence.

"Enough for the present," he replied, a little coldly, but in a respectful tone. "You bewilder me. Another time we may talk of these things. And now, what can I do for Fanny Williams?"

"Her strength broke all down, and she fainted as soon as I got her home," replied Deborah. "The woman in whose house she is living says that she has been literally starving and wasting away, until there's hardly anything left of her. It took a long time to bring her back to life; and then she had no more strength than a baby. It may be weeks before she is well enough to get out, and longer before she is able to go to work again and take care of herself. She must have rest and ease of mind. I am willing to do all for her in my power. To see her every day; to minister to her needs; to watch over her as if she were my sister, and lead her feet into safer ways than the ones into which I fear they were about straying. But my portion of this world's goods is very small, and I have little or nothing to spare."

The deacon thrust his hand into his pocket, saying: "I will bear any cost. Here are ten dollars," handing Deborah a bank bill; "and when that is gone come to me for more. Don't let her want for anything. And, as you value her soul, don't let that young Howe come near her."

"I will see to that," replied Deborah, as she took the money from the deacon's hand. "And in the name of one of Christ's little ones, who is very weak and in sore need, I thank thee, friend Strong, for this timely aid! May it have a double blessing, and the best and largest come to thy own heart!"

She rose, a gentle "farewell" on her lips, and was about leaving the room, when Deacon Strong said: "I shall always be glad to see you, Miss Norman."

She turned, looking at him intently.

"Does thee mean it in compliment only?" she asked.

"No," said the deacon; "I mean it in earnest."

"I will come to see thee again," said the maiden, dropping her eyes from the deacon's face and going out with almost noiseless feet.

Home-Life and Character.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSISSIWAY POTTS.

THIRD SERIES.—No. 4.

I DID tell you my easy way of washing blankets once, but the HOME MAGAZINE has many new readers this year, and we want to tell them the very best things we know. Put a tub full of blankets to soak in tepid water in which you have dissolved three cents' worth of good borax. Do this the afternoon or evening before the day you want to wash your blankets. Occasionally press them down or turn them over. In the morning, pour on hot water, add a little soap, and press and squeeze them thoroughly before wringing. Then put them through one clean, hot suds, and they will be soft and white. We hope you all have washers and wringers, and that you use them and take good care of them and award to them a just sense of appreciation.

A great deal depends on taking care of the utensils we use. We always wash, rinse well and wipe dry, our washer, wringer, tubs, boiler and kettles, and put them in their proper places. A wash-boiler should be cared for as carefully as a tureen—dried thoroughly by the stove, and then hung in its proper place, and used for no other purpose. I have seen women slop a cow out of the good boiler, and then let it lie about dirty until it was needed on washing-day—let it stand by the day with water or suds in it—use it to make dye in, to boil a ham, or a turkey, or a mess of pigs' feet, to pare apples in, to stand under the eaves, and, perhaps, freeze full of water.

Why, I'd just as lief use my best silk calash to feed a cow out of or to cook pigs' feet in as our good wash-boiler.

Brother Jones's son Diar has been out to "the Illinois," as his mother calls it, and while there he married the pretty daughter of a good old Baptist deacon. Diar came home during the holidays, and has been visiting about ever since. Our turn came, being we are Baptist folks, so they visited us, stayed two days and two nights. She is a dear little body, Diar's wife is, and we all liked her very much.

But Diar! it does beat all how little it takes to lift up some people; now, he taught school while he was gone, and since then he can't talk much else but "school, school." The deacon and the girls and I were so amused at him. We were looking at the sea-shells, and the specimens of gold and silver quartz that our brother brought home from Nevada, two years ago, and among other things was a curious little Indian hatchet, very rare, of which Ida said Dr. Henderson had a duplicate.

"Oh, hds he!" said Diar's wife, Theresa; and then, as soon as she thought none of us saw her, she leaned over and whispered: "Say, Diar, honey, tell me what 'duplicate' means."

He pursed out his fat, red mouth, plucked vigorously at the yellow beard that fringed it lavishly, and sticking his nose up at an acute angle, spoke aloud: "I should think you'd be ashamed fur to not know wat dupliout means; better go to the dictionary with your little questions," and he looked around and laughed, as though he had spoken a witty thing.

Not one of us even noticed him at all, the ugly, unkind fellow, to try to hold his bride up to ridicule! Lily saw the flush of shame mantling the cheek of the abashed young wife, and long before I could have said "Jack Robison," she had drawn Theresa's attention to a little button of solid gold that was all our brother got in payment for six months' hard work in California, because his employer broke up.

Theresa held it in her palm and looked at it, but there was a pitiful quiver about her mouth, and we could see that she was hurt, the poor dear! So, while Diar talked school and boasted how he had thrashed young men larger than himself, and how he had made the grown girls stand out on the floor for punishment, we just talked away to his wife and paid no attention to him. He sat and rocked back and forth, and stuck his feet up as high as his head, and clicked the blade of his knife, but he felt mean, I know.

One of Theresa's aunts is a laundress in a city of the West, and can starch and iron shirts to make them look the same as when they are bought.

A lady asked me once, by letter, how this was done, but I could not answer her.

I can tell her now. This is the way to make starch polish: Take of white wax one ounce, spermaceti two ounces, and a good pinch of salt. Mix and melt these together, and when cold it will be a hard, white cake that will not mould or sour in hot weather. Put a piece the size of a pea in the hot starch that is intended for every three or four shirts. When ironing, go over it a second time quickly, which increases the gloss or polish. Theresa's aunt uses a polishing-iron, one with a bulge at both ends—a kind that costs a dollar at the hardware store. She irons it well once, then dampens with a perfectly clean, soft, white, damp cloth, then rubs with the polishing-iron until it is so glossy she can almost see her face in it. The iron must not be very hot or it will scorch, if it is a little too cool the polish will be longer coming. There, ladies! now you have the secret that many of you have almost groaned for, lo! these many years I wrote it down just as the little girl-wife told me, standing up before me with one forefinger laid in her little white palm. And the first time Deacon Potts goes to the city, I shall send for a polishing-iron myself. Just because we live in little, out-of-the-way Pottsville, is no reason we should not have all the luxuries, and necessities, and comforts that our friends in the city have.

Theresa told us a good many new things. The girls were going to clean a large map while she was here, but she did it for them. First she rubbed it with fresh, moist bread-crumbs, and then varnished it with the following preparation: To twelve ounces of rectified spirits of turpentine she added six ounces of fir balsam, shook it well, and it was ready for use. It did not take more than one-half or one-third of this quantity for our large map of the State.

To recompense Theresa, I told her my certain, sure, positive preventive of bed-bugs. Diar will move into Father Jones's old house about the 20th of March—the very time you women-readers will receive this number—and I know that the old Jones's house is sticking full of these varminits. Well, it remains to be seen whether the young bride-Jones is an appreciative woman or not. When I meet her, one of the hot days of next summer, if she hugs me and says, "You dear old saint, Pipsey, you ought to stand on a pedestal," why, then, I'll know that she means, "that preventive is all you recommended it to be."

To one pint of spirits of turpentine add one ounce of corrosive sublimate, put in a bottle, shake well and apply with a feather to every joint or suspected place about your bedsteads. Of course, the bedsteads must be clean, well washed and wiped first. They will not need more than two or three applications. Apply to all the cracks in the plastering or walls; do this thoroughly. Mark your bottle "poison," and keep it in a safe place. If you dislike the odor of spirits of turpentine, a substitute can be found in alcohol. I regard this as one of the blessings for which a housekeeper should be thankful, for there is no pest so annoying or so much to be abhorred as the loathsome vermin that, without our most vigilant efforts, will infest our sleeping rooms. They will make the lines and wrinkles of care come in a poor woman's face the quickest of anything. March is the month in which they hatch, so bestir yourselves, ye tidy housekeepers.

I told this preventive to Sister Muffet two or three times, because I have passed her house more than one hot summer morning, and have seen her out with her skirts tucked up and a towel pinned on her head, gyrating around her old bedsteads, swashing them with boiling hot soapsuds, but she is proud and says: "I do 'no' certin as we have 'em, I thought I felt suffin nip my neck in the night, but it might 'a' been my cap-string; howsumever, for all o' that, I thought I better be on the safe side; hee! hee!"

Now, Sister Muffet knows that they're buggy, and she needn't be ashamed to own up, for we're all subject to the ills of this mundane sphere. La! I would no more take off my calash and hang it on her bed-post, than I'd hang it on the poolpit in Pottsville meeting-house during service; and if she had a mite of foreknowledge, she could guess why I never take it off at her house. No more would I hang my reticule on her bed-post, either, for I am so afraid of this mortal enemy.

The Muffet girls are always making flounces, and bias bands, and headings, and flutings; and they tumble over each other when the fashion magazine comes, in their haste to see what are the latest styles. Oh, they do talk so much about "the style," I get so weary of the ceaseless ting-a-ling, ting-a-ling of their soft, even, monotonous voices—voices that never rise or fall, or have any melody in them, unless it be a piping, pitched shriek of: "Oh, how sweet! What a dear, sweet style! Patience alive! could any style be invented that would be any sweeter or dearer!"

I never saw Prudy Muffet—she's the oldest girl, the main stand-by in the Muffet family—never saw her animated and enthusiastic but once. It was at a mite party at Sister Bodkin's, one time when we were trying to raise money to pay for the music-stool that goes with the church organ. I was sitting alongside of Deacon Skiles then—it was when me and the deacon were entertaining a kind of warm, fair-to-middling attachment for each other. I was sitting beside him, and we were playing tit-tat-too; and just as both of my hands were up, and I was looking romantic, I heard Prudy say in an excited voice: "For the land sake! Yes, I think it will be beautiful! It will be just in style, too."

I looked around, and there was Prue on her knees before Becky Van Doodle, holding both of Beck's hands, and telling her how to have her new green poplin dress made.

Said she: "Let me tell you now just how to have it made. I would have seven ruffles round the bottom, and then a narrow heading made somehow this way," and she gathered up a corner of her limp overskirt, and folded, and fixed, and twisted it into something that in her estimation was something. That she called style. "Then I would have seven more ruffles, narrower than the first; and then I would have a French fluted melange a-top o' that, and I would have a sash to match of checkered green and blue ribbon, tied in a kind of a loop to hang so;" and she rose and twisted herself about; and me and the deacon we both got to laughing, but we turned it off as quick as we could, and pretended we were laughing at the silliness of an old pair like ourselves playing tit-tat-too with all the zest of children.

Now I don't want to talk about my neighbors, but that is just a specimen of the way those buggy Muffets behave.

It will soon be time to put away our last winter's woollen garments, furs, etc. But do not be in a hurry about laying aside the woollen clothing; stick to it as long as the weather is unsettled, and cold spells come upon us suddenly. We Pottses have learned how to take care of ourselves in a way that we escape colds almost entirely. We dress warm, and never change our clothing from heavy to light except when we rise in the morning. Any important change can be made then without incurring danger; but no other time is entirely safe.

The greatest risk one incurs is to sit in a draft of air; or to sit down and chat awhile with one's passing neighbor out on the fence, or by the steps of the portico; or to sit by a window where even a tiny rill of cool air strikes directly upon one. That is a sure way of taking cold, and the first symptom is a chilly sensation creeping down the back.

When you are ready to put away furs and woollens, and want to guard against the depredations of moths, pack them securely in paper flour-sacks, and tie them up well. This is better than camphor, or tobacco, or snuff scattered among them in trunks and drawers. If you want to put away blankets or shawls, or large articles, shake them well and pack them snugly in a sound, new sheet sewed up like a sack. Moths will not attack things that are properly and carefully secured out of the reach of flies, millers and insects. Before putting your muffs away for summer, twirl them by the cords at the ends, so that every hair will straighten. Paste a strip of paper where the lid fits on.

One of my neighbors—a good sort of a woman she is, too—says: "If I could only take times easy, like Pizziway Potts does, I wouldn't be this broken-down old hack that I am. There she will set and spend a whole evenin' a readin', and laughin', and enjoyin' herself, while I may set and patch and work till late bed-time, and git no thanks for it."

"Bah!" is all I say. I know well enough that a woman can find some easy, resting-spells within two days' time, anyhow, if she is determined to do it. I always did, and my days and months and years used to be packed full of work, heaped up; but I did find some glorious, green, shady, resting-places. When I did all the work myself, surrounded by every known disadvantage, I could care for a family of seven, and find time to read after they were all a-bed. I would sit close before the wood-fire in the wide old fire-place, with my shawl on, and the tallow candle on a stand beside me, and read, thankful and grateful for the privilege which I so much enjoyed and appreciated. I thought I was blessed of all women. Oh, I read with such an unctuous sense of enjoyment! Often I would draw my woollen shawl closer about my shoulders, or tuck my red outside hand under its folds and say: "How delectable! Oh, this is so pleasant!"

This morning, when I heard what my neighbor had so enviously spoken, I said: "It is her own fault if she makes life burdensome, and drudgery of its most sacred obligations, for everything is so good if we will let it be thus."

Ida said: "Just for the gratification of such women, you ought to tell precisely what one day brings forth, take it just as it comes, and put it down in writing, then they would see that one woman's daily life and daily duties is only a duplicate of all others. Put it right in with what you are writing."

I will. When I rose yesterday morning, the deacon had gone out to milk. The teakettle was boiling, and the kitchen was warm, but right under the stove he had left a stick of green wood, and the smell of it filled the room to suffocation. Now you headachy women know what that means. Before I hooked my dress I carried out the offending billet, whose sap was oozing out of it. Then I opened the doors and windows. That was the best I could do under the circumstances. It is of no use to tell that deacon that the smell of strong wood under the stove is offensive. If I did, he would say: "Now I do like the smell of it; it is most delicious; it carries me back to my boyhood, and to the days when we were clearing the very ground on which this house stands." Good for the deacon.

Ida had seen the melodeon all taken apart, and had helped to put it together again, the day and evening before, and I knew by the way she tossed in bed that she was dreaming of the intricate workmanship of melodeons all night, so I let the girls sleep later than usual yesterday morning. While father sipped his coffee and ate his toast and spare-rib at breakfast, I hurried and started a good fire in the sitting-room. Then I drank my tea; and while the girls were eating, looked over my manuscript, combed my hair, fixed my collar, and made preparation to write all day. I wanted to write a Christmas story for the Farmer, called "Mamma's Uncle Peter."

While I was sitting looking out of the window, with my thoughts all on the plan of my child-story, one of the girls came in and said: "I wonder what father is going to do to-day? I see he is whetting the butcher-knife."

"He musn't go off anywhere without telling us," said I, hurrying out to the porch and making inquiry.

"W'y I am going to help kill hogs at Cousin Sally's," said he.

"Why, deacon," said I, "you should have told me, and let me have given you other trousers. You see these are your second-best, and you will get them bloody and dirty, and you won't be fit to sit down in the house. You know what a time I had coaxing you to take off the other ones that you wore when you butchered last week."

I saw the snarl beginning to come at the corners of his mouth, poor old man! His boots came off hard, and it was asking too much of him to change his pantaloons, so I soothingly said: "Your other ones have not been washed yet, but I'll look up something, and you can change after you come home. You know you don't want to be offensive in the evening when we all sit down to read together."

"Very well," he said; "but then I wish folks were not quite so nice;" and his nose began to turn up with a world-weary crook.

But I smoothed matters over by saying: "Take off your best coat, then, and put on this old one, and don't forget your good, sharp knife, for maybe knives will be scarce."

Then I went back to my writing, and was getting the plot laid, and recalling all the nice things I could think of about "Mamma's Uncle Peter," when Ida came softly and said: "If you'd do it, I would like to have you move to the little dining-room to-day to write, for while this melodeon is out I would like to fix things all in good order here in the sitting-room. The book-case has not been moved for so long, and maybe the mouse that had carried watermelon seeds into the melodeon is under it now. There is no other hiding-place, only that space under the book-case; and, Pipsey, when I am clear ready to look for the mouse, won't you take the place of danger?"

"Yes, I'll do it," said I, gathering up my papers and going to the dining-room.

Then, while Ida was rattling around in there, moving lounge, and plant-stand, and chairs, I tried to get my thoughts all centered on "Mamma's Uncle Peter," and had partially succeeded, when Lily came in from the post-office. An editor had written me a week ago asking permission to fix up into new shape an article that I had written for him years ago, and use it in his new paper as an original contribution. I wrote back, granting permission, and saying that, in all I had written for him through a course of years, he had never in all that time commended anything from my pen, and if he would have done so it might have encouraged me in my poor, unpraised efforts. His reply was so funny, that all plans of introducing "Mamma's Uncle Peter" to the public were gone in an instant, like a puff of thistle-down on the wings of the wind.

He said: "If I never did praise you to your face, I said mighty fine things about you to others."

That funny, fulsome flattery! It was so amusing that we all laughed heartily. Now, wasn't that funny?

So, while Lily was ripping her red empress cloth dress, I drew my chair up to a corner, and began thinking about "Mamma's Uncle Peter." In less than six minutes I heard a muffled rap at the kitchen door, and a stuffy voice mumbling something.

Lily said: "Tell it over, I do not understand." And the mumbling was heard again.

She called me in her dilemma, and I could distinctly hear the words: "If you please, I am hungry."

It was an old, doubled-up tramp, in a brand-new army-blue overcoat, carrying a bundle.

"Let me wait on him," said I, "and you go on with your work."

I gave him some bread and pigs' feet in a folded paper, and some apples. He stepped up to a table, opened the paper and examined its contents, and called for some hot coffee. I told him there was none made. He then put the pigs' feet in his pocket, the bread in his bosom, and left the apples lying on the table. He hobbled off slowly. I saw him pass this morning, running at the rate of twenty miles an hour, with the tails of his army-blue sailing behind like azure banners.

After he was gone, yesterday, I crept back to the dining-room and had been communing on the Uncle Peter subject fully twenty minutes when I heard a little, tinkling voice asking to see me.

The girls inquired if it was anything that they could do as well as me, but the little, bell-like voice tinkled "Oh, no!"

I went out and saw my old-time neighbor, Mrs. Jarvis. I stood, so she would take a hint to make brief her call. Her man, she said, had made her come over to see if Deacon Potts could sell any of his sassage, that he allus liked the deacon's sassage and that with a mess o' the deacon's sassage for breakfast he could do more work in one day than he could in two if he didn't have o' the deacon's sassage to eat. Somehow, it was strengthnin' like, the deacon's sassage was, not so peppery or salty as other folks' sassage, an' if he couldn't git any o' the deacon's, did I know who made the next best to the deacon's.

I told her we only kept one jar full and that was in sweet pickle, but if she would carry it home to her man I would send him a mess of it. How the little woman did talk! what news she did tell! Job Risley's boy had a white swelling; Sam Starkey had been suspicioned of forgery; the Wallace girls were teaching and trying to pay off their dead father's debts; Jack Simpson had run away with a married woman, in the Illinoi; Parson Rigby's daughter had the school in Possum Holler; Kate Thompson had married the porter at the Miller House; the heirs of Daddy Boutwell's estate were quarrelling like cats and dogs; and pretty Lu Davidson, report said, was no better than she ort to be. Oh, I could almost hear the spirit of "Mamma's Uncle Peter" kicking up his heels back in the corner of the dining-room, and I hustled about uneasily enough. I leaned on the window-frame, and played with the knob on the stair door, and looked out of the window, and at last the little creature went away. I sent one of the girls out to hold old sorrel while the good woman mounted. Then I hurried back and had just planned my story when father came home. He was dirty from head to foot—if I had not seen him I would have thought a wet dog was out in the kitchen. I hailed to him where he would find his clean clothes while I sighed at the thought of my poor little girls washing two pairs of heavy cloth pantaloons that had been needlessly soiled on butchering days. Had I known in time, he could have worn old cotton ones outside of shabby cloth and saved all this work. It made me feel sad, for women need to husband all their strength.

While father was out at the back porch kitchen, putting on other trousers, Ida called me to come and help hunt the mouse. She stood on a chair in as small a compass as possible, while I tucked myself all up compactly, until I looked like a big fried cruller. I tipped the book-case forward with a good many misgivings, and she peeped in under. Not a sign of a mouse was visible. While we were making comments and she was assuring me that she did actually hear a mouse nibble one time in that corner, I thought I felt a queer sensation just under the belt of my dress but I soon thought no more of it. Pretty soon I felt it again; it moved; it crawled; it hustled among the gathers in my skirts; and with a piercing scream I flung up my arms and yelled out: "A mouse! a mouse!" and ran to climb up on the chair Ida had just vacated.

She screamed, and ran for the same chair, and we both stood on it and held to each other and cried: "A mouse! a mouse!" I shook my clothes, and leaped, and writhed, and called for the deacon. He rushed in, half-dressed, and pale with fright, and found me out on the portico waltzing like a polar bear. "A mouse! a mouse!" was all I could articulate.

"You unconverted creetur!" said he. "What do you mean? I wouldn't make that much fuss if Satan would get hold of me, and all the bulls of Bashan;" and he took me by the arm and shook me like a sack.

I was so exhausted, I just stood and whimpered like a calfy school-boy. If there had been a mouse hidden about my clothes, it could not be found then. I took my own part, and told the deacon he need not boast of his coolness, that I remembered distinctly of seeing him perform once in the harvest-field when he thought a little green snake had run up the leg of his trousers. I never heard such yells or saw such gyrations in my life.

After I rested and got over my fright, we had dinner; then I stole off and took up "Mamma's Uncle Peter." In about half an hour I heard a full, pompous voice asking if this was where Deacon Potts resided. I went out and entertained a young Baptist minister until father had taken his noonday nap. I could not write much while he stayed, for I could hear every word they said. The Peter story is all mixed up with missions, and societies, and statistics, and it does not please me at all.

Then Lily had the headache, and I sat in the rocking-chair and held her an hour or two. Then I set the yeast for to-day's baking, and I have just taken six loaves out of the oven. I can bake and write very well at the same time.

Last night after supper I patched a pair of pantaloons for the deacon—three patches—fixed things handy for breakfast, and then took "my largesse of delight" in reading the last number of Appleton's Journal.

This was the record of one day, with many of its annoyances left out; and yet I find such busy days brimful of enjoyment. "And so the days round to fulness."

HOW TO MAKE HOME PLEASANT.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

THE love of beauty is instinctive in most natures. In those where this love seems to be lacking, I am convinced that this instinct has been suppressed in its development rather than that it has had no existence. There are doubtless exceptions to this rule, but the rule may be considered as general none the less.

The most desirable thing in a family is that home should be the most attractive spot on earth—that the members, having been away for a longer or shorter period, should one and all say from the very depths of their hearts, "there is no place like home." One of the material aids in producing this happy result is to make home beautiful. Fortunately, beauty is one of the cheapest things on earth, if people would only think so. It can be obtained almost literally without money and without price. Rich upholstery, velvet carpets, magnificent mirrors, costly pictures, rare china, are not essential in producing beautiful effects. A room may be wondrously pleasing with all these when they are arranged with a tasteful and artistic hand. But some of the ugliest apartments I have ever known contained them also. Simple elements are much easier to deal with, and far more satisfactory in their results, as a general thing. Besides, these rare and costly surroundings have little really home-like in their character. One never feels quite at their ease amidst them, and a little child—the very heart and core of the family—is entirely out of place.

In arranging the real, true home, give us home-like, inexpensive furniture made for use, and which, if defaced past remedy, can be easily replaced. Then children can come and go in perfect freedom, without the necessity of constant caution.

"What are you doing now?" asked an intimate friend of a lady once, expecting to hear some report of her literary work.

"Trying to get rag carpeting enough for my whole house," was the reply. "What are you doing?"

"Trying to get all the rag carpeting out of ours," was the rejoinder.

And these were the relative circumstances of the two friends. The lady first addressed had a household of young children, to whom, on principle, she allowed free range of her premises from parlor to attic. No room was too good for daily and constant use, so what more sensible than the plain, serviceable, inexpensive, easily swept and not unpleasant rag carpet, over which they might run at will without fear of doing damage. Besides, in so large a family, there was a constant accumulation of clothes, utterly past wear, which if not utilized in carpeting were wholly wasted. Carpet-making, properly and economically conducted both as regards time and money, proved far cheaper than the cheapest ingrain.

On the other hand, her friend was one of a family of grown-up daughters. They had all passed the era which made rag carpeting desirable to the prudent housewife and mother, and were not only ambitious for something nicer, but perfectly capable of giving it proper care and attention when it should be obtained. So they were quite as justified in trying to get all the rag carpeting out of their house as was the young mother in trying to get it in.

I do not insist that rag carpets are the only proper ones in a family of children. But they have an old-fashioned, homely look that I like, and I do not think any housewife and mother need regret it if she finds herself pecuniarily unable to procure anything better. Rag carpeting, ingrain or brussels, it matters little what the material shall be, so that the colors in that and other articles of the room shall be in harmony.

Large figures in a carpet are only suitable for hotel parlors, or for saloons of more than ordinary size. The prettiest, most tasteful pattern is that which is small and of few colors. A red and black or green and black, in small geometrical figures, is always pleasing, and serves as an excellent groundwork for the furniture. Green and oak are pretty, only the latter color will not always bear the test of light. When the room is tolerably large, green and red in figures of moderate size is not inappropriate. This style of carpet possesses one advantage in that these two contrasting colors will look well to the last, as they each heighten the effect of the other. Even if they fade somewhat, the fading will not be so perceptible in consequence.

But of more importance than the carpeting even is the wall-paper. There are few people who are capable of selecting wall-paper properly, until they have had a certain amount of experience. There is one mistake amateurs in paper buying invariably make—that of getting paper too dark. It must be remembered that paper always looks darker upon the wall than in the piece.

There are several general rules which may be laid down in the selection of paper, some of which would never occur to the ordinary buyer.

First of all, if one desires a light, cheerful room, the wall-paper should be light. For a kitchen, an oak color is very appropriate as it is pleasing, and will not easily become soiled by the necessary wear of kitchen work. With this style of paper, the woodwork will look well painted and grained in oak. But this color is only allowable where there is ample light. Neither a kitchen nor any other room which is partially shaded should have a paper approximating in any degree to a buff or cream color. Yellow, although it seems to be light itself, for some unaccountable reason, produces a depressing effect on the nerves, and is very trying to the eyesight, except where there is an abundance of light to bring out its full brilliancy. A room which has few windows, or which is shaded by trees or porch, should have a paper of a light, cool tint, pearl, gray or greenish—not a positive green, however. My latest, and as I consider my most successful experiments in paper-hanging, was in a kitchen which labored under the disadvantages of partial shade. I had had a paper of a very light pearl color, but it proved too light and too easily soiled for the place. So I set out to the paper store with the difficult task before me of selecting a paper which should possess the contrary characteristics of lightness and cheerfulness, and not show dirt. And I succeeded beyond my utmost hopes. The paper I selected was what was generally known as hall-paper, and probably no one else would have dared to put it so out of its place as in a kitchen. But I always did hate conventionality, and as the paper seemed to suit my purpose, I did not care for what it was intended. On one side of the paper was a dark grayish green marble column with beveled edges, while the balance of the paper was of a light pearl tint, marbled with darker pearl, white, grayish green and reddish brown. I feared, before hanging it, that it might prove too dark, but it lighted up on the wall. The side column cut off made a beautiful and appropriate border at the top, forming perfect panels of the marbled ground work. It is a paper almost impossible to deface, as every spot upon it assumes the appearance of the marbled figures.

Never, in buying wall-paper, select a pattern with any positive color in it, except it be in a stripe or column, when reds, greens or blues are allowable. A paper with a gay bouquet of flowers will look brilliant in the piece, perhaps, but once upon the walls it will be glaring and tasteless, a constant weariness to the eye. The ground work of any and all paper should approximate nearly to white, and the tints of the pattern should be of a delicate pearl, cream or gray. A light wood color sometimes does not look badly, if it is not too strong in tone, and there is not too much of it.

In selecting paper it must be taken into consideration whether or no it is to serve as a background for pictures. If it is not, then it will bear to be a little darker, and slightly more prominent in figure. But if pictures are to hang upon it, then it can scarcely be too negative in character. The border should match the carpet in color, and here let me protest against either of these being blue. The carpet should give a look of warmth to the room, and blue is the coldest of colors. Only in summer is such a tint allowable. As a carpet is exceedingly vulgar with a multiplicity of colors, so let the bordering of the wall-paper have as few as possible.

Pictures ought to be considered as indispensable in furnishing a room. There is now positively no excuse for being without them, or even for being without good ones. The price of a good oil painting may be beyond the means of many, but there are plenty of chromos attainable which almost equal them in effect, and are so excellent that even those possessed of the most artistic tastes need feel no shame in using them in the adornment of their walls. Cheaper even than these are excellent steel engravings of various sizes and prices, a few of which even the poorest can obtain by a little effort. A more important consideration, in a money point of view, than the pictures, are their frames, as they are really more expensive. As I have had questions frequently asked me concerning the framing of pictures, I will give some general rules regarding them. An oil painting or chromo should have a gilt frame in order to bring out the colors in their full brilliancy. If a gilt frame is really too expensive, then a dark frame with a broad gilt band next the picture will do very well. These pictures should have the frame fitted to them leaving no white margin, nor should they have any glass over them. An engraving, on the contrary, looks best in a walnut or dark frame, and all the gilt allowable is, perhaps, a very narrow band next the picture. Engravings should be so framed as to leave a broad and uniform margin of white all around them. Remember, in framing them, the letters of the name do not count as part of the picture, but are included in the white margin; and there should be the same width and no more between the bottom of the picture and the frame that there is at the sides and top.

But there are other and less expensive ways of framing pictures, especially small ones, than sending them to the frame-makers. Those who are familiar with the details of leather-work already know how to make really beautiful frames, which rival the most intricate carvings, but which, like them, are difficult to keep free from dust. Then there are rice, coffee, beans, barley, acorns, pinecones and other articles, which can be glued on a flat surface in pretty patterns, stained and varnished, and make beautiful surroundings for photographs and small engravings. One of the prettiest little frames I ever saw was made of old hoop-skirt springs and raisin stems tied together, and dipped in melted beeswax colored red with a little powdered vermillion.

There is hanging before me now a very pretty frame made by tacking different kinds of lichen on a flat surface. Another one is made of the dried seed stalks of various kinds of grasses and weeds glued on a plain flat frame. These frames are quickly and easily made, and are especially suitable for light, water-color pictures. Frames to imitate black walnut can be made of different shades of brown glazed and coarse black thread. Others can be made of straws tacked together, which straws can be obtained at the stores either plain or in fancy colors, or can be found in any farmer's barn.

Passe partout frames are made by binding glass, having a picture back of it, with black paper or cloth pasted around the edge. This style is suited for the smallest photographs up to engravings of quite a large size, and they show well upon a plain, light wall.

With all these contrivances for framing, the expense of frames is no excuse for the absence of pictures.

Next in importance to pictures in the ornamentation of a room are brackets for statuettes, vases or miscellaneous fancy articles. There are pretty and inexpensive ones of plastic, parian and black walnut. But they can be made even cheaper than these. As pretty ones as I ever saw were a kind of small hanging what-nots, suspended in the corners of a room, and made of pasteboard and wall-paper. They were made of two or three graduated shelves, the lower one perhaps fifteen inches in diameter, and rounding in shape, and the upper one not more than one-third the width. They were made of stiff pasteboard sewed together in the desired shape, the shelves stayed underneath to keep from warping by strips of wood, through the ends of which holes were bored, and the cord which suspended the whole passed through. They were covered, one with a bright crimson, the other with a bright green, mottled satin wall-paper—waste scraps begged from a country store; and from each shelf depended lambrequins made also from scraps of rich gilt and green or crimson bordering paper obtained from the same source. The cords and tassels with which they were suspended were the only items of expense about them, while by their brilliant colors they lightened up the room wonderfully.

Books are even more important than pictures. A house without books is like a body without a soul. It is to its inmates like a dreary desert without an outlook. Books and periodicals should be considered in every family as next in importance to food, to be obtained before clothing even. A home in which the taste for good reading is cultivated and gratified, has placed around it one of the strongest safeguards to its inmates. There is so much less inducement to leave such a house for the dangers and evils of the outside world, if there are always at hand the means for amusement and mental occupation. Such homes always send out into the world the most intelligent and useful men and women.

But there are books and books. And parents cannot be too guarded in what they place in the hands of their children. In this age of the multiplicity of excellent reading for both young and old, there is really no excuse for buying books of doubtful character, and newspapers and magazines which foster only a love of sensational literature—a kind of literature which excites the imagination, inflames the passions and warps the judgment. Good reading costs no more than bad, and if parents have not sufficient knowledge themselves of current literature to make a judicious choice, there is always some one at hand capable and willing to assist them in their selections.

But while avoiding books of doubtful or positively evil tendencies, do not commit the equally great error of going to the other extreme. Children will not read books of a serious moral and religious character. It is useless to buy them for their reading. If lively stories, interesting histories and entertaining travels are not furnished them, they will provide themselves with books of a worse character to read. It is useless and unwise to cry out against the evils of fictitious literature. Novels are among the greatest of modern educators, and if the right sort are chosen, they are productive of good rather than evil. The taste for more solid reading comes only with maturer years.

Every child loves pictures; even older people can spend pleasant and profitable hours in their contemplation. I have already spoken of pictures upon the wall; but there is another means by which with their aid the home can be made attractive. Let every picture which falls in the way of the family which seems worth preserving, and which would otherwise be lost or destroyed, be carefully cut from the book or newspaper, and laid aside in some convenient place appropriated for this especial purpose. At first, no doubt there will be many cut out wholly worthless, in an artistic point of view; but practice, as it cultivates the taste, will finally teach discrimination, and the collection can be winnowed from time to time, until those that remain shall all be good. When there is a sufficient number to justify a beginning, these pictures can be put neatly and carefully in a scrap-book made of sheets of either white or brown paper folded, each sheet stitched separately, and the whole fastened together by four holes being punched through them, shoestrings run through the holes and tied at the back. Any member of the family an adept in the use of pasteboard, paper, paste and scissors, can make a neat and tasteful cover. Such books as these are continual sources of delight, not only to the children of a family, but to casual visitors, and are really evidences of taste and refinement.

One who has never tried to make such a collection can form no idea of the rapidity with which pictures will accumulate. A dozen years since I began such a collection, thinking that perhaps in the course of years I might have enough to fill a scrap-book. During the past winter, finding closets, bookcases and drawers overflowing with portfolios and rolls of pictures, I sat down to their systematic arrangement. It was a work of time, for they amounted literally to thousands. The scrap-books, when completed, were seven in number, some of them ranging as high as four hundred pages. I have two books of art pictures, one of them of a very large size; two large geographical scrap-books, in which are scenes in almost every country on the globe; one architectural book, containing views of notable or handsome buildings in all portions of the world; one book of natural history, containing a perfect menagerie of birds, beasts and fishes; and the seventh, and last, views of works of art, beautiful vases, statues, monuments, unique furniture, etc.

These volumes, the separate items of which were gathered with little loss of time, and often at little or no cost, whenever opportunity offered, I count among my most valuable possessions. Such volumes not only furnish many hours of amusement to visitors when I am too busy with household affairs to entertain them, but are invaluable aids in the education of children. They form the nucleus of an encyclopædia on a magnificent scale, for I have not only preserved pictures, but the reading descriptive of them as far as possible. Whatever the people or country under discussion, there is always sure to be at hand one or more pictures and descriptions illustrating the very point. These pictures, when I have completed their indexing, will always be found without difficulty.

I have given this somewhat lengthy description, because what I have done is no more than any one can do with a like pains, and with the prospect of as satisfactory results. Perhaps it hardly belongs to the subject of house furnishing, but is of importance in considering how to make home attractive.

Furniture should next be considered. Each one, of course, has special tastes. Whatever the choice may be, try to avoid producing the effect that the house has been furnished by order by the upholsterer. If all your neighbors have one certain style of furniture, try to assert your individuality by obtaining something more or less different. Others may do as they please, but while I would try to have none of my furniture incongruous in either form or color, I would never be persuaded into buying sets of anything. They are monotonous. I would rather put up with a little discord than such uniform, insipid harmony. Whatever else is bought, let there be plenty of easy-chairs. They are the only chairs made which are really for use. The others are merely to fill up a room and to look at, or possibly to sit an unwelcome visitor upon, that his or her stay may be short.

No room is furnished without a sofa or lounge of some sort. No matter if it is plain and home-made, so that it is comfortable. It is a place for the tired housekeeper to rest herself for a moment in the midst of her duties. It is a place for the weary husband, returned from his day's labors, to get a few moments' relaxation while waiting for the dinner or tea bell. It is, most important of all, a place where an ailing child can lie without being banished to the solitude of the sick chamber, and where the mother can attend to it, and at the same time keep an eye upon other duties. Such a piece of furniture should be for use and not for show. So it should have no costly and delicate carvings, easily broken and defaced, and catch-alls for dust. It should have no silken or velvet cover, upon which one is afraid to lie for fear of soiling it. Still less should it be of that uncomfortable, cold, stiff, rough hair-cloth, which always gives an apartment an air of funeral gloom, and upon which no one can lie without feeling that he is doing penance for remembered or forgotten sins.

I have seen it frequently recommended to oil and varnish the woodwork of the interior of a house instead of painting it. This should always be done where the woodwork is of walnut, oak, chestnut or maple or any hard, handsomely-grained wood. Even pine shows a very pretty grain when oiled and time has darkened it a little. But don't let any one imagine they can do this themselves, unless they are possessed of rare powers of strength and patience. We fancied we should like our new house oiled instead of painted. So, with infinite trouble, we tinted putty to match the color of the wood with which to fill the nail-holes. Then began the task of sand-papering, for the wood must present a smooth surface, if one would be satisfied with results. The labor of half an hour or more resulted in the polishing of the framework of a single door, and a lame wrist. But the carpenters had done their work with anything but clean hands, and there were fingerprints all over the woodwork which no washing or sand-papering could remove, and the oil served to bring them out only the stronger. Others may be more fortunate in their amateur efforts, or they may be able to engage the services of a professional who will understand how best to overcome all difficulties.

Most people prefer white for the woodwork of their houses, and it is superior to any dark color, unless that color be in imitation of some special wood.

For halls and dining-rooms, painting and graining in imitation of oak is very appropriate. With this color the paper is best a light pearl tint.

A pretty effect is produced by painting the main body of the woodwork a pearly tint, the mouldings of doors and windows a shade or two darker of the same tint, and the panels of the doors either a very light pearl, or a brilliant yellowish white. Those who do their own painting—and almost any one can do it with a little practice—can produce the pearl tints by putting in small portions of vermilion, permanent blue and yellow ochre in white paint. The white is bought by the pound or can, at any druggist's or paint store; the colors must be obtained in tubes at an artists' material store, or possibly at a druggist's, if there is no store of the former character in the place. But very little is put in at once, and the paint is occasionally tested, until the desired tint is obtained. The great danger is in getting it too dark, as it looks much darker when applied to the wood than in the pot. It even looks much darker when the wood is completely covered than it does when only partially so. The paper appropriate for a room painted in this style would be a pearl tint of a very light shade, matching, perhaps, that of the door panels, supposing them to be painted in pearl.

The painting of the outside of a house can scarcely be considered part of a housekeeper's care, still, as an equal partner in the matrimonial firm, and as the one, after all, most interested in the appearance of the house, the mistress of the house should have a vote in the matter. Besides, its external appearance has much to do with the general attractiveness of home.

White is the most common color for painting houses, and generally preferred. Still, white is in exceedingly bad taste, unless the house be well embowered in trees, so that it cannot become a staring feature in the landscape.

The eminent English painter, Sir Joshua Reynolds, was once consulted by a landed proprietor who had just built himself a new residence, concerning the color he ought to paint it. Sir Joshua stooped to the ground, and taking up a handful of earth, showed it to his questioner, and told him to paint it the same color as that. Singular as this rule may seem, it is an excellent one. The house should be painted as nearly as possible the color of the rocks or ground which surround it. The regular lines of the building breaking in upon the irregular ones of the ground, will cause it to stand out with sufficient distinctness.

To produce the most pleasing effects, the trimmings of a house should be darker in color than the main body of the house. Thus if the house be a light yellowish tint (I do not mean a cream or a canary, but a yellow approximating more to oak), a much darker shade of the same tint, or a warm brown will look the best. The shutters should be of a still darker shade; or if the proper shades of buff and brown are used, green will look well with them. A light pearly gray, with trimmings a few shades darker, is exceedingly pleasing. But there is little use in suggesting different colors, for it is so hard to describe the exact tints. The best way for any one who has newly built a house, before he settles as a matter of course on the apparently inevitable white, to make little excursions in different directions around the country, and he will be astonished to see the different styles and colors used in painting houses; and though some of them are undoubtedly horrid, there will be sure to be some one style that will meet the approval of the excursionist, and which he will prefer instead of the white.

While the trimmings are always prettier to be darker than the main body of the house, there should not be too great a contrast. For instance, there is nothing so ugly as a house painted white, with dark-brown window and door casings and cornices. It is only excelled in ugliness by the brown or gray house with white trimmings.

While house-painting is still under consideration, let me remark that it has often struck me with wonder that kitchen floors are not more frequently painted. It adds so much to their looks, and is such a saving in labor to the housewife. If the floors of porches were also painted, it would be a great advantage, as it would prevent the boards from rotting under the action of the weather.

Mother's Department.

BABIES AND THEIR BELONGINGS.

THE following excellent article is from the New York Metropolitan. Every mother should read it carefully.

The discipline of the child and the time when the baby takes its out-of-door exercise are very generally made the convenience of the nurse. The young mother forgets how important it is to serve baby in this matter, instead of obliging the attendant, and she, never having been told that one hour in the morning, or at least before the sun begins to decline, is worth three in the afternoon, does not know it is worth while to have any mind or care about it.

The baby is usually an early riser, if it has its own way. It receives its bath and takes its breakfast, and then it is weary and sleepy, and requires a comfortable rest. By the time it wakens the air is dry, and if there is any shade, even the hottest day is at its best by nine or ten o'clock. When a child can be made comfortable in the sunshine, it should remain in it as long as possible. The sun-brown painted on its cheeks and hands may be distasteful to the mother's eyes, but tenderness and intelligence discover health through these tawny tints that have fallen from the sunbeams. As perfect health is the most beautiful of all things which we can look upon, we must conclude that the lack of healthy color is a defect in any human being.

Health belongs to all infants by a divine right, and whoever defrauds them of this by reason of unnecessary ignorance is guilty of a wrong for which an after-life of care is insufficient compensation. Sickness is a rare visitor in the nursery where children are intelligently treated, and the first business of the mother is their physical development. It is inconsistent to prepare an elaborate and costly wardrobe for the coming child, and thus waste the vitality that should be conferred upon baby, or expend an excess of money upon the child's laces and embroidery, and then economize by furnishing it with an inferior nurse. So also it is not wise or discreet to keep baby at home during the early morning hours, depriving it of the life-giving sunshine, so that it may be finely dressed in the afternoon, and be exhibited in the park or on the streets for a spectacle to the fashionable crowd, who promenade about four o'clock.

If the babe can go out in the afternoon also—not too late—so much the better, but there are few families so situated that the infant's clothing can be kept in order by a second attendant upon such a mite of humanity. Nurse likes to do this part of her work early in the day, and very naturally; but as the guarantee of future vigor and present comfort is better assured by inconveniencing the child's servant, we beg the young mother to be firm, and insist upon this arrangement.

A French writer says: "It is better to care for a man's health than for his disease;" and the same may be said about the baby. It is not necessary to enter upon the philosophical reasons for the morning walk, because all nature explains this. Of course all sunlight is beneficial, and an Italian proverb justly asserts that "where the sun does not enter, the doctor does." All excitable children are unpleasantly affected by the crowds which surround them in an afternoon walk in the city, and the refreshment of a night's repose is the better assured if the latter part of the day has had no disturbing sights or sounds.

If the mother performs all the little attentions that her offspring requires, she may not be able to do just as she pleases with her times and seasons, and for such mothers we have a word of advice.

So select the apartment in which the child must spend its time, that the sun shall enter it with its best beams. A south room, with no curtains in winter, is the place of all others in which disease finds no welcome, and where a vigorous growth of all nature is sure to be found. Place a soft rug on a cushion upon the floor, tumble the baby upon it with its hands and legs free, and its face upward, and its eyes turned away from the light. Its delight in living will soon express itself in the strong thrusts of its chubby fists and in vigorous kicks with its dimpled feet, while its attempts at vocal manifestations of bliss will become eloquent and musical.

The habit of guarding baby from sunlight is a very pernicious one. Of course its tender eyes must be shaded, but this can be done by the way in which it is held, and no veil is ever required to keep out warmth—indeed veils are a torment and a secret enemy to all eyes, and except in keen, windy weather they are injurious vanities that may well be carefully avoided.

Yes, if the mother is careful of all the early habits of the child, a firmer foundation is fixed for its future health, and the easier it will be to guide its after conduct. Physicians say that they have two kinds of children to deal with in cases of acute disease. One has been trained by intelligent discipline, and submits, with mild protests, to medical treatment. The other is violent and ungovernable, and jeopardizes its life by its disobedience and its nervous excitement. So there are two sorts of mothers. One loves well but wisely, and lives for the child's highest good, while the other one imagines that she is tender, when she is only weakly, giving a weapon of self-destruction into the ignorant hands of her undisciplined darling. She believes herself to be amiable when she thwarts no wish of the hireling to whom she commits the child's future, by weakly yielding to her all the sacred duties of the parent. Maternity ennobles every necessary attention paid to a little human being, and all brave, good women will lift the lowest duty of nurse up into a close sympathy with the most refined tastes.

MEND THE TOYS, MOTHER.

BY MRS B. C. RUDE.

"MAMMA, mamma, fix my moosick-box, won't ye?" And little four-year-old Ben trotted up and laid a dilapidated mouth-organ on my lap.

It was just before Christmas, and I was so busy, I didn't know how to stop sewing; but I did. I couldn't refuse—how could I?—Ben looked at me so. Well, I worked at the thing twenty minutes, riveting on the sides and straightening them out, until at last it went as well as ever, and little Ben trotted off tooting—or blowing, if that's any better—happy as a whole band.

Now I took the shortest way to dispose of Ben. If I had grumbled out after this fashion, "You know I'm busy, and can't be bothered!" he would have pulled at my apron, and fretted for at least twenty minutes; at the end of which time I might have punished him, for aught I know. And, just think of it, I should have lost the sweet satisfaction of having him look up into my eyes with those pretty blue orbs of his and say: "I'm so glad, mamma—so glad you fixed my moosick—so glad! Toot, toot! I loves my mamma; and I sees little Bennie in mamma's eyes!"

O mothers! it isn't long that we can have them with us, they grow up so soon. They'll find life a rough road at best. Some of them will find it all up-hill, and briars on either side. And many times they will sit down—oh, so weary!—and then they'll think back, farther and farther, until, perhaps, a vision of dear mamma mending a music-box will float before them, and in that moment they will thrill with a joy they have not known for years. It will all come back—the gladness—and it will rest them so.

Dear mothers, we are singing lullabies to our darlings to-day that shall echo and re-echo, and lull and soothe as long as life lasts; and even in eternity they may sing because we sing to them to-day; or they may wail because we rave at them to-day.

Oh, can we remember this, I wonder? Yes, you say, but it sounds harsh, this last. You wish I hadn't said it. Why didn't I leave off with the lullaby? Why did I take up the wail?

"Why?" I ask.

"Oh, because it grates."

"It is the truth, is it not? You believe it?"

"Yes, it is the truth, but it stands out so bold and naked."

"You see it, then?"

"Yes."

"Well, my dear woman, that's just what I wanted."

PARLOR PASTIMES.

NOVEL EXPERIMENT.—If a piece of pasteboard with one small hole in it be placed before three lighted candles, three distinct bright spots will be thrown on a sheet of paper placed behind, showing that the rays of light do not intercept one another in passing through the hole.

WORDS HAPHAZARD.—Obtain a boxful of alphabetical letters—let there be eight or ten of each, if possible—and distribute them indiscriminately to such members of the party as may wish to join in the game. With these letters each individual is bound to form a word, or series of words. When each person has constructed what words he can with his share of letters, the words are read aloud in succession. As a result, some amusing combinations will be revealed.

IMPENETRABILITY APPARENTLY DESTROYED.—Impenetrability is a term used to express the fact that it is impossible for two bodies to occupy the same space at the same time. Take a wineglass and fill it as full of water as possible without spilling, and then, being provided with an ounce or so of ordinary pins, drop them in a few at a time; it will be found that they occupy but little space, and do not cause the water to overflow. This will appear the more wonderful, as they seem to take up so much room in the glass, which in reality they do not; for an ounce weight is a very small thing in the bottom of a wineglass, but, drawn into wire and cut into pins, it looks bulky, although no more capable of taking up room than in the solid form.

BLOWING COTTON.—This is a sitting-room game of the pleasantest sort. Let as many as may be sit around the table, with hands folded and arms extended along the edge of the table, each person touching elbows with his neighbor on each side of him. Take a small piece of common cotton wool picked so as to be made as light and airy as possible. Put this in the centre of the table. Let some one count "One, two, three," and then let each one blow his best to keep the cotton away from himself and drive it upon some one else. The person on whom it alights must pay a forfeit. No one must take up his arms to escape the cotton. When it alights, take it up and start anew. It will be a very sober set indeed who can play two or three rounds without indulging in the healthiest sort of uproarious laughter.

CURIOUS EXPERIMENT.—Take a piece of pasteboard about five inches square, roll it into a tube versation commences by a sound from the box which says, "Let me out, I say!" This must be equal in pitch and quality to the assumed voice of the puppet when out of the box, but not so loud. The box-lid is opened an inch, and the voice, a little louder, asks again to be let out; it is then supposed, and proved by subsequent observations, that "little Johnny," in an attempt to get out, has put out a hand, which you shut in between the lid and box; whereupon you produce most awful but muffled screams. Finally the puppet is taken out and put on a chair, upon which you inadvertently sit, and nearly crush "little Johnny." At last, however, a friendly conversation commences between you, and, if well carried on, the illusion is complete.

The "sweep up the chimney," as well as various other familiar personages, also affords capital amusement; but it must be borne in mind that the pitch and quality of the voice must be always kept up, although the loudness has frequently to be changed.

When imitating the voice of a woman, speak in falsetto, and answer gruffly in another tone, so that the voices may be as diverse as possible.

Practise intonation of sentences, and above all let your ear catch and your tongue imitate all the varied sounds that occur in every-day life. Practise by yourself, using every effort to produce the sounds you require in your representation, and trying every variety of position for the tongue.

If you are one of the male sex, a heavy moustache will be found useful to hide slight movements of the lips. In early practice do not continue your efforts too long, as it will be found that the strain on the chest produces undue fatigue, and it is necessary to move the chest very little when giving vent to low, muffled sounds.

The Home Circle.

FROM MY CORNER.

BY LICHEN.

No. 11.

THE woods are still brown and bare, and there is so little of fresh interest outside to look at or speak of, that by the time I have finished the chat I want to have with the "Home Circle," they would say it was no window picture at all; so I shall not call it one, but just snug up in my corner, out of the way of the blustering March winds, and hope, from there, to say what will be as entertaining as anything this gloomy outlook would suggest.

This is the very month for lichens, so I ought to be inspired. Hardly an armful of wood is brought in but they are clinging to some of it. I hate to see them burned, but after one has made lichen-baskets, and laid others over the earth in the flower-pots, and made little mounds of them for mantel or table ornament, what else can they do with them? I always save the prettiest ones we find, however, until they are faded and spoiled. At this season many of them are a beautiful, delicate green. Some are miniature trees, with a perfect network of branches. Others are complete little bushes, with fuzzy stems, something like those of a moss-rose, and tiny imitations of flat, white flowers on the end of every one. Strange little creations they are; so like and yet unlike a plant or flower. I believe I admire most the flat, scale-like ones, which cling so closely to the bark or rock. Some of them are so beautifully formed, and sometimes are mingled with a dark, rich moss, which makes them lovely. Yet many people, not looking closely to find the beauty, see in them only "some greenish gray stuff, of no account, which makes a dirt when it gets on the floor," and they wonder what others can find to admire in it. But so different are we made. I well remember, when a child, my admiration for the large, brown, furry caterpillars, with rich brown stripes of varied shades across their backs. I used to take them up and let them crawl upon my dress, while every one else around shrank away, and asked how I could touch the "horrid things." I never could see anything horrid about them. They were clean, and soft, and rich colored, and they changed into beautiful butterflies. I think we allow ourselves to have a feeling of dread or disgust for some things merely because it is customary to do so, and not from anything really repulsive in themselves, as we will see if we look at it seriously. Then, too, there is beauty in so many insignificant things, if people only stop to find it, just as there is beauty in many an humble, toilsome life, if we know how to look for it aright, and do not miss it in searching after something grand. When I was a young, gay girl, I once went with an older friend to see an old lady who had long been an invalid, and who partially supported herself by making shirts—lying propped on her side, to sew. My companion asked her how she could manage to accomplish so much, in what seemed such a painful way.

She replied: "I do not know, but the strength seems given to me, little by little. I used to think I could not do anything like work, but as time went on, and I was not really ill, and knew I might lie here for years with these crippled limbs, I saw more and more the necessity for some useful exertion on my part. Then I undertook this work, expecting to be able to do very little, but asked each morning, as I dedicated myself anew to God's service, for strength to do the work which my hands could find to employ them. And it has seemed, during the last two years, as if I grew a little stronger continually. It seems as if it were an answer to my prayer. You know the promise is, 'Ask and ye shall receive.'"

"I have been taught to believe that only related to spiritual good," said my companion.

"Of course, that is its most important meaning," said the old lady, "and we generally take it so altogether; but I have thought sometimes that the patient, humble petition for other blessings, trustfully made, helps to bring them when they are good for us to have."

Then our talk drifted off gradually to other subjects; and as I noticed how helpless she was in some things, yet so energetic in her manner and movements, I said: "Mrs. Race, don't you sometimes grow so tired lying there, never able to walk at all, that you long to die, just to be free from it? I am sure I should."

"Not now," she said. "That used to be the case, but not now."

"Well, I would like to know how you learned so much patience."

She smiled, a half-sad smile, as she looked at me.

"It is hard for you, so young and active and untried as yet, to understand how any one can; but," and she lowered her voice reverently, "I do not depend on my own strength. When I ask a silent blessing on my solitary meals as they are brought me each day, I ask also to be fed on spiritual as well as natural food, that the soul may be strengthened as well as the body, and fitted for all the trials it is to meet with."

Was there not a deep and pathetic beauty in this lowly, hidden life, which looked so hard and dreary to the most of the few people who knew anything about it?

Last week little Jessie's birthday came again. Only two snow-drops were out to see it, but her bright eyes were quick to find them. Our "little snow-drop," we used to call her. So fair and fragile, and these little blossoms were the first ones held in her tiny hands, which we once feared would never grow out of babyhood. But great care and attention to nature's laws have strengthened her apparently delicate constitution, until now, on her sixth birthday, she seems as hearty as almost any child. Though learning to read before she was five years old, she is no pale, quiet child, with an over-worked brain, but whatever she does is done in earnest. She studies with all her heart, then plays with might and main, and her clear, rippling laugh is music worth hearing. Yet there is a serious earnestness about her, amusing to see sometimes in one so young.

I was trying not long ago to awaken in her mind some idea of the other world, and of our living there after we had left this one. Hers is not an old head, and we have not forced such things upon her before she seemed able to understand them—partially at least; but now I spoke to her of Heaven, of its being a beautiful place, where those who were good would live always after they went away from this earth, and asked if she did not remember her dear little cousin who had gone to live with the angels.

"Yes," she replied; and after a few moments' thought, while some perplexity was showing itself through her eyes: "Does the sky never break through with them?"

It was very plain some one else had already been talking to her on the subject, and she had seized that idea which comes so naturally to many minds, that Heaven is a place right above us, separated from us by the blue arch of sky, which looks so like a real, material dome.

At another time, when talking of such things, she said: "And when the angels want to see each other, do they just fly around wherever they want to go, like birds do?"

I told her that I had never found any place in the Bible that said angels had wings, and I did not see any reason why we should think they had, for they were described in both the Old and New Testaments as looking just like men. And that the reason why we could see each other in Heaven without having to travel about as we do on earth, was because our bodies are spiritual ones, instead of the kind of ones we have here, and we could see anything we wanted to, and move a good deal faster than with our flesh and bones. But I knew her young mind would have to grow much older before she could comprehend satisfactorily the meaning of that spiritual body, or the blissful possibilities it was capable of.

"O land that sees no sorrow!
O land that fears no strife!
O royal land of flowers!
O realm and home of life!"

What bliss it will be where desire brings the presence of the loved ones whose souls are nearest akin to ours, and we need part no more forever!

How sweet the odor of that tea-rose is as evening draws near. Whenever the air about it is stirred, the whole corner of the room is filled with its delicious fragrance. Doubly precious such bloom and sweetness are when there is no beauty to attract outside; and this little bush, the gift of a friend, brings many a pleasant thought with every flower it bears.

Roy came in a few minutes ago, and sat down with the magazine to read.

"I like the 'Home Circle' in this book," he said presently. "It is so nice of Mr. Arthur to have a place where any of the people who read the magazine can talk to each other, and say any pleasant or useful little things they choose—like 'Earnest' and 'Hattie Bell' do, for instance."

"And I like that piece they had a way before Christmas," chimed in little Jessie, "about feeding the chickens on sour dough, and the old rooster that called, 'Tucky, tuck, tuck.' I wish they'd write some more things like that for us children."

"Yes, Pussie," said Roy, "you like anything about chickens, don't you—even to eating nice young tender ones? When old 'Speck' raises that pretty brood you are making such pets of now, you'll actually want to eat some of them, I expect."

"Now, auntie, please make Roy quit a teasin' me," coaxes the little girl.

So Roy settles down to his reading, and Jessie comes and nestles close to my side to hear the story of "The White Violet," and I lay aside my pencil, hoping that my little chat, although not what I intended making it, will not be quite worthless.

THE shortest way to be rich is not by enlarging our estates, but by contracting our desires.

MY GIRLS AND I.

BY CHATTY BROOKS.

SECOND SERIES.—No. 4.

MARY'S father came to Millwood to-day and called to see her. Our dinner was over and the work all done up. The fire in the kitchen had gone out. I do wish people could manage to come near one's meal-time, so as not to put them to so much unnecessary trouble. Now, there are the Bowerses—a family who claim relationship with mine—they come to Millwood frequently, and they always come to my house for dinner, and never at the usual dinner-hour. It's pretty hard to make such people welcome. But Mary had all her recitations over, and I told her to get her father a cup of hot tea and a nice little lunch.

Well, I heard her clattering and rattling for fully an hour in the kitchen, when fifteen minutes was long enough, and I went down to see what kept her so. Ah, the old story! How many times must a girl be told the one way of making a fire, in a hurry? Our cook-stove is large, a number nine, and instead of putting a handful of shavings, dry twigs, sticks and chips at one end and directly under the teakettle, she had gone and put in long, big wood and sticks, and had the heat as much under all four of the plates as under one. So the whole stove was moderately hot, and the teakettle never would have boiled. All I could do was to raise one end of the fuel the highest—that directly under the teakettle—put on a few dry chips, and I soon had the tea made.

This comes from the merest heedlessness. Now, when Maggie Warren lived with me—that was the summer before my dear, dead husband died—he had two apprentices then—if I didn't watch her and build her fires for her on ironing-days, she would poke around and work at it all day, when a smart woman, who knew how to manage, would have done the whole job in three hours. Instead of making a heaped-up fire in one end of the stove, and having all the heat in one place, under the irons, the whole surface of the stove was moderately hot all the time. I never got out of patience entirely and scolded Maggie but once—a long, hot day in July, in which she ironed all day, and then, at sunset, was obliged to lay aside the collars and laces. I remember how my dear George Nelson pitied me, and stood beside me, and smoothed my hair, and peeped around and looked into my eyes, and made me laugh.

The girls ask me, sometimes, why I do not marry again—just as if I could for one moment entertain the thought of changing the name my dear husband gave me for another.

Evening.—I didn't like to do it, but it had to be done, and there was no other person on whom it devolved except myself. That was, to tell Margie of a naughty trick at the table. If she is eating it is no uncommon thing to see her let bits of food fall from her mouth upon her plate, especially the seeds of fruit. It is a little habit that dates away back to her very babyhood—a bad, low habit that is very disgusting. Then she inclines to bend her head down over her plate, too. Such things are very unladylike, and though I would not tell her of it, I have left the table more than once on account of it. She blushed and promised to reform.

I had to scold a couple of the girls, too, this evening; Lottie and one of the new ones. Lottie inclines to be a little tardy at her meals, and you all know how that vexatious habit does try the temper of the housewife. It seems a little thing, indeed, but it always did ruffle my temper to be obliged to keep a nice, warm meal waiting until it was cold, or dry, or stale, or overdone. Now, my George Nelson was a very prompt man at his meals. He relished a good dinner, and just as soon as I would say: "Come, Georgie," he would flip off from the tailor's bench like a whip cracker, and come and offer me his arm in such a jolly, cunning way, as though making believe that we were a royal couple, he the lord and I the lady. Now, some men will find fault and say: "Seems to me there's something left out of this soup;" or, "Didn't you forget the salt, or something?" but never did my George throw out any such insinuations or hints at fault-finding. Whatever I did he approved. I do remember once, however, that he was called upon to punish me, and only once. He was down town taking the measure of an invalid—a man who intended to go back to his Eastern home as soon as he was well enough, and my husband was to measure him and make him a new suit of clothes. The man was convalescent and glad to have some one to converse with him, and George stayed and visited until long after our usual dinner-hour. When he came bustling in, he sat right down at the table and laughed and said: "There! I came before dinner was ready, after all!"

Now, dinner had been waiting an hour at least; the baked sweet potatoes were shrunken and half cold; the tea had stood a long time; the roast was overdone and nothing was good. I was very hungry, and as I put the things on the table I said, in a kind of a hurt way: "That is rather shabby treatment; I don't thank any man for keeping a meal waiting that long, I'm sure."

"Well, eat your dinner alone, then," he said, rising from the table, placing the heavy goose upon the stove and curling himself up on the bench and resuming his work.

Oh, I was so sorry that I had spoken so sharply! I essayed to eat, however, but every morsel stuck in my throat. Then I rose, cleared off the table, set away the half-cold dinner and resumed my work. That was a long, cheerless, miserable afternoon. Toward evening I could stand it no longer, and stole up behind my husband, cautiously, and stood there. I did wish he'd speak first. I held in as long as I could, and then I caught him round the neck and cried: "O George Nelson! George Nelson!"

"Well, what is it?" he said, laying his hand on the side of my face.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear! oh, dear!" was all I could say.

"Poor little Chatty! does she feel badly—poor girl," said he, and the tears came into his eyes—and mournful, sad eyes they had been, too, all that afternoon.

Then I told him how sorry I was that I had spoken so harshly when he came in to dinner, and he said: "Well, never mind it; I was to blame. You are the dearest little wife in the world, anyhow."

But that only made me feel worse than ever, and I lay on his dear 'bused bosom and cried until I was as weak as a baby.

Now this may seem like the merest little tiff in the world to you girls who read it, but such things are very sad indeed, and should never come into any one's married life. They may be healed by apologies, and bridged over by kind words, and the stings of bitterness extracted by humble confessions, but the hurt and the scar will remain through all time. The remembrance of it cannot be blotted out; memory will keep her trust inviolate, and the shadow will remain in the domestic horizon so long as they both do live. Sharper than barbed arrows are unkind words, and only in married life is felt the keenness of the sting that wounds so severely.

But, woman-fashion, I have wandered from my subject, and been telling of the most serious matrimonial tiff that myself and my dear dead husband ever had.

Well, when the girls came in late, panting and puffing, and tossing their hats to one side, rosy with fast walking and hungry for their suppers, I asked them if the professor had kept them late on account of imperfect recitations. Without a bit of embarrassment, they said: "Oh, no, we were through with our lessons long ago, but we stopped at Jenny Castor's to play croquet, and so we kept on, and kept on, until after sunset."

I reprimanded them in good earnest, and told them we were all hungry, and our supper had been deferred fully an hour on their account, and if they ever served us so again they should go without their suppers.

The new girl said in a low, sweet voice, meant to be very kind and conciliating: "Why, Mrs. Brooks, never mind us; I am willing to go to the cupboard and take a piece any time."

I told her very decidedly that the regulations of my household should never come to that loose way—to allow the girls to run to the cupboard for pieces at any time, or whenever they missed a meal. I could not allow them to eat lunch when they chose, or to go to the cupboard when they pleased, and learn habits injurious to their health. They must retire at night at the usual hour, and they must eat their meals when the family did.

The new girl drew her lips and looked wise, while Lottie, dear Lottie, frank and sincere as she is beautiful, caught me round the waist and shook me as she would shake a baby, saying: "You blessed Chatty! I believe every word you say, and I know you are the best friend we girls have in this world."

A lady said to me once: "My boarders are so troublesome; after I go to bed at night I can hear the cupboard door slam, and the clinking of dishes, and the tread of feet on the cellar stairs, and the clattering of the cover on the barrel of apples, and often they go to bed and leave their boots standing in the middle of the floor, and the lamp left to burn all night. What would you do if you were in my place?" she asked.

"I'd be the mistress in my own house," I replied. "You cannot blame the boys, because you led them probably into those very habits yourself. Did you not, in your generosity of heart, when they first entered your home, say, 'Now, boys, do just as you would at home. There hangs the night-key; use it whenever you have occasion. There is the cupboard, and you will always find cold victuals in it. Try and make this seem like home.'"

"Yes, that is just what I always say to them," was the reply.

Then I told her how I did once when my George Nelson was living, and we boarded the boys in Kemp's saddler shop.

I said: "Now, boys, I hope we'll have pleasant times together. We have rules and regulations in our little family, but I hope in living up to them you will not find them to be too rigid or binding. Then I told them that I would expect them to keep regular hours, and be prompt in the observances of our home, and I hoped we would all be benefited by mingling together. I never had any trouble but once. One of the boys was sick, and I requested another who slept in a warm room to change beds with him one night. He promised me he would, but when bed-time came he refused to allow the sick boy to have his room. I very kindly made the same request the next evening, and he did exactly the same thing. Then, without any words of fault-finding, I said to him alone the next morning, 'Mr. —, it is not convenient for us to board you any longer.' I spoke it softly and kindly, looking in his guilty red face. He tried to speak, but the mumble of words was not intelligible. Poor selfish boy! he did not like to give up his warm room, and could not possibly see how I could expect it from him when he paid for his boarding. I never saw such an example of utter selfishness as he exhibited."

THOUGHT-PICTURES.

BY S. S. GORBY.

I SAW a winsome maid,
With a simple and child-like air;
Adown her temples her tresses strayed,
And the sunlight gleamed, and the zephyrs played
In the mesh of her golden hair.

I saw a woman grown,
And the artless ways were gone;
The pure, sweet ways that the child had known
Had one by one, like the sad years, flown—
Or a dream, ere the morning's dawn.

I saw a tired wife,
Worn with a ceaseless care—
Worn and wearied with inward strife,
That marred her beauty, and scarr'd her life—
'Twas a burden hard to bear.

And I saw them make a grave
At the close of a weary life;
And a marble—cold to the touch, to the sight—
Had carved on its surface smooth and white,
This—"MAIDEN, WOMAN, WIFE."

HOW TO BEAUTIFY OUR HOMES.

IN many a house there may be found, perhaps away among the rubbish of the garret, a small round stand with wooden standard, the sight of which, perhaps, brings to mind the face of some dear old lady now gone to the better land, who used to darn stockings near it by the light of her favorite candle. Her precious piece of furniture is now considered too old-fashioned for use; but let us bring it out to the light, and see if something cannot be done with it. A little black walnut stain, made of burnt umber and vinegar, finished, when dry, with a coating of copal varnish, will improve the standard. For the top is needed a piece of black or brown cloth (broad-cloth or light beaver will do), cut the size of the table, and bind with black or scarlet braid. A straight piece, five or six inches in width, long enough to encircle the top of the stand, is now needed. This cut in scallops or points, pinked around the edges with a small iron, and braided with scarlet and gold or other pretty colors, or ornamented with applique figures such as may be found in Harpers' Bazar, will make a pretty border for the edge. A tassel between each scallop is an improvement. After the top has been ornamented in the same manner and the straight strip bound at the top with braid and the two pieces neatly sewed together, we will find that we have a piece of furniture not only useful but decidedly ornamental for any parlor, and we think if dear grandma could see it, she would give us an approving smile.

A pretty ornament for our stand will be the little collection of ferns, mosses, maiden-hair and long sprays of the vine commonly known as partridge-berry which we obtained in the autumn and placed under a small glass-receiver. These, taken up carefully, with the moist earth clinging to the roots, and pressed into a shallow earthen dish, in the centre a small wooden cross painted white, the vine of glossy green, with its scarlet berries climbing over it, has been a cheerful sight through the long, dreary winter days. It does not require any care, and will bear a great amount of heat or cold, light or shade, without injury.

A pretty, inexpensive table or stand-spread may be made of ladies' cloth or flannel with a border worked upon ordinary coarse canvas. The canvas should be placed upon the spread about two inches from the edge, basted around and embroidered in cross stitch with zephyr worsted and the threads of canvas removed.

A Grecian pattern worked upon a drab spread with green or blue in two shades, and two shades of gold color, upon a rich dark-brown or black are exceedingly pretty.

A SUBSCRIBER.

GOODNESS AND SMARTNESS.

"HOW is my boy getting on, Mr. Carter?" asked a father of his son's teacher.

"He is one of the best boys in my school," said the teacher, emphatically. "A very conscientious, truthful lad, and one whom I can always trust as pure-hearted and generous."

"Glad to hear it," said the father, indifferently. "I always knew he was a pretty good boy about home, but what I wish to ask particularly is, how is he getting along in his studies. I want him to be sharp and smart for business when he is through school."

"Well, as to that," said the teacher, hesitatingly, "he is a very industrious boy, but he is not very quick to learn, especially in mathematics. He likes rhetoric and moral science better, and always has good lessons in geology."

"A fiddlesticks," said the father, impatiently. "If he isn't good at cyphering, he isn't for anything. Drop off the other things and put him through on arithmetic. I always knew he had too soft a head for business. I brought him here to be made something of, and not to fool away his time over moral science and all that. I am afraid you make quite too much of these things and don't toughen up the boys for every-day work. If a boy isn't smart, of what advantage is his goodness to him, I should like to know. Might almost as well send him to a girl's school," he added, with a half sneer, as he rose to leave. He could not hide his dissatisfaction at having his boy commended chiefly for his good moral qualities. These, he took for granted, could be taken up and developed at any odd leisure hour or two.

Had the teacher been able to say, "Your boy is at the head of his classes in almost everything. He will win the first prize," there would have been no bounds to his delight and satisfaction. If he had been compelled to add, "I wish I could speak as confidently about his purity of character and the good influence he exerts over the other boys," the father would have been very ready with his excuse.

"We must not think too hardly of a boy who is just sowing his wild oats. No doubt you and I did the same, but we forget these things as we grow old. The boy will come out all right, never fear. Watch him closely that he does not get into mischief that will bring trouble on him and me; and don't be too hard on small offences. It sours a boy's disposition."

And so the "wild oats" are allowed to be sowed plentifully; the result is the same that it was when those terrible words were first spoken: "Whatever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

HOME.

LOVE watches over the cradle of the infant, over the couch of the aged, over the welfare and comfort of all; to be happy, man retires from the out-door world into his home. In the household circle, the troubled heart finds consolation, the disturbed find rest, the joyous finds itself in its true element. Pious souls, when they speak of death, say they are going home. Their longing for Heaven is to them a home-sickness. Jesus also represented the abode of eternal happiness under the picture of a house, a father's house. Does not this tell us that the earthly home is appointed to be a picture of Heaven, and a foretaste of that higher home?

EARLY SPRING.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE, BY AYTOUN.

COME ye so early, days of delight?
Making the hillside blithesome and bright.

Merrily, merrily, little brooks rush,
Down by the meadow, under the bush.

Welkin and hilltop, azure and cool;
Fishes are sporting in streamlet and pool.

Birds of gay feather flit through the grove,
Singing together ditties of love.

Busily coning from moss-covered bowers,
Brown bees are humming, questing for flowers.

Lightsome emotion, life everywhere;
Faint wafts of fragrance scenting the air.

Now comes there sounding a sough of the breeze,
Shakes through the thicket, sinks in the trees.

Sinks, but returning, it ruffles the hair;
Aid me this rapture, Muses, to bear!

Know ye the passion that stirs in me here?
Yestere'en at gloaming was I with my dear.

THE NEWLY WEDDED.

BY WILLIAM MACKWORTH PRAED.

NOW the rite is duly done;
Now the word is spoken;
And the spell has made us one
Which may ne'er be broken:
Rest we, dearest, in our home,—
Roam we o'er the heather,—
We shall rest, and we shall roam,
Shall we not? together.

From this hour the summer rose
Sweeter breathes to charm us;
From this hour the winter snows
Lighter fall to harm us;
Fair or foul—on land or sea—
Come the wind or weather,
Best and worst, whate'er they be,
We shall share together.

Death, who friend from friend can part,
Brother rend from brother,
Shall but link us, heart and heart,
Closer to each other;
We shall call his anger play,
Deem his dart a feather,
When we meet him on our way
Hand in hand together.

THY KINGDOM COME.

I CANNOT heal, I cannot hide,
My leprosy of lust and pride;
And, were I summon'd, thus unmeet,
To join the saints in Zion street,
Now would my envy knit her frown,
At one who wore a brighter crown;
And now, my sullen discontent
On some angelic task be bent;
Still for this world my soul would long,
Soon weary of the Church's song,
Her sweet unrest, her holy care,
Her yoke of love and raiment fair;
How idly falls the prayer divine,
"Thy Kingdom come," from lips like mine!

But, spite of sins which Thou dost hate,
Before Thy throne of grace I wait,
Lord, listen to me, day by day,
Until I mean the words I say;
Upon this heart, bright Finger glide,
Spite of its treachery and pride,
Nor leave it, till another prayer,
'Thy will be done,' is written there;
Then shall I do my Lord's desire,
With face of flint, and tongue of fire;
And never more shall evil thought
Pollute the shrine which Thou hast bought,
Nor passion shake, nor doubt molest
Thy throne, O God, within my breast!

NIGHT AND MORNING.

BY ELIZABETH AKERS ALLEN.

I PAUSE beside the darkening pane,
With homesick heart and weary hand;
To watch the fair day die again,
And evening with its shadowy train
Creep slow along the lonesome land.

The west has lost its line of gold—
The clouds hang threatening, near and far,
Heavy and hopeless, fold on fold—
And night comes moaning, unconsoled
By glimmer of a single star.

Ah, why does hope depart with light?
And why do griefs and fears away,
And bitter thoughts of loss and blight
Come crowding back again with night
Like evil things which fear the day?

Yet none but feeble souls complain—
The world is only dark, not lost—
The day will shine on wave and plain,
The grass and flowers will spring again,
Despite the night, despite the frost.

And when the east, like some far shore
Of promise, broadens rosy-bright,
Visions of darkness vex no more,
For all their legions flee before
The level lances of the light.

The grief that seemed too hard to bear,
The thought which stung to sharpest pain—
Faded in the rich and golden air—
The heart grows calm, the world grows fair,
And life is sweet and dear again.

TO-DAY.

BY JULIA C. R. DORR.

WHAT dost thou bring to me, O fair To-day,
That comest o'er the mountains with swift feet?

All the young birds make haste thy steps to greet,
And all the dewy roses of the May Turn red and white with joy. The breezes play
On their soft harps a welcome low and sweet:
All nature hails thee, glad thy face to meet,
And owns thy presence in a brighter ray,
But my poor soul distrusts thee! One as fair
As thou art, O To-day, drew near to me
Serene and smiling, yet she bade me wear
The sudden sackcloth of a great despair!
Oh, pitiless! that through the wandering air
Sent no kind warning of the ill to be!

SPONGE CAKE.

CHATTY BROOKS—Dear Friend: I am very much interested in your girls and you. I thank you ever so much for the useful hints I am continually receiving through your monthly chats. I can put "the coat" on, and wear it, too, when it particularly fits me, without being in the least angry, because no one but myself knows when you are hitting me.

I have an excellent recipe for sponge-cake lovers who are unable to beat the cake as much as it is generally thought it should be beaten, and I would like you to give it to your readers some time. I know it is just as nice without the beating, but my right wrist is lame, and I use this recipe in preference to all others (when eggs are cheap) for common use.

Three eggs and two cups of sugar stirred together smooth; stir in three cups of flour; in the last cup of flour have two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar. Last of all stir in one cup of sweet milk, in which is dissolved one teaspoonful of soda and a pinch of salt.

This makes quite a good-sized loaf. I think it nicer than some of the many sponge-cake recipes that require so much hard work from my stiff wrist.

Yours truly,

MEG ARLAND.

RECIPES.

APPLE PUDDING.—Fill a dish one and one-half inches deep with sour apples, pared and quartered. Spread over them a batter made of one and one-half cupfuls of flour, a little salt, half teaspoonful of saleratus, and wet with milk—lapped milk is best—to make it as thick as the batter can be spread. Bake in a quick oven, and, when done, turn it bottom upwards on a platter, and sprinkle with sugar, or serve with any sauce.

RICE FRITTERS.—Boil a teacupful of rice until it is tender; strain upon it one quart of milk, and let it boil ten minutes; cool it, and add flour enough to make a batter as thick as will fry easily on the griddle, and two tablespoonfuls of yeast; let it rise three hours; then add two well-beaten eggs and cook on a heated griddle.

LEMON PIE.—Take one tablespoonful of corn-starch, moisten with a little cold water, then add one cup of boiling water, one cup of sugar, one egg, one tablespoonful of butter, the juice and grated rind of one lemon.

VIRGINIA CORN-BREAD.—Dissolve a tablespoonful of butter in three pints and a half of boiling milk, and into this scald one quart of Indian meal. When cool, add half a pint of wheat flour, a little sugar, a teaspoonful of salt, and two eggs well beaten. Mix well together, and bake in two cake-tins well buttered.

CREAM PIE.—Two-thirds of a cupful of white sugar, two eggs, a cup of flour, a tablespoonful of cream or milk, a teaspoonful of cream of tartar, and half a teaspoonful of soda. Bake in two flat tins. For the cream, take an egg, one-third of a cupful of sugar, a tablespoonful of corn-starch, and half a pint of milk. Beat the egg, sugar and starch together, with a little of the milk. Scald the remainder of the milk, and mix all together, letting it boil up well. When cold, flavor to suit the taste, and fill the pie.

ABOUT JELLY.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE HOME: I have often thought I would like to add my mite to the Housekeepers' Department, if Mr. Arthur could find room. Perhaps I can tell Pipsey and Floy what ails their jelly; or at least can tell how we make ours, and it never fails of coming, even if the fruit is very ripe. We always cook the juice before putting in the sugar. Let it boil fifteen minutes, then add sugar, and let it just boil up good once; then it is done and ready to can. It is light-colored and thick. Boiling the juice and sugar together at first makes it dark.

Salt is an excellent thing to use in sweeping carpets; it takes up the dust, and makes the carpet bright and clean.

EVA.

THE unsatisfactory light frequently given by kerosene lamps is often due to the wick. The filtering of several quarts of oil through a wick, which stops every particle of dust in it, must necessarily gradually obstruct the pores of the wick. Consequently, although a wick may be long enough to last some time, its conductive power may be so impaired that a good light cannot be obtained.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

THE fashion chronicler labors under peculiar disadvantages at this period of the year in being obliged to predict the coming styles, before they have been heralded by any general display of spring goods, or by the spring openings. There is an indication that the present mode of uniting silken and woollen fabrics in the same costume will continue in favor. As spring advances, the rough woollen goods which have been received in such universal favor during the winter, will be more and more discarded, and the soft, more finely-finished fabrics will be introduced in their stead for both street and house wear. The most beautiful of these fabrics is cashmere, the lustreless folds of which bring out in full relief its quality and finish, and contrast with the lustre and half-tints of silk.

Where cashmere and silk are united in one costume, the cashmere should be a shade or two the lighter.

A pale, silvery-blue silk skirt and sleeves, with an overskirt and corset, or eniras basque of cashmere, forms one of the daintiest of evening costumes. The cashmere skirt may be trimmed with a tiny side-plaiting of silk, or a ruche of raveled silk, or a bordering of feathers, and possibly with a line of white lace; but the cashmere basque must be double-corded with silk, or possibly triple-corded, with the centre cord of cashmere. The silk sleeves should be ornamented with cashmere bands from the shoulders to the wrists, and the latter decorated with cuffs or plaitings, under pretty bows of silk and cashmere combined. This same costume will be beautiful in any color, of which the cashmere should always be a shade or two the lighter.

There is an effort being made to substitute sashes in the place of the polonaise and overskirt; but it will hardly prove successful for two reasons: first, they are unbecoming, unless the wearer be statuesque, and remain always in a composed posture; and, secondly, they are very difficult of arrangement.

There has been a prediction that polonaises were to go out of favor, but so far it seems unfounded. Various garments are described under novel names, but, with slight modifications in form, they still are polonaises and overskirts.

The summer prints already exposed in the windows of the stores, display very rich and attractive patterns, in which small checks and narrow stripes predominate.

New Publications.

Nature and Culture. By Harvey Rice. Boston: Lee & Shepard. A volume of somewhat commonplace essays, neither worthy of particular commendation nor calling for special censure. Many persons will no doubt find them pleasant and profitable reading, though they present little or nothing that is novel or striking, either in fact or sentiment. Of the six essays comprised in the volume, the best, in our opinion, are "Nature and her Lessons," "Education and its Errors," and "America and her Future." For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

The Rational First Reader. For Phonetic and Elocutional Instruction. By Dr. Ad. Douai. Second edition.

The Rational Second Reader. For Phonetic, Elocutional, Etymological and Grammatical Instruction. By Dr. Ad. Douai.

The Rational Third Reader. For Instruction in the Laws of Pronunciation, Orthography, Grammar and Elocution. By Dr. Ad. Douai.

Manual for Teachers. An Introduction to the series of Rational Readers. By Dr. Ad. Douai. We have received from the publisher, E. Stelger, 22 and 24 Frankfort Street, New York, the series of readers and accompanying manual whose titles are given above. The design of these readers, briefly stated, is to bring about a reform, long needed, in teaching the elementary principles of our language; first, by a reduction of the hitherto absurdly multiplied rules of pronunciation; and, second, by the introduction, in an easy and gradual manner, of a phonographic system, requiring no new signs, and greatly lightening and simplifying the labors both of teacher and pupil. Though there may be no royal road to learning, that, surely, does not render it necessary for us to pursue our way groping along in dark alleys and through rough, crooked by-ways, stumbling and falling, and oftentimes lying down and giving up the journey out of sheer weariness. We think that no one who may take the trouble to examine these handsomely-printed little volumes, will deny that they present many, very many, points of excellence, of superiority, indeed, as compared with even the most progressive books of their class. That they will entirely do away with the present one-sided, slow-coach system of education in the elements of our language, is hardly to be hoped; but it is not too much to expect from their wide adoption a very considerable advance in the right direction.

Temperance Lectures. By Thomas McMurray. With Autobiography. Toronto: Hunter, Rosé & Co. The addresses embraced in this unpretending volume, while they can lay little claim to literary excellence, are yet worthy of a wide circulation for the plain, practical arguments they present. Lively with anecdote, and addressing themselves with common-sense directness to the popular comprehension, they cannot but do good just where it is most needed. What they lack in rhetoric, they make up for with pertinent, convincing, hard facts.

Songs of Joy. By J. H. Tenney, author of "Golden Sunbeams," etc. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is a very desirable collection of hymns and tunes, especially adapted for prayer, praise, camp meetings, revivals, Christian associations and family worship.

For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

Eating for Strength. By M. L. Holbrook, M. D., Editor of the Herald of Health, etc., aided by Numerous Competent Assistants. New York: Wood & Holbrook. This volume is divided into four parts, which treat respectively of "The Science of Eating," "Recipes for Wholesome Cookery," "Recipes for Wholesome Drinks," and "Answers to Ever-recurring Questions." One of the most important questions as regards health is, What shall we eat? That we all constantly violate hygienic rules in this matter is undoubtedly true. Sometimes this violation is caused by indifference, but more frequently by ignorance. This volume furnishes the reader with scientific facts regarding food, supplemented with practical recipes and directions. We commend the volume to the attention of all, and especially to that of intelligent women, superintendents of households. For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

Young Folks' History of the United States. By Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Illustrated. Boston: Lee & Shepard. We have examined this little volume with much pleasure. Although, in embracing from the very earliest geological records of the inhabitants of the United States down to the present time, it is necessarily very brief in its recital of events, it still is clear and concise in its statements; and there are many older persons than the "young folks" for whom it is intended, who would regard their attainments with a considerable degree of satisfaction did they include all that is told in these pages. While evidently not intended specially as a text-book in schools, we think it might be introduced in that capacity, and to the displacement of the text-books now used, with advantage and satisfaction to the pupils.

The Island of Fire; or, A Thousand Years of the Old Northmen's Home. By Rev. P. C. Headley, author of "Life of the Empress Josephine," etc. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is an exceedingly interesting volume, giving to the reader a clear conception of the history, geographic features and inhabitants, with their manners, customs and religions, of Sweden, Norway and Iceland for the past thousand years. These countries are little known to-day, but at a remote period in the past the Norsemen were a power in the barbarian world, and made themselves known by sea and land. Their history is more or less connected with that of England and our own race. The book will be alike acceptable to young and old. For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

Danger; or, Wounded in the House of a Friend. By T. S. Arthur. Philadelphia: J. M. Stoddart & Co. The scope and character of this book will be learned from the preface, which we copy entire.

"All efforts at eradicating evil must, to be successful, begin as near the beginning as possible. It is easier to destroy a weed when but an inch above the ground than after it has attained a rank growth and set its hundred rootlets in the soil. Better if the evil seed were not sown at all; better if the ground received only good seed into its fertile bosom. How much richer and sweeter the harvest!"
"Bare and drinking-saloons are, in reality, not so much the causes as the effects of intemperance. The chief causes lie back of these, and are to be found in our homes. Bars and drinking-saloons minister to, stimulate and increase the appetite already formed, and give accelerated speed to those whose feet have begun to move along the road to ruin.

In "THREE YEARS IN A MAN-TRAP" the author of this volume uncovered the terrible evils of the liquor traffic; in this he goes deeper, and unveils the more hidden sources of that widespread ruin which is cursing our land. From the public licensed saloon, where liquor is sold to men—not to boys, except in violation of law—he turns to the private home saloon, where it is given away in unstinted measure to guests of both sexes and of all ages, and seeks to show in a series of swiftly-moving panoramic scenes the dreadful consequences that flow therefrom.

This book is meant by the author to be a startling cry of "DANGER!" Different from "THE MAN-TRAP," as dealing with another aspect of the temperance question, its pictures are wholly unlike those presented in that book, but none the less vivid or intense. It is given as an argument against what is called the temperate use of liquor, and as an exhibition of the fearful disasters that flow from our social drinking customs. In making this argument and exhibition the author has given his best effort to the work."

"Danger" is sold by subscription, and cannot, therefore, be found at the book-stores. If any of our subscribers wish a copy, we will mail it on receipt of the price, $2.00.

NEW MUSIC.

Messrs. Lee & Walker, 922 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, send us the following pieces of new music: "I wish Mamma was here," as sung by Mrs. Geo. Ware; "Peerless Astarte," music by Shattuck, and "I want to see Mamma once more," the words of little Charlie Ross. Also "Mrs. Jones and her Baggage," a comic song. Among the instrumental music we find "Killarney," fantasia and variation by Chas. Grobe, also "Marion Schottische," by Sweeney, with pretty lithographic title-page.

From W. H. Boner & Co., 1102 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, we have "Praise of Tears," and "Rondo-Mignon," two of a collection of popular music by favorite authors, entitled "Chosen Friends," also two songs, words by Burns, music by Cauffman, "I Love my Jean," and "The Red, Red Rose," very pleasing melodies, and "Casting all on Jesus," sacred quartette, by F. J. Boiler, which is suitable for church choirs, into which it is being introduced.

The Cathedral at Milan.

OUR frontispiece this month is a view of that marvellous piece of architecture, the Milan Cathedral, which, with the exception of St. Peter's at Rome, is the grandest ecclesiastical structure in the world. It astonishes and enchants the beholder by the wonderful delicacy of its sculptured ornaments, and the infinite detail of its architecture.

The building of this sublime creation of art, with "its forest of pinnacles and its wilderness of tracery," was commenced in 1386, by Giovanni G. Visconti, and so liberal were his plans that it is not finished even now. The form on the ground is that of a Latin cross, terminated by an apsis or domed extension. Its length is four hundred and eighty-five feet; breadth of the main body, two hundred and fifty-two feet; the whole covering an area of one hundred and seven thousand, seven hundred and eighty-two square feet. The height of the crown of the vaulting in the nave is one hundred and fifty-three feet, while the statue of the Madonna in the apex of the dome is three hundred and fifty-five above the pavement. The material of which it is built is white marble. The façade, which is of the finest Carrara, presents a splendid general effect, and the central tower and spire are extremely beautiful. There are places for several thousand statues; McCulloch says four thousand, five hundred; Dr. Prime affirms ten thousand, of which seven thousand are already in place.

The successive masters of architecture who, during the long period it has been in course of erection, have lavished the treasures of their genius and experience upon this wonderful structure, have given a somewhat varied character to its style; yet it is admitted on all sides to be of exquisite beauty. Still, one cannot deny that there is a certain justice in the criticism of Forsyth, who, some sixty years ago, thus expressed his views of the cathedral:

"It has been wonderfully contrived," he says, "to bury millions of money in ornaments which are never to be seen. Whole quarries of marble have been manufactured here into statues, relieves, niches and noches; and high sculpture has been squandered on objects which vanish individually in the man. Were two or three thousand of those statues removed, the rest would regain their due importance, and the fabric itself become more intelligible."

The interior of the cathedral is very imposing.

"Ascending the marble steps which lead to the front," says Bayard Taylor, "I lifted the folds of the heavy curtain and entered. What a glorious aisle! The mighty pillars support a magnificent arched ceiling, painted to resemble fretwork, and the little light that falls through the small windows above, enters tinged with a dim golden hue. A feeling of solemn awe comes over one as he steps, with a hushed tread, along the colored marble floor, and measures the massive columns until they blend with the gorgeous arches above. There are four rows of these, nearly fifty in all, and when I state that they are eight feet in diameter, and sixty or seventy [ninety is the exact measure] in height, some idea may be formed of the grandeur of the building. The Duomo is not yet entirely finished, the workmen being still employed in various parts.

"The design of the Duomo is said to be taken from Monte Rosa, one of the loftiest peaks of the Alps. Its hundreds of sculptured pinnacles, rising from every part of the body of the church, certainly bear a striking resemblance to the splintered ice-crag of Savoy. Thus we see how Art, mighty and endless in her forms though she be, is in everything but the child of Nature. Her divinest conceptions are but copies of objects which we behold every day. The faultless beauty of the Corinthian capital, the springing and intermingling arches of the Gothic aisle, the pillared portico, or the massive and sky-piercing pyramid, are but attempts at reproducing, by the studied regularity of art, the ever-varied and ever-beautiful forms of mountain, rock and forest."

A rich tone is diffused over the interior, it being entirely composed of a particular description of marble, to which time gives a fine yellow tint. The pavement is laid in a mosaic pattern of red, blue and white marble. The capitals of the great pillars are of remarkable beauty. The bases of these capitals are formed by a wreath of foliage mixed with figures of children and animals; above is a circle of eight niches or shrines, corresponding to the intervals between the eight shafts of the clustered pillar, each containing a statue covered by a canopy. This shrine-work is perfectly unique, and there is nothing parallel to it, either in the work itself, or in the manner it is here introduced.

In order to appreciate fully the grandeur of the Duomo, one should ascend the flight of one hundred and sixty steps to the roof. The most delightful time for enjoying this, the widest and loveliest prospect in Italy, is before sunrise or after sunset, particularly the latter, as an Italian sky, like our own, at this hour of the day, is surprisingly beautiful.

"All its hues,
From the rich sunset to the rising star,
Their magical variety diffuse;
And now they change; a paler shadow strews
Its mantle o'er the mountains; parting day
Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbues
With a new color as it gasps away,
The last still loveliest, 'til—'tis gone, and all is gray."

A New Invention—The Type-Writer.

AT last we have a mechanical result that promises to the slow pen-worker the same facility attained by the needle-woman through the sewing-machine. A description of this "Type-writer," as it is called, will show its great value to authors, editors, lawyers, merchants, and all who use the pen. The machine is very simple in construction, a little less in size than a sewing-machine, and so light that a boy can easily lift and carry it. The writer sits before it, and strikes a number of keys, just as he would the keys of a piano, save that he touches but one at a time.

There are four rows of these keys, and eleven in each row. The touching of one of these keys prints a letter on a piece of paper which revolves around a cylinder at the top of the machine. Thus the speed of the writing depends entirely upon the rapidity with which the writer can touch these keys. A very little practice enables one to write with this machine as fast, or faster, than ordinary writing can be done.

Experienced operators can produce from sixty to one hundred words a minute. The machine is entirely under the control of the operator. Any width of paper not exceeding wide cap, and any length whatever, can be used. The width between the lines is entirely at the operator's command through a simple adjustment of the machine. A scale directly before his eyes, along which a guide or pointer proceeds, always indicates to the writer the precise spot on the paper where the letter is being produced, and also enables him to put the printing just where he pleases. Thus the machine can do not only ordinary writing, but the most intricate and exact of figure work, with columns and display lines.

The type-writer is simple in construction, almost impossible to put out of order, and capable of being worked with the utmost ease by any child who knows how to spell, or the aged and infirm, even if vision is impaired. Unlike its predecessor, the sewing-machine, it is not worked by a treadle, the touch of the fingers alone serving to operate it. This machine is called a type-writer, but it does not write, it prints in plain capital letters, a little larger than ordinary type, yet taking up less space than writing.

We shall have occasion to refer to this machine again, as our assistant has procured one, and will report upon it in a future number. So far she is delighted with its operation.

Bazaar of the Young Men's Christian Association.

THE Philadelphia Young Men's Christian Association has determined upon the erection of a building adapted to its needs, and where it will not be so straitened as now for want of room. Subscriptions amounting to sixty thousand dollars have already been obtained for this purpose. But, to ensure the erection of the new building in time for the great Centennial, a much larger fund is needed. To obtain this addition to their fund, it has been decided to open at Horticultural Hall, in Philadelphia, on the 6th of March, 1875, a Bazaar, to consist of the buildings and goods of all nations, with attendants in the costumes of the various countries represented. This bazaar, which will undoubtedly be a unique and attractive exhibition, will remain open until the 17th of April. To secure as large and varied display of articles as possible, an appeal is made to the ladies of Philadelphia, and the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware and New Jersey, for contributions. These contributions may consist of wearing apparel, needle or shell work, specimens of potichomania, carvings, autographs, engravings, crayon or pencil sketches, antiquarian, foreign or national curiosities, and toys or ornamental and useful articles. All communications and articles to be addressed to the "Bazaar Committee, 811 Chestnut, or 1210 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia."

Cashmere Shawls.

IN his recently published volume, "Remains of Lost Empires," an exceedingly interesting book, Mr. P. V. N. Myers gives an account of his visit to the famed Valle of Cashmere, and incidentally describes the manufacture of the true Cashmere shawl, which is one of the industries of the region. This lovely valley, nestled among the Himalayas, is walled in by lofty mountains, some of them rising to a height of fifteen thousand feet. The valley itself is nearly six thousand feet above the sea level, or almost as high as our Mount Washington. Mr. Myers describes it as "a beautiful upland mountain-environed garden or park, eighty miles in length, and from twenty to thirty in breadth, sprinkled all over, like an English landscape, with trees and flowers, and diversified with river and lake, with villages embowered in groves, with pasture-land and irrigated field." The City of Cashmere, now containing a population of about a hundred and fifty thousand, is built on both sides of the Jhelum River, through which it runs like the Grand Canal in Venice, and on many smaller channels branching off from the main stream. A large number of the houses stand close to the water, which is covered with boats. These are used by the people, as in Venice, to go from place to place in the city, and for purposes of traffic.

The products of the shawl-looms of the City of Cashmere have given it a world-wide reputation. In 1823, out of a population of two hundred and forty thousand, it was estimated that at least one hundred and twenty thousand were engaged in the manufacture of these shawls. But both the population and the manufacture have steadily decreased since that time. Two centuries ago, the population of the entire Valley of Cashmere was about one million; now it is scarcely three hundred thousand, one-half the number being in the city.

"The wool of which these shawls are made," says Mr. Myers, "is furnished by several animals, the wild goat of the provinces of Lassa and Ladakh affording the best. The domestic goat and wild sheep furnish an inferior article. It is simply the inner coat or down that is used; the first step being carefully to separate this from the hair. This is then spun by the women, a work which engages a large proportion of the women of Cashmere. The skins are next dyed; and in this art the Cashmerians display much taste and skill in producing beautiful and brilliant tints. The weavers are always men or boys, and we generally found from twenty to fifty crowded into a small room, three or four being engaged at each loom. The warp is extended in the loom as though the wool were to be introduced by a shuttle; but instead of a shuttle, several hundred slim, wooden needles, each wound with a small amount of thread, are employed. With a sort of hieroglyphic pattern before his eye, indicating the color of thread to be used, the weaver passes these in rapid succession, according to the color required, through one or more threads of this warp.

Many of the shawls are woven in separate pieces, and then carefully joined, this being so skillfully done that the seams are scarcely discernible. The time required for weaving a shawl varies, of course, with the pattern, and the fineness of the thread used; usually three or four weavers are engaged upon a single shawl from three months to two years. There are rarer patterns, of course, that embody infinitely more labor than this. The price of the more common shawls varies from four hundred to sixteen hundred rupees ($200 to $800).

"Besides these woven shawls, there is another variety manufactured, called 'worked shawls,' in which the pattern is first impressed upon the prepared cloth, and then the colors wrought in with common needles. Shawls thus embroidered are really prettier than the woven patterns, though not so rich, or, consequently, highly esteemed. Very beautiful shawls of this kind may be purchased for one hundred rupees. The patterns adapted for scarfs, table-spreads, and similar articles, are generally pretty and tasteful. The entire trade is now languishing in Cashmere, since European manufacturers have so successfully imitated all the different products of the Cashmerian looms, which have been so universally and deservedly admired."

AMATEURS AND ARTISANS

Will find in the advertising columns of this number a cut of the "Philadelphia Foot-Lathe," well-known for years as the best-made lathe to be purchased in our market, and to which the Franklin Institute, endorsing its superiority, awarded, at the exhibition of October, 1874, the First Premium—a Silver Medal.

Beside the Lathe represented in the cut, Mr. Bacon makes several sizes and kinds adapted to the wants of amateur, model-maker, gunsmith, jeweller, or in fact any mechanic whose business or pleasure finds need for a Foot-Lathe. And it's just here that we wish to call the attention of gentlemen of leisure, and those having spare moments and constructive talent, to the store of pleasure and usefulness to be found in a Foot-Lathe. With it the fisherman can make his rods and reels; the croquet-player his balls and implements for field or parlor; the boy can build his model steam-engine, turn sleeve-buttons of pearl or ivory for his father, potato-masher and pie-roller for his mother, curling-stick and finger-ring for sister, and napkin-ring or hoop-beater for brother. In fact, the variety of uses to which a boy or man, with a little ingenuity, can turn a Foot-Lathe, is endless, and is worthy the careful attention of every thinking parent who would educate their boys to lives of thrift and usefulness.

In constructing the large costume for a lady of

CAVE AT TRESILLIAN, SOUTH WALES.

A GLIMPSE AT SOUTH WALES.

BY JOHN B. DUFFEY.

DRIVEN from the plains of South Britain, from which they had dispossessed the Gael, the ancient Britons, or Kymry, a Celtic tribe, who had emigrated from the continent in prehistoric times, sought shelter and protection amid the mountain fastnesses of what is now called Wales. Here, at first against the Romans and then against the Anglo-Saxons, they for several centuries maintained a fierce struggle for independence. Though often forced into quiet, the fiery Welshmen as often rushed again to arms, and, sweeping down upon the fruitful isles of which their forefathers had been robbed, they plundered the plunderers, and carried desolation to their firesides.

For many hundred years this contest raged with varying fortune, the Welsh, while under the sway of one prince, managing to keep a firm grasp on their independence. But, in the tenth century, Wales was divided into two principalities—North and South Wales. Soon after this division, Athelstan, King of England, succeeded in forcing the Welsh to acknowledge his feudal supremacy, and to pay an annual tribute to the English crown. Reluctantly continuing this tribute under the succeeding Saxon monarchs, the Welsh, on the accession of William the Conqueror, flatly refused to pay it any longer. Though the Norman tyrant soon reduced them to temporary obedience, they were not long in rising again into rebellion. Thus, alternately submitting and rebelling, always oppressed, but never subdued, the stubborn Welshmen clung tenaciously to their independence, until their final subjugation by Edward I.

presently put to death in the most barbarous manner. Welsh tradition asserts, though I have never seen an acknowledgment of it as a fact by any English historian, that Edward, in order to render his conquest complete, ordered all the bards that fell into the hands of his soldiers to be executed.

However this may be, the independence of Wales expired with David. And when, within a year afterward, the wife of Edward gave birth to a son at Caernarvon Castle, the natives claimed the child as their countryman; and when, at a still later period, this son received the title of Prince of Wales, they "joyfully hailed the event, as if it had proclaimed the restoration of their independence."

It is true, subsequent attempts were made to shake off the English yoke; but none of these were of any importance, with the exception of DRYSLWYN CASTLE, CAERMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES.

At the opening of the contest which ended in that subjugation, Edward had for allies the Prince of South Wales and David, the brother of Llewellyn, prince of the northern division. David, however, seeing that the war was likely to result in the loss of what might at some future time become his own, suddenly turned against the English, joined his brother, who had but recently purchased peace by submission in which he yielded up the best part of his dominions, and North Wales was once more in arms. Sweeping from the hills, on the night of Palm Sunday, 1282, the Welsh for a time drove the English before them. But the tide soon turned. Llewellyn, driven from fastness to fastness, fell by the hands of a private trooper, in a skirmish near Builth, in Brecknockshire. David, who had succeeded Llewellyn, for a short time kept up the unequal contest, but in vain. His little army was soon scattered, and he himself, being made prisoner, was that early in the fifteenth century, under Owen Glendower, who, claiming to be a lineal descendant of Llewellyn, for several years wore the crown of Wales, holding in check, and even disgracefully defeating the armies sent against him by Henry IV. The spirit of Owen, however, at last succumbed under the constant pressure. Compelled to fly to the mountains, he there wandered for a time, and finally, in the disguise of a shepherd, sought safety at the home of a daughter in Herefordshire, where he remained concealed until his death, in 1415, thirteen years after his coronation. Since his time, the Welsh, though still retaining their ancient fiery spirit of independence, have been content to live quietly as subjects of England.

South Wales is divided into six shires, or counties—Brecknock, Caermarthen, Cardigan, Glamorgan, Pembroke and Radnor. It comprises an area of nearly four thousand square miles, with a population, at the present time, of about seven hundred and fifty thousand.

Glamorgan, the third county in area, and the first in point of population, having nearly as many inhabitants as all the rest of South Wales, may very truly be called a country of hills, though its loftiest mountain summits are overtopped by those of most of its neighbors. The only large level tract its surface presents is in the neighborhood of Cardiff. A large proportion of the mountain country is uninclosed, and used as a common for pasturing cattle and sheep. In the bosom of these hills, however, there lies a mineral wealth almost incredible. Of all the coal-fields of the world, not one rises in importance above that of Glamorgan. Its coal-mines, of both bituminous and anthracite, are of vast extent and richness, and near them are immense deposits of iron ore and fire-clay. Thus provided with all the materials necessary, this one closed by two fine piers. Large floating docks have been constructed at this place.

Llandaf, another town in this county, is noted as being the seat of one of the two bishoprics into which South Wales is divided. It is some three miles northwest of Cardiff. It is a mere village, consisting chiefly of cottages arranged in two short streets, which terminate in a square, where there are a number of fine mansions. The situation is on elevated ground, gently sloping on all sides, except towards the river Taaf, where the descent is more precipitous. At the foot of this green declivity stands the cathedral, an imposing edifice, partially embosomed in trees, and with a branch of the river murmuring round the churchyard wall; hence the name "Llan ar Tâf," "the church on the Tâf," contracted into Llandaf. Llandaf has been the see of a bishop from a very early period—from A. D. 430, at least.

county in South Wales manufactures more iron than all the United States. To this mineral wealth Glamorgan owes its rapid increase in population, and its prosperity as a manufacturing district. Besides using up her own iron ore, Glamorgan draws for additional raw material for manufacture upon the tin and copper mines of Cornwall, on the opposite shore of Bristol Channel.

The principal towns of Glamorgan are Merthyr Tydvil, noted for its iron works, some of which are nowhere surpassed for magnitude and importance; Cardiff, the shire town, a seaport of large and increasing trade, near the mouth of the Taaf, here crossed by a fine bridge of five arches; and Swansea, also a seaport, a city of some sixty thousand inhabitants, and which ranks as the first in population and commercial prosperity in all Wales. Its harbor, at the mouth of the river, is nearly in-

The traveller through Glamorgan cannot fail to notice one peculiarity. It has been the custom from very remote antiquity to whitewash the farm-houses, outside as well as in; and even the barns, outhouses and the walls of yards and gardens are covered with this "poor man's paint." In a Welsh poem, written thirteen hundred years ago, we find a reference to this practice in the following couplet:

"In Glamorgan the people are courteous and kind, Married women are honored, and white walls you find."

Another bard, who flourished in 1300, says of Glamorgan:

"This beautiful country the bard doth delight,
With its pleasant wines, and its houses so white."

And in another place he calls upon the sun "of the bright morning" to "beam joyfulness around, and salute the white houses of Glamorgan."

There are in the vicinity of Cardiff, and, in fact, all through this part of Wales, and scattered over a tract of country reaching into the adjoining English counties, numerous remains of the Druidical age, called cromlechs, some of them of great extent, and composed of stones of immense size. The "Buckstone," of which we give an engraving, though found near Monmouth, in the adjacent English shire of that name, may be spoken of in this connection, as illustrating these so-called Druidical remains. The "Buckstone" is one of those singular stones which derive their importance from the fact that though the gentlest touch will set them moving, nothing but an extraordinary application of power can possibly overturn them. Popularly they are known as "rocking-stones," and many such are to be found not only in South Wales, but also in other parts of the world. It may be remarked here, that geologists regard these "rocking-stones" as perfectly natural formations, and as having no connection with the Druids, unless it may have been that their strange peculiarity rendered them objects of veneration or worship to a primitive and superstitious people.

Largest in area, and second in population, of the shires of South Wales, is Caermarthen. It is eminently an agricultural district, having many beautiful and fertile valleys, and comparatively few high mountains. The pride of Caermarthen is the Vale of the Towy, which embraces in its windings of fifteen miles some of the loveliest scenery in the world. Wilder than the famed Valley of the Usk, the boast of a sister shire, its woodland views are, therefore, more romantic. Upon the Towy lies "Grongar Hill," of which the poet Dyer who was born within sight of it, so charmingly sings:

"Grongar, in whose mossy cells,
Sweetly musing, Quiet dwells.

* * * * *
Now I gain the mountain's brow,
What a landscape lies below!

* * * * *
Old castles on the cliff arise,
Proudly towering in the skies!
Rushing from the wood, the spires
Seem from hence ascending fires!
Half his beams Apollo sheds
On the yellow mountain-heads!
Gilds the fleeces of the flocks,
And glitters on the broken rocks!

Below me trees unnumbered rise,—

* * * * *
The gloomy pine, the poplar blue,
The yellow beech, the sable yew,
The slender fir, that taper grows,
The sturdy oak with broad-spread boughs,
And beyond the purple grove.

* * * * *
Gaudy as the opening dawn,
Lies a long and level lawn,
On which a dark hill, steep and high,
Holds and charms the wandering eye!
Deep are his feet in Towy's flood,

His sides are clothed with waving wood,
And ancient towers crown his brow,
And cast an awful look below;
Whose rugged walls the ivy creeps,
And with her arms from falling keeps.

* * * * *
Yet time has seen, that lifts the low,
And level lays the lofty brow,
Has seen this broken pile complete,
Big with the vanity of state;
But transient is the smile of fate!
A little rule, a little sway,
A sunbeam in a winter's day,
Is all the proud and mighty have
Between the cradle and the grave.

And see the rivers how they run,
Thro' woods and meads, in shade and sun,
Sometimes swift, and sometimes slow,
Wave succeeding wave, they go
A various journey to the deep,
Like human life, to endless sleep!
Thus is nature's vesture wrought,
To instruct our wandering thought;
Thus she dresses green and gay,
To disperse our cares away.

Ever charming, ever new,
When will the landscape tire the view!
The fountain's fall, the river's flow,
The woody valleys, warm and low;
The windy summit, wild and high,
Roughly rushing on the sky!
The pleasant seat, the ruin'd tower,
The naked rock, the shady bower;
The town and village, dome and farm,
Each give each a double charm,
As pearls upon an Ethiop's arm.

See on the mountain's southern side,
Where the prospect opens wide,
Where the evening gilds the tide;
How close and small the hedges lie!
What streaks of meadows cross the eye!
A step methinks may pass the stream,
So little distant dangers seem;
So we mistake the future's face,
Eyed through hope's deluding glass;
As yon summits soft and fair,
Clad in colors of the air,
Which, to those who journey near,
Barren, brown and rough appear;
Still we tread the same coarse way;
The present's still a cloudy day.

Oh, may I with myself agree,
And never covet what I see:
Content me with an humble shade,
My passions tamed, my wishes laid;
For, while our wishes wildly roll,
We banish quiet from the soul.

* * * * *
Now, ev'n now, my joys run high,
As on the mountain-turf I lie;
While the wanton zephyr sings,
And in the vale perfumes his wings:
While the waters murmur deep;
While the shepherd charms his sheep;
While the birds unbounded fly,
And with music fill the sky,
Now, even now, my joys run high.

Be full, ye courts! be great who will!
 Search for peace with all your skill!
 Open wide the lofty door,
 Seek her on the marble floor!
 In vain you search, she is not there!
 In vain you search the domes of care!
 Grass and flowers Quiet treads,
 On the meads and mountain-heads, so many remains throughout the country. Across the Towy is "Golden Grove," where Jeremy Taylor wrote his "Great Exemplar," and others of his noblest productions. Near by is "Merlin's Grove," where, according to Spenser,

"The wise Merlin whylome wont, they say,
 To make his wonne, low underneath the ground,

ENTRANCE GATE OF GLAN USK VILLA, CRICKHOWELL (SOUTH WALES.)

Along with Pleasure, close allied,
 Ever by each other's side:
 And often, by the murmuring rill,
 Hears the thrush, while all is still,
 Within the groves of Grongar Hill."

Though Dyer makes no allusion to the fact, from Grongar Hill the eye discovers traces of one of those ancient Roman camps, of which there are

In a deep delve, far from the view of day;
 That of no living wight he mote be found,
 Whenso he counsell'd, with his sprites encompass'd round.

"And if thou ever happen that same way
 To travel, go to see that dreadful place:
 It is an hideous hollow cave, they say,
 Under a rock that lies a little space

From the swift Barry, tumbling down apace
 Amongst the woody hills of Dynevower:
 But dare thou not, I charge, in any case,
 To enter into that same baleful bower,
 For fear the cruel fiends should thee unawares devour.

"But standing high aloft, low lay thine ear,
 And there such ghastly noise of iron chains,
 And brazen cauldrons thou shalt rumbling hear,
 Which thousand sprites, with long-enduring pains,
 Do toss, that it will stun thy feeble brains;
 And oftentimes great groans and grievous sounds,
 When too huge toil and labor them constrains,
 And oftentimes loud strokes and ringing sounds,
 From under that deep rock most horribly rebounds."

The beautiful Vale of the Usk, to which allusion feast, an earthquake swallowed up both them and their lands and houses, leaving the site covered with water. However this may be, popular tradition has it that a populous city once stood where the lake is now—a tradition to which old Camden gives implicit faith.

Brecknock also rejoices in quite a number of striking and romantic waterfalls. The tourist, moreover, will find there a remarkable cavern, into which the river Mellte enters, and through which it pursues its subterranean course for eight or nine hundred yards, before emerging again into the light of day. In the course of its passage through the cavern, the river is precipitated from a considerable height into a deep pool, and the roaring of its waters in this dark abyss adds not a little to the awe which the place inspires. Singularly enough, this cavern has never yet been thoroughly explored.

THE STACK ROCKS, SOUTH WALES.

has already been made, lies in Brecknockshire, mainly an agricultural district, and possessing numberless attractions to the tourist. Here are the largest lake and the highest mountains in all South Wales, to say nothing of its claim, disputed, however, by Caermarthen, to the ownership of the loveliest valley in the world. Its vaunted lake, it must be admitted, we should regard as rather a small pattern of a mill-pond, its greatest length being scarcely two miles, with a width of one mile. An ancient manuscript in the British Museum attributes the formation of this lake to the judgment of Heaven on the descendants, in the ninth generation, of a man who had robbed and murdered a carrier to obtain money with which to set up housekeeping. According to this account, when the whole of the family were assembled at a Brecon, or Brecknock, the capital and chief town of Brecknockshire, is a place of some ten thousand inhabitants. "Few towns," says Sir Richard Hoare, "surpass Brecknock in picturesque beauties. The different mills and bridges on the rivers Usk and Honddu, the ivy-mantled walls and towers of the old castle, the massive embattled turret and gateway of the priory, with its luxuriant groves, added to the magnificent range of mountain scenery, on the southern side of the town, form, in many points of view, the most beautiful, rich and varied outline imaginable."

Passing over Cardigan and Radnor—the latter the smallest and least populous of the counties of South Wales—neither of which presents any points of special interest, we come to Pembroke, which, reaching out into St. George's Channel, forms the westernmost point of Wales.

The coast line of Pembroke is irregular and broken, with many deep indentations and bays. Here the tourist finds the most attractive field for his explorations. Milford Haven, a rising town of some five thousand inhabitants, on a deep basin or inlet running in from the Atlantic, forms one of the very best ports in the British dominions. It has of late years been much improved by the government, and is, no doubt, destined to become a place of the first importance, commercially.

In Pembroke, on a point jutting out into the Atlantic, is St. David's, in its prime, hundreds of years ago, a city of much importance, but now a miserable little village, deriving its sole claim for mention from the fact that it is an episcopal seat, and has a fine Gothic cathedral of undoubted antiquity. St. David's, it is scarcely necessary to say, takes its name from the tutelary saint of Wales. He was the son of a Cardigan prince, whose name, from the fact that it calls for seven words, and those Welsh, I shall forbear to transcribe. His ascetic life, his zeal, his piety, and his alleged miracles, won for him a wide repute; and for centuries his shrine, in the cathedral which bears his name, was the point of interest for countless pilgrims from all parts of Britain.

Of St. David, we are told, that, on one occasion, when about to preach before a synod, against the Pelagian heresy, just then—in 519—appearing for a second time in Wales, he commanded a child which attended him, and had lately been restored to life by him, to spread a napkin under his feet. Standing upon this, he began his sermon. All the while that he was speaking, a snow-white dove, coming down from heaven, sat upon his shoulders. And, moreover, the earth on which he stood raised itself under him, till it became a hill, "from whence his voice, like a trumpet, was clearly heard and understood by all, both far and near." If any doubt this, let them visit the spot, and there to this day they will assuredly find a little hill, with a church built upon it to commemorate this event.

Lying off the coast, near Tenby, on the southern shore of Pembroke, are the famous "Stack Rocks." Long before we reach them, says Hall, we are made aware of our proximity to these rocks by the incessant noise and hum of the birds that occupy them, and when the spot is gained, the scene is one of the most interesting description. We are on the breeding-grounds of various birds, that, time out of mind, have selected this wild and little-frequented place. Here they congregate in vast numbers. From May to September, the two lofty, isolated rocks are the homes of the razor-bill, the waddling guillemot, which gives its name to the rocks, and that foolish creature called the puffin, who possesses the humorous propensity of driving rabbits from their warrens, and hatching in their holes. Every available ledge and cranny of the rocks is covered, and the crests seem one mass of animated nature. Indeed, the taller stack has the appearance of a great unheavened monumental column, covered with alto-relievos alive and in motion. Some are engaged in setting on their one egg, some in paddling it out with their feet to the sun. Here may be seen a red-throated diver on the water, in the act of plunging for his prey; there a gull cradled on a wave, looking about him with the utmost nonchalance; while, on the craggy ledge of some rock, the green cormorant, stretching out his wings to dry, is waiting for his last meal to digest, preparatory to engaging in another.

Not far from the "Stacks," a frightful fissure in the cliff is shown, to which the name of "The Hunter's Leap" has been given. It is not visible till one is on the edge of it. Sea-pinks, heather and furze grow to its very edge. A creeping sensation comes over one, as, looking into the dizzy depths below, he hears the hollow murmuring of the incoming tide. Here it was that a frightened horse, in full career, plunged blindly across, bearing on his back the terrified huntsman, to give a name to the place, and to die with the terror of the recollection of his peril, on his arrival home.

ALONE.

BY PHILA H. CASE.

ON a desolate isle, far out at sea,
I am left alone, 'neath a stormy sky,
Where I watch from the bare rocks, silently,
The beautiful white-winged ships go by.

The waves break over the barren reef,
And toss their foam-capped heads in glee;
But they only mock at my tears and grief,
For they bring no ship, to my isle, for me.

Far out thro' the silent, boding gloom,
I can catch a glimpse of a passing sail,
Yet it nothing rocks of my weary doom,
As it glides away in the freshening gale.
I can see the glimmer of rosy light

In its wake, where the golden sunbeams play,
And the murmuring ripples are soft and bright,
That follow her when she glides away.

Another comes sweeping adown the bay,
With banners afloat in the stirring breeze,
And rapturous music, joyous and gay,
Swells out in the emerald-tinted seas.
'Tis the ship of Hope—the gayest of all—
And her crew are happy as crew can be;
Though I've hailed her oft, with piteous call,
She will never stop at my isle for me.

And the one that glides with such easy grace,
With sails as white as the winter snow—
Leaving a glittering, silvery trace
In the water that flashes across her bow—
Ah! that is the beautiful ship of Love;
And I've called as loud as call I might,
Yet with never a word, like a languid dove,
She floated silently out of sight.

And still on my isle, so bleak and bare,
While the storm comes down on my aching head,
When the mists and surf have drenched my hair,
And my feet on the bare, cold rocks have bled,
Yet, with never the ghost of a joy or a smile,
I sit and gaze far over the sea,
With a lingering hope that, after awhile,
Some white-winged ship will come for me.

FLORENCE.

A VISION of youth and gladness,
 She brightens the dim, old woods,
 And the joy of her laughing spirit
 Is thrilling their solitudes.

O maiden of wondrous beauty !
 Thou child so blooming and fair !
 Of the summer's beautiful roses,
 Not one may with thee compare.

Soon fades the rose's beauty—
 As a dream it passes away—

But thou bloomest brighter and fresher
 In the glow of each new-born day.

O'er the ferns thou trippiest, sinking,
 While the bark of thy playmate rings ;
 And the morning sun around thee
 His golden mantle flings.

Yon thicket thrills with the music
 Of some happy-hearted bird ;
 But, oh ! the song thou singest
 Is the sweetest ever heard !

On thy cheeks with youth-light flushing,
 On thy lips so melting and sweet,
 Of a thousand new-blown roses
 The bloom and the brightness meet.

A golden, enchanting net-work
 Is the sweep of thy sunny hair;
 Thine eyes, in their azure brightness,
 Are of shining stars a pair.

'Round thy lips, in youthful gladness,
 The gay jests merrily dart;
 Yet, brightest of all thy beauties,
 Is thy fresh and child-like heart.

poet a small but well selected collection of books. These seem to have excited a thirst for knowledge in the boy, and, during the moments that he snatched from his work in the iron-foundry where he was employed, he speedily made himself master of their contents. His ambition thus excited, he gave himself up to the cultivation of literature by means of private study. A copy of Thomson's "Seasons," which came into his possession, inspired him with the desire to become a poet. That intense love of nature, which is the marked characteristic of every true poetic mind, he already possessed. How earnestly he must have pursued his studies, we may infer from the fact that in less

EBENEZER ELLIOTT,
 THE "CORN-LAW RHYMER."

BY J. B. D.

EBBENEZER ELLIOTT, the "Corn-Law Rhymers," as he has been popularly styled, was born at Masborough, near Sheffield, England, in 1781. His parentage was humble, his father occupying a subordinate clerkship in the iron-works at Rotherham. His early education is said to have been neglected, because he was thought too dull a boy to profit by instruction. When he was about fifteen, however, a clergyman, a friend of the family, bequeathed to the father of the future than two years from this time, when he was just turned of seventeen, young Elliott published his first book, "The Vernal Walk," a poem by which his love of nature and his familiarity with "The Seasons" are strikingly shown. It also indicates by its charming descriptions, so evidently drawn from the life, how deeply the scenery of his native district had been impressed upon his mind.

"The Vernal Walk" was soon after followed by another poem entitled "Night." Neither of these pieces appears to have met with much success; nor did the public seem to appreciate the volume of poems with which the indefatigable young "rhymers" speedily ventured a third time before the world. Elliott was now ready to give up; but Southey, with whom he had become acquainted, encouraged him to go on. "There is power in the least of these tales," said the older bard; "but the higher you pitch your tones, the better you succeed. Thirty years ago, they would have made your reputation; thirty years hence, the world will wonder that they did not do so."

Southey, however, seems, in this matter, to have failed as a prophet; for the poems upon which he laid such stress are now seldom read, and, though not without merit, most certainly are no cause of wonder as not having made the reputation of their author. And had not Elliott, whose limited education, combined with a rugged, though sympathetic, nature, hardly qualified him for successfully treating such gentle themes as he had so far attempted, been led by a great public event to turn his poetic talents into another channel, it is probable the world would have forgotten him long since.

The event to which I refer, was the agitation for the repeal of the corn-laws. This agitation was seriously begun, for the last time, by the formation, in 1841, of what was called the Anti-Corn-Law League. In the discussion of the questions to which it gave rise, the disclosures made of the appalling hardships of the working people, produced by the cruel import laid upon the necessities of life, stirred Elliott's rugged, but noble and kindly nature to its very depths, aroused his most earnest sympathies, and furnished him with topics calculated to call out all the resources of his vigorous and fiery intellect. The abolition of the Corn Laws now became the one great thought of his life. His celebrated "Corn-Law Rhymes" were the result. "They had the ring of the anvil in them." Their peculiar merits received immediate recognition. The generous and manly sympathy they expressed for the oppressed toilers of his country, won for their author the appellation, which he justly deserved, of "The Poet of the People." Nor is it too extravagant to say of them, that they were quite as instrumental, especially in the manufacturing districts, in fanning the excitement, and in stirring up those almost revolutionary outbreaks, which finally led to the repeal of the obnoxious laws, as was the combined eloquence of all the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

Besides being a poet, Elliott was, fortunately, a man of business, industrious, energetic and prudent. He had a happy talent of combining trade with literature. He did not deem it necessary that one should be idle in order to be a genius. Rising steadily in his employment, he realized, long enough before his death to be able to enjoy the fruits of it, a handsome competence as a steel refiner and iron merchant. He died, at his residence, near Barnsley, in 1849, having almost reached the scriptural limit of life—threescore and ten.

The last edition of his poems, over which he exercised personal supervision, appeared in one volume, in 1846. An edition, with a life and introduction by Griswold, was published in New York some twenty years ago—in 1850, I believe.

Speaking of Elliott's poetry, a distinguished

American critic remarks: "The inspiration of his verse is a fiery hatred of injustice. Without much creative power, he almost places himself beside men of genius, by the singular intensity and might of his sensibility. He understands the art of condensing passion. The great ambition of Elliott is to thunder. He is a brawny man, of nature's own make, with more than the usual portion of the old Adam stirring within him, and he says, 'I do well to be angry.' The mere sight of tyranny, bigotry, meanmess, prompts his smiting invective. His poetry would hardly have been written by a man who was not physically strong. You can hear the ring of his anvil, and see the sparks fly off from the furnace, as you read his verse."

In Elliott's "Poet's Epitaph," the subject of which is Burns, he seems to me to have pictured very happily the characteristics of his own nature. At all events, it is one of his pleasantest pieces, though not, perhaps, a fair sample of his power as a "rhymers." I give it, and a chatty little bit of description, entitled "Spring," together with a third piece, in a somewhat different vein, which last I have selected, not merely as affording a just idea of the general style and reflective habits of the author, but because it conveys a pleasant and well-deserved tribute to the labors of one whose genius has conferred so much honor upon our country.

A POET'S EPITAPH.

Stop, mortal! Here thy brother lies,—
The poet of the poor,
His books were rivers, woods and skies,
The meadow and the moor;
His teachers were the torn heart's wail,
The tyrant, and the slave,
The street, the factory, the jail,
The palace,—and the grave!
Sin met thy brother everywhere!
And is thy brother blamed?
From passion, danger, doubt and care,
He no exemption claimed.

The meanest thing, earth's feeblest worm,
He feared to scorn or hate;
But, honoring in a peasant's form,
The equal of the great,
He blessed the steward whose wealth makes —The poor man's little more;
Yet loathed the haughty wretch that takes
From plundered labor's store.
A hand to do, a head to plan,
A heart to feel and dare,—
Tell man's worst foes, here lies the man
Who drew them as they are.

SPRING.

Again the violet of our early days
Drinks beauteous azure from the golden sun,
And kindles into fragrance at his blaze;
The streams rejoice that winter's work is done,
Talk of to-morrow's cowslips as they run.
Wild apple, thou art blushing into bloom!
Thy leaves are coming, snowy-blossomed thorn!
Wake, buried lily! Spirit, quit thy tomb!

And thou, shade-loving hyacinth, be born!
 Then haste, sweet rose! sweet woodbine hymn
 the morn,
 Whose dew-drops shall illumine with pearly light
 Each grassy blade that thick-embattled stands
 From sea to sea, while daisies infinite,
 Uplift in praise their little glowing hands,
 O'er every hill that under heaven expands.

ON SEEING AUDUBON'S "BIRDS OF AMERICA."

"Painting is silent music." So said one Whose prose is sweetest painting. Audubon!
 Thou Raphael of great Nature's woods and seas!
 Thy living forms and hues, thy plants, thy trees,
 Bring deathless music from the houseless waste—
 The immortality of truth and taste.
 Thou givest bright accents to the voiceless sod;
 And all thy pictures are mute hymns to God.
 Why hast thou power to bear the untraveled soul
 Through farthest wilds, o'er ocean's stormy roll,
 And to the prisoner of disease bring home
 The homeless birds of ocean's roaring foam,
 But that thy skill might bid the desert sing
 The sun-bright plumage of the Almighty's wing?
 With his own hues thy splendid lyre is strung;
 For genius speaks the universal tongue.
 "Come," cries the bigot, black with pride and wine—

"Come and hear me—the word of God is mine!"
 "But I," saith He, who paves with suns His car,
 And makes the storms His coursers from afar,
 And, with a glance of His all-dazzling eye,
 Smites into crashing fire the boundless sky—
 "I speak in this swift sea-bird's speaking eyes,
 These passion-shivered plumes, these lucid dyes;
 This beauty is my language! in this breeze
 I whisper love to forests and the seas;
 I speak in this lone flower—this dewdrop cold—
 That hornet's sting—yon serpent's neck of gold:
 These are my accents. Hear them! and behold
 How well my prophet-spoken truth agrees
 With the dread truth and mystery of these Sad, beauteous, grand, love-warbled mysteries!"
 Yes, Audubon! and men shall read in thee
 His language, written for eternity;
 And if, immortal in its thoughts, the soul
 Shall live in Heaven, and spurn the tomb's control,
 Angels shall re-transcribe, with pens of fire,
 Thy forms of nature's terror, love and ire,
 Thy copied words of God—when death-struck suns expire.

BOOKS AND LIBRARIES.

BY ELLEN BERTHA BRADLEY.

IN these days of books, magazines and newspapers, it is hard for us to form any idea of ages that were bookless. Yet it is but a few centuries since a single volume was a luxury to be afforded by only a very few. In the year 1300, the library of Oxford consisted of "a few tracts kept in chests," and that of Louis IX. of France contained the works of but four classical writers. In 1364, the French royal library was increased to twenty volumes. Soon after the number was raised to nine hundred, and in the middle of the next century it was purchased by the Duke of Bedford and carried to London. Twenty years before the discovery of America, Louis XI. wishing to borrow a manuscript from the library of the Faculty of Paris, was forced to sell a portion of his plate in order to deposit one hundred crowns of gold as security for its safe return. "A student of Paris, who was reduced, raised a new fortune by leaving in pawn a manuscript of a body of law, and a grammarian who was ruined by a fire rebuilt his house with two small volumes of Cicero." Fifty years later a collection of two thousand manuscripts, owned by a German abbot, was considered so wonderful that princes and learned men made long journeys to see it.

Wonderful stories are, however, told of the libraries of the ancients. The first one mentioned in history is said to have been formed by the Egyptian King Osymandyas. Little is known of it excepting the inscription "Storehouse of Medicine for the Mind," but that alone says much for the wisdom of the founder, for ages of ignorance have always been ages of barbarism. The Alexandrian Library was by far the most famous ancient collection of books. While in the hands of its first manager it reached the size of fifty thousand volumes, and, according to some authorities, at the time of its greatest prosperity it contained four hundred thousand, and according to others, seven hundred thousand books, embracing the literature of Rome, Greece, India and Egypt. When Alexandria was besieged by Julius Cæsar, a portion of the collection was burned, but was afterward replaced from the rival library of Pergamos, which was sent by Marc Anthony as a present to Cleopatra. In the fourth century a large portion was sacrificed at the general destruction of heathen temples by a mob of ignorant, fanatical Christians, and the work was completed at the taking of the city by the Calif Omar, three hundred years later. Thus was wantonly destroyed the noblest collection of books then in existence. No estimate can be formed of what the world has lost by such acts of careless or wilful destruction.

Until within a short period, conquerors have wrecked their vengeance not less upon the treasures of art and literature belonging to their victims than upon their persons. The Persians destroyed the books of the Phœnicians and the Egyptians. The conquerors of Ireland annihilated the ancient records, and those of Mexico burned works which we would pay any price to recover. As late as the days of Cromwell, it was proposed in the British Parliament that all the records in the Tower should be destroyed and the history of the nation begin from that date. The project was defeated by a speech from Sir Matthew Hale.

Religious zeal has been, if possible, more vindictive than political. It is said that the final destruction of the Alexandrian Library was ordered by the Caliph Omar on the ground that as the Koran contained the sum of all wisdom, his followers needed no other book. Whether this story be true or not, it is known that most of the Persian literature perished by such an edict issued by one of his faith. Nor has such mistaken zeal been confined to the followers of Mahomet. "The Romans burnt the books of the Jews, of the Christians and of the Philosophers; the Jews burnt the books of the Christians and the Pagans, and the Christians burnt the books of the Pagans and the Jews." The most valuable ancient works were effaced by the monks of the Middle Ages, that they might use the parchment for the trivial records of the monasteries and the lives of the saints. The library of the Palatine Apollo, a treasure collected by a succession of emperors, was burned by the order of Pope Gregory VII., to prevent the monks studying anything but the Holy Scriptures. At the time of the Reformation, the fact that a book had red letters on the title-page, insured its condemnation by the Reformers, and the Puritans never allowed anything to escape them which they suspected of being popish.

From these records of destruction it is a pleasure to turn to accounts of modern libraries. Almost every country in Europe has, at least, one noble collection of books, Germany, France and England taking the lead. In the United States we have none that can vie with those of these older nations, but, probably, no people were ever so well supplied with good reading. Almost every village has its little circulating library, and in our great cities they are growing to enormous proportions.

Perhaps, in selecting one great library to describe, we cannot do better than to take that of the British Museum. The reading-room alone was erected by order of Parliament, between the years 1854 and 1857, at an expense of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds. It is principally of iron, strength, economy of space and safety from fire being the three chief requisites. The dome is but two feet smaller than that of the Pantheon at Rome, but while the piers that support that occupy nearly seven thousand five hundred feet, the iron columns of the Museum fill only two hundred. The book-shelves in the library are of iron, as are their supports, and everywhere, except against the outside walls, they are deep enough to hold two rows of books, which are separated by an iron lattice. All the partitions are formed of these double rows of books. They will hold one million volumes, and if stretched out in a single shelf would extend twenty-five miles. This is the library itself. The reading-room, which is directly under the dome, has accommodations for eighty thousand volumes more, and for three hundred persons. Each person has a sort of stall four feet and three inches long, and fitted up with two shelves, one for writing and one for books, and he is supplied with pen and ink. To insure his comfort, one part of the iron framework is contrived to bring him fresh air, and the other contains hot-water pipes, by which the temperature may be regulated. One drawback there is, indeed—the library cannot be used in the evening, for under no circumstances may a light be carried into it. Nor is it free in any such sense as the Astor and Peabody libraries. Certain formalities must be gone through with in order to obtain admittance. Application must be made in writing to the principal librarian, accompanied by a description of person and residence, and a written recommendation. The librarian may then, if he pleases, grant a ticket of admission for not more than six months, or he may refer the applicant to the trustees.

The department of printed books is the largest in the Museum. The keeper has thirty-one assistants, and there are also employed sixteen transcribers and sixty-two attendants. In 1860, the library contained seven hundred thousand printed volumes, aside from all manuscripts, maps, charts, etc., and as the rate of increase is about twenty thousand a year, the number must now have reached one million.

This magnificent collection was founded in the middle of the last century, by Sir Hans Sloane, who ordered that, at his death, his library of fifty thousand volumes should be offered to the government for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, about a quarter of its value, to be used as the foundation of a public library. The offer was accepted, and George II. soon added the library which had been gathered by the kings of England since the days of Henry VIII., and which included some very valuable private collections. He also transferred to the library of the British Museum the privilege which had belonged to the royal collection of receiving free a copy of every work published in the empire—a right which is now shared by several other libraries. Since then it has been the fashion to make donations to the British Museum, and to its shelves have been transferred many splendid private collections, among which may be mentioned Dr. Bentley's classical and Dr. Burney's musical libraries, and the general collection made by George III., which was valued at two hundred thousand pounds, and was probably the finest ever made by one person. Besides all gifts from private persons to the library, the public expenses of keeping up the institution and purchasing additions, amounted to a million and a half pounds in the first century.

The value of a donation cannot be inferred from its size, a rare old manuscript being often more prized than the most magnificent modern publication. The price which will sometimes be paid for an old book is almost incredible. The highest exhibition of book madness which we have had yet, took place at the late sale of the Perkins collection, near London. Seven hundred and sixteen pounds were paid for a copy of Shakspeare; but the principal attraction was two copies of the Mazarin Bible, so called because they were discovered in the library of Cardinal Mazarin. They enjoyed the double distinction of being, probably, the first printed copies of the Latin Bible, and the first books struck off on Gutenberg's metal types. One was on paper and the other on vellum. The first brought the sum of two thousand six hundred and ninety pounds, and the second that of three thousand four hundred pounds, nearly double the amount that was ever paid for a printed book before. We can but wonder what will be the next exhibition of Bibliomania.

Honor and riches are the two wheels upon which the whole world is moved; these are the two springs of our discontent.

THE ISLE OF PHILÆ.

BY E. J. N. SAMMLER.

THOUGH only about four hundred yards in length by one hundred and thirty in width, the little island of Philæ makes a considerable figure, especially in the eyes of the antiquary, as containing some of the finest Egyptian remains to be found anywhere. It lies in the Nile, just above the first cataract, in Upper Egypt, and not far from the Nubian border. The City of Philæ is said to owe its existence to the Ptolemies, who designed it as a friendly meeting place and a common emporium for the Egyptians and the Ethiopians. Hence, according to some, the name of the place, Philai, from Philos, "a friend." Other authorities, however, derive the name from the Arabic Phil, "an elephant," thus making the name identical with Elephantina. By others still, ractors on the faces of the ancient buildings which the Egyptians had erected; but those Greek inscriptions are themselves intersected, and in many parts destroyed, by figures cut upon them, in the true Egyptian style, thus proving that the native people retained their peculiar style of art under the dominion of the Greek kings and the Roman emperors.

There is a curious effect of light and shade produced by the position of the remains of Philæ near the Tropic of Cancer. As the sun approaches his northern limit and rises higher in the heavens, the shadows from the bold projecting cornices and mouldings sink lower and lower on the broad surface of the walls, till at last, when the sun has obtained his greatest elevation, the vertical walls remain in deep shade, forming a striking contrast with the blazing brightness that is cast over every surrounding object.

it is maintained that the name is from the Egyptian Phi lakh, "the end," or "extremity"—that is, of Egypt.

In the immediate vicinity of Philæ was a small, rocky island, called Abastos by the Greeks, from the circumstance of its being permitted the priests alone to set foot on it, and its house being inaccessible to others. Here was the tomb of Oriris, Isis having there deposited his remains. The modern name of Philæ is Gesirat-el-Birbe, or "Temple Island," in allusion to the remains of antiquity upon it.

As has already been said, Philæ is one of the richest spots of Egypt in architectural beauty. It is also one of the most instructive as to the evidence of buildings being raised in the real and the mixed Egyptian style at a period long after the race of native monarchs had ceased to rule. On the propyla of the great temple on this island there are some Greek inscriptions. At first we should be disposed to say that the Greeks cut these cha-

BURROWING BEES.

BY JOHN H. CLARK.

THE apidæ or bee family contains some of the most interesting, and one of the most useful of all insects. The different species are very numerous, and they are widely distributed over all parts of the earth.

There is one group of insects belonging to this family which has received the popular name of Pith-Boring Bees, on account of the habits of its members, which make their nests in tunnels which they burrow in the pith of various plants.

There are many species of pith-boring bees; and they all construct very curious nests, which, of course, differ according to the species of bee that makes them. There is one species which makes a very beautiful nest, consisting of a series of cells placed one above another, in the hollow stem or stalk of some plant. The manner in which it constructs its nest is very interesting.

After searching about until it has found a stalk suited to its purposes, i. e., one that has the top either broken or cut off, it sets to work excavating the pith, and works away until it has made a tunnel some inches in depth. It then changes its employment, and flies off in search of honey and pollen, which are to be the food of its future offspring. After having deposited a small quantity of this substance in the bottom of the tunnel, it lays thereon an egg, and then proceeds to construct above it a ceiling, which will also serve as the floor to another cell. The ceiling is about an eighth of an inch in thickness, and is composed of the fine particles of pith which it has removed from the stalk. These particles it presses firmly together, forming with them a ceiling or partition so solid that it may easily be removed from its place without injuring it in the least. The pith is, probably, given this great adhesive power by some fluid secreted by the bee. After having completed the first ceiling, it starts off after more pollen and honey, and proceeds to construct another cell in the same manner. And so it continues until it has formed a series of cells, some eight or nine in number.

The ceilings are double-concave, that is, both sides of them are concave. And they are placed from one-fourth to three-eighths of an inch apart, thus forming an oblong cylindrical cell with convex ends.

In such a nest, the females always occupy the lower cells, while the upper ones contain the males. "The bees," writes Mr. F. Smith, "which arrive at their perfect condition, or rather those which are first anxious to escape into day, are two or three in the upper cells—these are males; the females are usually ten or twelve days later."

Here we see manifested one of those wise provisions of nature by which God preserves all His creatures. If the order of nature was reversed, and those insects in the lower cells came first to their maturity, they could by no means escape, and would, in all probability, perish of starvation before they could reach the open air. But this difficulty, we see, is guarded against in the manner before stated; those in the upper cells escaping first, thus leaving an open passage-way for those lower down in the tunnel.

There is another group of burrowing bees named Leaf-Cutters. One species of this group, the Rose-Cutter Bee, also constructs its nest in a tunnel which it burrows in some branch or other wood. It seems, however, to prefer the real wood, to pith; and generally makes its tunnel in some old decaying post or tree. And, instead of making partitions in the tunnel, and thus forming its cells, it takes altogether a different method, and constructs them of semicircular pieces which it cuts from rose-leaves. These pieces it bends into a curved form, and then presses them, one after another, into the tunnel, fitting them into each other in such a manner that they form a small thimble-shaped cell, in which it deposits an egg together with some bee-bread, a substance which is composed of pollen mixed with honey. It then proceeds to make another cell in the same way, and sometimes continues until it has formed a series some two inches in length.

Some species of burrowing bees make their nests in the ground; others in the mortar of old walls, and there is one large species, the Carpenter Bee, which makes a truly wonderful nest in a tube or tunnel which it bores in an old tree or post. It makes its cells by partitions in the tunnel, as does the Pith-Boring Bee, before mentioned, but its nest displays much more skill and beauty than does that of the Pith-Boring Bee.

Some species of burrowing bees, although they will dig industriously, when obliged to do so, are very apt to save themselves that trouble if possible, and make their nests in some hollow already existing. Nail or auger holes in old fences and out-houses may often be found to contain such nests, and so may the projecting straws of a straw-covered roof, and all other such places which afford the bees a suitable burrow in which to build them.

FIFTY YEARS AGO; OR, THE CABINS OF THE WEST.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

No. 5.

"All the fragrant air

Was tremulous with the sweet joy of life.

The thrilling of bird-music and the hum

Of honey-bees among the dewy flowers

Was woven through the sunny atmosphere,

Like the rich warp and woof of some fine web."

Rusha Punderson never read a line of poetry in her life, except what she read in her little camp-meeting hymn-book, but she felt the spirit of this as she stood that May morning leaning upon the bars, her sleeves rolled up above her elbows, and her hair pushed back from her sunburnt forehead. Adam, her husband, was coming down the path and she was waiting for him.

When he drew near she said, "Well?" in a questioning, waiting way, and he, knowing what she meant answered: "Yes, sure 'nough, there is a family over on sixteen, come from ole Virginny, man an' wife and two young 'uns, an' I reckon they're 'bout as poor as the law 'lows. Better go over an' see 'em soon 's you can; maybe they might be a wantin' somethin'; anyhow we must show fellar feelin' for human critters livin' in the woods. We know how it went two year ago," and the man, Adam, stooped down and tucked the rag into the toe of his dilapidated old shoe. "Cur'us that this 'fernal rag will come creepin' out in that pesky hole every time I set my foot in motion like; might jus' as well go clean barefoot an' done with, only fur the thorns, an' snags, and pesky snakes 'festin' the path."

"Well, I 'low I could go to-morrow 'f you can spare Jack fur me to ride," said she, drawing her brows in a thoughtful way, as though she were making calculations.

The next morning early, Jack stood at the bars with a little, old, worn, man's saddle on, fastened with a strip of home-made linen girth, and a bridle that had seen palmier days. It was a little matter whether he had on a saddle or not, for this free, strong, brave, natural woman of fifty-five years ago could ride as well without a saddle as with one. Jack had not time to stand and gnaw the post or try to touch his white nose to the green sprouts that marked the places of last year's growing saplings, for Rusha had made a pot of mush and placed it in a warm corner for dinner, and the tin cups and clumsy pewter spoons stood in a row on the shelf against the wall, and the children had received their orders about good behavior, and this bustling, active woman was ready to start.

She wore a new linen gown of her own spinning and weaving, and thread stockings of her own making, and though she was plainly and coarsely clad, hers was a face that one would look upon, and turn and look at again and again. Her eyes were bright and dark, and her hair black and abundant, and her face, though tanned from outdoor exposure, was rosy and indicative of good health. Her little ones stood and watched her as she started on her first visit to the new family.

The dear woman! how cleverly she mounted the waiting horse! She threw the bridle over his neck, and sprang on his back from the ground like a nimble boy. Her children thought the spring was graceful, and the two little boys looked on admiringly, and something like a touch of electricity tingled in their veins, and made them shout with joy as the steed galloped along the path that terminated in the old Postage road, the only laid-out and made road in the country.

It was about four miles the nearest way across the wilderness to the new home of the new neighbors from "ole Virginny."

Rusha's eyes were very bright during that wild-wood ride, for the trees were blazed not more than half the way, and the other half she had to be guided by, perhaps, instinct.

A blazed tree meant a tree from which a patch of the bark, say the size of a man's hand, or larger, had been cut off by a glancing blow or two of an axe.

Sometimes she had to stop and think, or, as she said, "calkilate," so as to be sure of the right points of the compass. But her intimate years in the trackless woods had taught her many things. It was not long until she heard the ringing strokes of an axe, and then she emerged into a small clearing, in the centre of which stood a rude cabin, from whose wide-mouthed mud chimney the blue smoke curled gracefully. She rode up to the open door and sprang off the horse, and threw the bridle over his neck. Then stepping inside the doorway, she dropped a civil courtesy, at the same time waving both widely-spread hands with a motion that was intended to be very graceful.

A small, sad-faced woman sat on a low bench nursing her baby. She covered her bosom, and looked up in a startled, scared way.

"I'm Mis Punderson," said Rusha, dropping another courtesy; "an' I come over to see you, an' bid you welcome to this part of the country. What might your name be?"

The little newcomer rose and gathered the big baby up into a heap, and extending her hand with a cordial grasp, and a laugh that made her mouth open its very widest, said: "My name is Morgan;

we come from ole Virginny; an' I's beginning to get homesick to see a woman's face; an' I thank the Lord that you've come to see me, Mis—Mis—" and here she hesitated, blushing rosy red.

"Punderson," suggested Rusha, with another waving of outspread hands.

"O Sister Punderson, I'm so glad to see a woman's face!" said the homesick little wife, and she clutched Rusha round the neck and kissed her with fervor.

Then Rusha took the handkerchief off her head and smoothed back her wavy black hair, and in the kindness of her heart said: "I'm not used to being empty-handed; let me take the child and rest your little arms."

"What's your first name, Mis Morgan?" said Rusha, trotting the baby in a jolly way on her knees.

"Becky," was the reply. "An' as we're to be nigh neighbors like, I'd rather you'd call me Becky."

"An' you call me Rusha," was the answer.

And henceforth those two women called each other by their first names. In less than half an hour they knew each other's ages, how long they had been married, how many children they had, and their names, and ages, and all about their husbands, and their prospects, and how much linen they had made, and how much sugar the Pundersons had made since they came to the new country, how much wild honey they had gathered, how they tracked the bees to their hidden stores, and how many Methodists there were in the new country, and all those things that women of now-a-days would hardly tell to their sisters.

It was not long until Mr. Morgan came to the cabin, and his wife introduced him as "my Moses."

Moses sat a little while, and then said he would put Mis Punderson's critter in the stable. The stable was a large stump, to which he hitched Jack. His own horse was hitched on the other side. Poles laid into forks that were driven into the ground made stalls.

Afterwhile they had dinner. The table was a rude, split-out piece of puncheon, fastened on heavy pins that were driven into the log-wall. They had real tea to drink—the women had—"store tea," they called it, that came all the way from ole Virginny; and they had little "board-cake," a corn-cake mixed up with warm water and salt, and spread on a clean shingle, and baked before the fire until it was brown; then a knife was slipped under it and it was slid off the shingle and turned over and baked on the other side. When baked quickly, this is a delicious corn-cake. Then they had stewed plums, and maple sugar melted into syrup, and butter, and pickles, and dried venison, and stewed wild cherries.

Rusha did not quite like the new neighbor, Moses; he had "read right smart," he informed her, and he behaved as though he thought he was superior to the common folks in the new country. Rusha may have been mistaken, but this was her first impression of the new neighbor from ole Virginny.

After dinner, Rusha made Becky sit down and rest, and let her wash the dishes. Then she slyly slipped a little parcel out of her pocket and tossed it into the lap of her new-found friend, saying: "Don't amount to much, but it shows good will an' good fellowship."

It was a yard of home-spun linen, small check, copperas and white, and meant to make an apron.

Before Rusha started home in the afternoon, she had told Becky how to find the way to their cabin—because the visit was to be returned in less than a week—told her what direction to go; what thicket to avoid; where she would cross Goudy's Run; which way to turn to leave the great wind-fall to the left; where she would strike the route marked by the blazed trees; where she would go 'long side of the Indian trail, and when to hallo, so that she could answer her and come out to meet her.

Moses wrinkled up his nose, and said he'd bet a wolf's scalp that she'd get bewildered, and go round and round, and not know her own head from a ramrod; but the women looked at each other, as much as to say: "Only a man talking!"

Jack was led up to a stump, and Rusha mounted and started homeward through the woods.

And now I want to tell a pretty sight that Rusha saw on that wildwood ride. She told me of it herself, fifty-eight years after it happened.

She said: "I'll never forgit the fust time I saw yer Uncle John an' yer Aunt Betsey. I was on my way home from my fust visit to Becky Morgan's, an' I stopt ole Jack while I'd watch a singularly beautiful bird that had 'lighted on a low sarviceberry limb. It flirited this way an' that, an' it glittered till it e'enamost hurt my eyes. It was the brightest o' green, an' black, an' red; all glossy, an' sparklin', an' shinin'. Well, while I's bendin' so's to ketch a good view o' the glowin' bird, I heard the sweetest kind o' singin'. At first I was terrified, an' thought it was the angels o' Heaven away in that solum place; but it cum nigher an' nigher, an' I begun to hear a russlin' an' a husslin' o' the de'd leaves, and the singin' closter and closter, an' I kep' Jack still in behind some tangled shrubbery, an' purty soon they cum in sight. There must 'a' been fifteen or twenty of 'em—the Methodys comin' home from a camp-meetin' that had jus' broke up that day. The path was narrer, and they hed to go it single file, two on one horse. Yer Uncle John an' Aunt Betsey rode before; they were young then, had been married about a year or so, an' they were both so handsome. She rode behind him, an' was in her bare head; her hair was a light bright brown, and was in curls. Oh, but she was pretty! Indeed, they all looked so beautiful, an' they were all singing in reg'lar Methody style, at the top of their voices, but yer aunt was leadin'. I remember the stirrin' old hymn well:

"What is this that casts you down?

What is this that grieves you?

Speak an' let the wust be known;

Speakin' may relieve you."

"Raly, I felt mean, an' little, an' wicked, a-sneakin' down there quietly on Jack's neck like a pore dispondin' sinner, an' they all looked so happy and purty an' as if their faces were ann'inted with the ile o' gladness an' forgiveness. Oh, I felt as if I'd give anything to have the religion that they had; but, thank the Lord, me an' Adam had not long to wait—the blessin' was stored away jus' waitin' our 'ceptance. I mind when yer aunt led out with the line, 'Speakin' may relieve you,' I could have cried out as though I had twenty voices; my heart was full to bustin'."

Moses agreed to stay in the house and take care of the children the day his wife made her first visit to Rusha. She started early in the morning, and the last words her husband said were: "Now, if you get lost and bewildered and come back home, I won't let you try it the second time; and if you get so lost that you never find your way home, who shall I marry?"

She laughingly replied: "Don't marry too soon; but, Moses, if I should get lost, what will I do?"

He took the horse by the bridle and turned its head as though he intended leading it back to the impromptu stable, but she climbed on a stump and signified her readiness to go.

It was a beautiful morning, and it was the first time she had been out in the woods alone and unincumbered, and, as Moses predicted, she did become bewildered, and rode on, and on, but came not to the thicket, nor the run, nor the trail, but to a cabin, standing in a small clearing. She rode up to it to inquire where the Punderson's lived. She hailed, and a man came out; his countenance seemed familiar, but she could not tell where she had ever seen his face before. When she inquired where the Punderson's lived, he stared at her and broke into a loud laugh. She was at her own home, and the man with the strangely-familiar face was her own husband, Moses Morgan!

"Why, come in," he said; "dismount, you'll never find the way there; you are a great booby and not fit to go outside the house!"

That touched her; she struck the horse a stinging cut across the neck, and was soon out of the sight of the man who had called her a booby. She remembered the route as Rusha had told her, she kept saying it over to herself and watching the points in the course of the four miles' journey.

Astonishing! she rode, and rode, and came in sight of a cabin and a clearing, and again it was her own home. She hurried away lest her husband should see her and make her give up the attempt altogether. "He called me a booby," she said, and she shut her teeth, and her eyes sparkled, and she galloped down the path that led across the trail.

Oh, the beauty of the dense wildwood in those early days! But Becky Morgan had no time to note the tall oaks, the monster grape vines, the beds of plushy moss, the thickets a-quiver with bird-songs or the green aisles that seemed to reach away off and terminate in vast chambers over-arched with giant branches, outreaching and magnificent. Her quick eye was looking for the brook, and the thicket, and the blazed trees. At length she came upon a straggling little path, and she saw blazed trees to the right and the left, but she knew not in which direction to turn. She halted, and stared around her, and sighed. "He called me a booby," she said, bitterly, and then she remembered that Rusha had told her to hallo, and she would reply.

And the ringing voice went out upon the wide forest in a long, loud "Rusha! Rusha!" She listened. Only the echoes came back to her in a mournfully prolonged "R-u-s-h-a." "He called me a booby," she thought, and again she called the name of her new neighbor. She listened, and an answer came back to her from, oh, so far away, that it seemed to come from over the sea! It took its rise in a wonderful pair of lungs, that long, loud "hoo-hoo!" did, and it stopped not with one answering call, it was repeated again and again, and all she had to do was to ride in the direction of the stentorian voice that rang like a bugle. Rusha and her children met her on the way. They were as glad to see her as though they were old friends. The children called her Aunt Becky, and she dismounted and let the little boys and their sister ride the rest of the way.

How the women did visit! how fast they talked and how fast they became acquainted.

The Pundersons had no clock, but Rusha could tell by the sunshine on the puncheon floor the hour of the day. If the day were cloudy then they had no time. She knew when to begin to get the dinner ready; when the sun shone in at the door and reached the fourth crack in the floor.

She got a good dinner that day. They had rye coffee, and white flour biscuit—not very white, but as good as could be had in the new country—potatoes, honey, and butter, and dried venison, and custard, and curd cheese, and plum pie, and preserved cherries and grapes.

They had no teaspoons, and they had to eat their custard and preserves with a knife and fork. Rusha had only one kettle, but she boiled water enough in it to make the coffee and cook the potatoes at one time, and then she hurried and had the biscuit ready to bake just as soon as the potatoes were done. The same kettle was used to make mush in, bake loaves of raised corn-bread, hull corn, preserve fruit and berries, and when small washings were done the clothes were boiled in it. It is wonderful how the ingenuity of woman can contrive when compelled by necessitous circumstances.

Becky wore her new linen apron that day, and that she might show "good will," likewise, she brought Rusha a piece of red ribbon to put on her best lace cap.

In the afternoon Rusha showed her new neighbor the way home in a way so positive and sure that Becky was never lost again. They both rode the same horse, and Rusha went with her until she was in sight of her own cabin.

I said to Rusha: "Were you always good friends with your old-time neighbor?"

"Well, 'yes, ruther; but a kind of a coldness come in a-tween us in three or four years after; but then 'twasn't her fault."

Dear Rusha! she was like good old Jenks with his Jane Whittlesey.

"Tell me about it," I said; "I am interested in knowing just how much the women of fifty and sixty years ago were like our women of the present day."

VOL. XLIII.—22.

"Well, 'twasn't her fault. You see we were all members of the Methody church together at this time, an' somehow talk got out that Sister Becky Morgan wasn't satisfied. Anyhow, she'd quit comin' to meetin' an' class, an' it got to be ser'us talk that she was unsatisfied, an' that old Mr. Mintringer, a Universalist preacher, had been at Moses Morgan's time an' ag'in. Well, it was talked over among us, an' Sister Hays an' me were 'p'inted to go an' talk with Becky. Now I was mortal 'fraid of Morgan hisself, he was so proud an' overbearin' an' scornful-like, and Sister Hays felt the same way, an' we 'lowed we wouldn't mind it if only we could happen there sometime when he was away from home. Well, it run on for weeks that way; we were still the a'p'inted ones, an' the church was dependin' on us. In the meantime Becky was confounded. Sister Hays an' me looked at each other, an' said, 'Well, we'll go and visit her when the right time comes.' In less than a week, Sister Hays was the new mother of a pair of twin boys—you've heard of 'em, Romilus an' Remus; they live out West now—an' the next Monday my Azariar was born. In about five weeks after, we heard that the nabors had all 'jined together with Mr. Morgan to buy salt, an' that he was going down to Zanesville with two critters to pack some home. There was no wagon-road then, an' stuff had to be packed on critters' backs, an' let 'em travel one behind t'other. It was a hard way o' gitten salt, but it was the only way, an' it was surprisen the lots that could be packed that way.

"That was our time to go then, while he was away, an' I sent word to Sister Hays to see if she was ready and willin'. She said she was, an' for me to come bright an' airly the next mornin', an' we'd ride down there an' visit, an' have our pious talk all to ourselves. I fixed things handy for the young uns' dinners, and toted Azariar, an' went cross lots.

"Now I want to tell you how we looked, Sister Hays an' me, when we started. I laffed then, an' I've laffed every time I've thought of it ever since; an' I'm nin'ty-two years old now, an' it's just as laffable as ever it was. Sister Hays an' I'd often gone visitin' together, an' off on church business, an' such, an' we allus rode their old Nell; I rode behind her on piece o' gray linsey-woolsey. Old Nell was led out this mornin' for us, an' behold a pair o' cute little twin colts came trottin' along at her heels. I hadn't heard about 'em, or I s'pect I'd rode our Jack.

"Hays' X Roads saw a funnier sight then than the beautiful village of Haysville ever saw since that day. Sister Hays carried the two babies, made up into one bundle; she rode before. I carried my Azariar, an' rode behind her. The little colts followed after us; but they soon got tired an' lagged, an' I had to whinny, and whicker, an' make all kinds of colty-talk an' endearin' horse-talk. It was the fust time the colts had ever been out of the barn-yard, an' they didn't know how large the airth was, an' acted as though they was afeard they'd fall over the edge of it. I never laughed so hard in my life. Sometimes I had to get off an' go back, an' almost pull 'em along by the tails. We made quite a procession—three critters, an' three boys, and two women.

"Well, we got to Becky's, and were having a famous visit; we put the four new babies all together, heads even; an' we were all talkin' at once, an' gettin' dinner; I was cleanin' a chicken, an' Becky was makin' berry pie, an' Sister Hays was peelin' taters, when a shadder fell across the doorway, an' who should come in but Moses himself! The fordin' over Jerome Creek was not passable on account o' high water, an' he'd come home to wait till the next day.

"Oh, we were most mortally sorry! And there that old fellar sot an' sot, just as though Sattan was in him, an' he never give us one bit of a chance even to say a private word to Becky. He never liked the Methodys, an' I've a notion he tormented her until she gave 'em up, and was willin' to do anything for peace.

"That was the last visit I ever had with poor Becky Morgan. I often met with her at the neighbors at flax-pullin's, an' quiltin's, and buryin's; but I couldn't enjoy her company like I did the fust couple o' years.

"The colts behaved themselves better on their way home'ards, an' our little patch o' babies slep' all the road. Sister Hays an' me often talked in our old age about the difficulties that beset church committees in airy times when there was only one way o' travellin'."

THE local charities connected with the family history of great landowners in England form one of the most interesting classes of public relief. They date chiefly from ante-Reformation times, and often embody a hidden symbolism into which none save the antiquary now cares to inquire. It is a mistake to suppose that all the dying bequests of pious folk in the Middle Ages were devoted to the "Church" proper: the larger part certainly were, although the spirit that prompted even the making of such bequests was symbolical of the belief in the dispensing (rather than the appropriating) powers of churchmen: but many were also the sums left to be yearly spent in the relief of the poor and starving. Thus originated the alms (or bede) houses so frequently met with in the retired villages of England. Bede (from the German beten, to "pray") meant prayer, hinting at the pious duty of those benefiting by the founder's legacy to pray for his eternal welfare. When the Reformation, among many abuses, also obliterated many beautiful and poetical customs, the meaning of these "houses of prayer" was forgotten, and their chapels were often ruthlessly whitewashed. The material part of the foundation, however, still remained, and the bedesmen, twelve or thirteen (in commemoration of the number of the apostles, or the apostles and their Master), continued to be chosen by the clergyman of the parish and the lord of the manor. In other places, instead of this more costly mode of relief, a custom prevailed of distributing a "dole" at stated times to a large number of poor people, the number corresponding to the age of the giver: if alive, of course the number increased every year; if dead, it was fixed at the age at which he or she had died. Many of these local customs continue to this day; some have even been instituted lately, since the revived taste for mediævalism has beautified and refined English homesteads and village churches. The queen, a faithful upholder of ancient national manners, has given the example by adhering to the time-honored custom called the Royal Maundy. This word is from mandatum, or commandment, and refers to the "new commandment" given by Christ to His apostles at the Last Supper. In Catholic countries it is still the custom for the sovereign to wash the feet of twelve poor men (his wife performing the same office for twelve poor and aged women) in public on the Thursday before Easter, and to serve them at table afterward: in Vienna this is done in a very solemn and public manner. The chosen ones are brought to the palace in court-coaches, and after the ceremony is over are carried home in the same way, loaded with presents of clothing, money, and all the dishes, spoons, forks, etc., used at their dinner. In England the same charity, or its equivalent, is dispensed, not by the sovereign in person, but by her chaplains and almoners, in the midst of beautiful formalities. The dignity with which the ceremony is performed is a striking evidence of the national character, and a contrast to the sometimes slovenly manner in which great public religious functions are got through abroad. The charities are distributed in the chapel of Whitehall, the palace made tragically famous by the disgrace of Wolsey and the death of King Charles I. Fifty-five old men, and as many women, the number corresponding to the age of the sovereign, were thus relieved last year. On an earlier occasion, witnessed by the writer, a procession consisting of a detachment of the yeomen of the guard, under the command of a sergeant-major (one of the yeomen carrying the royal alms on a gold salver of the reign of William and Mary), several chaplains, almoners, secretaries and a few national school-children (allowed to take part in the ceremony as a signal reward for good behavior), left the Royal Almonry Office for the chapel of Whitehall. It was met at the door by the lord high almoner and the subdeans of the Chapel Royal, who joined the ranks and passed up to the altar. The surpliced boys of the Chapel Royal, and the clergy and gentlemen belonging officially to it, took their appointed places right and left, and the gold salver was deposited in front of the royal pew, generally tenanted by one or more members of the royal family. Evening prayer, slightly varied and adapted for the occasion, as custom has decreed for several centuries, was then gone through; the forty-first Psalm was chanted; and after the First Lesson an anthem by Goss was sung. Then followed the distribution of one pound, fifteen shillings to each woman, and a pair of shoes and stockings to each man. The two next anthems were by Mendelssohn, and in the intervals woollen and linen clothes were first distributed to each man, and money-purses to each man and woman. The Second Lesson was then read, and the fourth and concluding anthem, by Greene, chanted, after which the usual Thanksgiving and Prayer of St. Chrysostom were read. The musical part of the service, being especially prominent, was correctly and artistically performed by skillful musicians (some of them composers), styled officially "gentlemen of the Chapel Royal:" the solo in the first anthem was sung by one of the boys.

In addition to this special ceremony, other Easter bounties, styled "Minor Bounty," "Discretionary Bounty," and the "Royal Gate Alms," were, according to old custom, distributed at the Almonry Office on Good Friday and Saturday, while Easter Monday and Tuesday were devoted to the distribution of other supplementary relief to old and infirm people previously chosen by the clergy of the various London parishes. The recipients included over a thousand persons.

Among the private local charities none is on so large a scale as the famous "Tichborne Dole." The idea we now attach to the word dole is ludicrously inappropriate in this case, where the gift is in the proportion of one gallon of the best wheat flour to each adult and half a gallon to each child, and where the number of the recipients is generally between five and six hundred, including the inhabitants of two parishes. This custom is seven hundred years old, and was first instituted on the Tichborne estate by Dame Mabel, the wife of Sir Roger de Tichborne, knight, in the beginning of the twelfth century. The foundress was renowned for her piety and charity, and by her own people was looked upon as a saint. The family record says that she was so charitable to the poor that, not content to exercise that virtue all her lifetime, she instituted the "dole" as a perpetual memorial of her goodness, and entailed it to her posterity. It is distributed yearly on the 25th of March. A large oil-painting, now hanging in the dining-room of Tichborne House, and representing the distribution of the "dole," was painted in 1670, and is considered as one of the most valuable family relics. The costumes of the period are faithfully represented, most of the prominent figures are portraits, and the scene is laid within the courtyard of the old manor, with its sculptured gables and picturesque mullioned windows. The present house, roomy and comfortable as it is, is a plain, unpretending building, with no architectural features to recommend it, but the park and grounds are very beautiful, the old trees disposed in deep glades and avenues, and the situation altogether very picturesque. Since the famous trial has made everything bearing the name of Tichborne a target for curiosity, the occupants have been sadly annoyed, and access to the house was at last, in self-defence, denied to strangers who came simply as gaping sight-seers. The "dole" distribution, as we have said, takes place every year. Last spring it was attended with less show than usual, owing to the illness of the little boy who now represents the old name (the nephew of the lost Roger Tichborne), in consequence of which none of the ladies of the family were present. But despite the absence of the festal arrangements by which it is usually accompanied, the main business was the same as it has always been since Dame Mabel's time. About nine o'clock the fine old park became thronged with men, women and children, all carrying bags and baskets in which to stow away the "bounty." The distribution was made at the back of the house. The people gathered in groups, dressed in all sorts of plain, dilapidated country garments—old men in worn-out smock-frocks (a sight seldom seen even in conservative England), gaiters such as they wear at work in the fields, and slouched, unrecognisable hats that had evidently seen better times; others stood in their "Sunday clothes," stiff and uncomfortable as a laborer looks in that unusual and unartistic guise; some were old and toothless, yet upright and almost martial-looking; while some, again, had that pathetic look—sunken eyes, bent limbs and general air of having given in to the attacks of time and sorrow—which invariably speaks the same language and stirs the same sympathy all over the world. The women were in the majority, most of them hale and hearty, the wives and daughters of laborers who were too busy to come in person. Nine sacks, each containing fifty gallons of flour, were emptied by two sturdy miller's men into an immense tub. The family being an old Roman Catholic one, a religious ceremony was the prelude of the distribution. The domestic chaplain offered up a short prayer, and after invoking the blessing of Heaven on the gift, sprinkled the flour with holy water in the form of a cross. It was no uncommon thing for one person to carry away three or four gallons of flour: the largest award was in the case of a family consisting of man, wife and seven children, the wife carrying away with her five and a half gallons. Many of those whose names appeared as witnesses for the defence during the memorable trial were present—John Etheridge, the blacksmith, and Kennett, coachman of the dowager Lady Tichborne, among the number. The latter lives in a small freehold cottage, his own property, at Cheriton, the next parish to Tichborne. Persons of all denominations were relieved—Church people, Dissenters and Roman Catholics alike—without the slightest favoritism being shown to any.

The same kind of charity, though on a smaller scale, and by the custom of living patrons instead of the will of deceased ones, is dispensed at various times in the year through the whole country by both large and small landed proprietors. The 11th of November (St. Martin's Day) is the one generally chosen for the distribution of winter clothing to the poor of the parish, and this in commemoration of mediæval legend of the holy Bishop Martin, who gave half his ample cloak to a shivering leper who begged of him in the street. Next night, says the legend, he saw in a dream Christ Himself clothed in that cloak, and remembered the promise that "inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these, ye have done it unto Me." The writer has often assisted at such distribution of warm clothing, both made and unmade. In every county squire's house there is a bi or tri-weekly distribution of soup to the village poor, and in most two or three sets of fine bed-linen and soft baby-clothes, to be lent out on occasions requiring greater comforts than the poor and too often thriftless women of agricultural villages can afford. Private charity is all-reaching: the "hall" is the dispensary and the general ark of refuge for all county ills, moral, physical and pecuniary, and its help is never thought degrading, like that of the "parish." Most families pay a doctor and a nurse by the year to attend the poor free of expense, and an order from the doctor for jellies, soup or wine, as well as for the ordinary sorts of medicine, is always sure of being filled from the ample stores of the "housekeeper's room." If the city poor were half as well provided for as are the agricultural poor by their "lords of the manor," there would be far less destitution. Some affect to sneer at a system which savors of what they call "feudalism," and which, they wisely suggest, encourages pauperism, but warm-hearted and charitable people will probably disagree with these searchers after new methods, and will be glad to find in the ready sympathy of English landowners for their poor neighbors a ray of the old-fashioned unquestioning charity which distinguished biblical times.

The Story-Teller.

THE TREASURE-TRUNK.

BY SARAH HART.

EVERY spring and fall for fifteen years had Mrs. Kidder opened her treasure-trunk, caressed the locks of golden and brown hair, turned over broken toys one by one, opened the picture books and turned their soiled pages, taken the little garments, some bright and new, some soiled and worn, and hung them out to air, then folded each garment away again, put each treasured memento back and turned the key in the lock and went away from her treasures out into the busy world again, and each treasured thing was as much hidden as were the thoughts and emotions of her own heart; for Mrs. Kidder never intruded her sorrows upon others. The neighbors knew she was a childless widow when she had come among them ten years before, but that was all. She never spoke of the twin lives that had brightened her home for eight years, or of the two graves on the hillside in a far distant State, nor of that other who had been life itself to her, but whose grave was not even where a stone could mark it, for the blue waves covered him.

It was the day for the meeting of the sewing society. The forenoon had been spent by Mrs. Kidder in examining the contents of the treasure-trunk and putting them in order for the winter. Then the key had been turned and hung up in its place, and Mrs. Kidder went about getting her lonely repast. She made more haste than usual, for she had spent so much time with her treasures that it was almost noon already, and she knew that Mrs. Gray, her friend and neighbor, would be sure to stop for her on her way to the sewing society. So she bustled about and prepared and ate her meal, then cleared away the remains and made herself ready.

The trim gray dress was hardly buttoned and the plain collar, with its jet fastening, was receiving the last touches when smiling, little Mrs. Gray came tripping up the neat gravel walk, wiped the dust from her gaiters on the piece of carpet outside, tapped gently on the door, then entered before the inmate had time to give the summons.

"I was afraid I was late," she said, briskly, "but I saw Mrs. Pendleton starting after that Miss Cole, and I knowed I was in time."

"Oh, yes, there's plenty of time," said Mrs. Kidder, as she unfolded her broche. "But what have you got there?" eyeing the bundle in Mrs. Gray's arms.

"That's my contribution, my mite, you know. You see, I can't afford to give money, so I just looked around amongst my old cast-offs and found a coat of Isaac's and a petticoat or two of Samantha's and an old comfortable, so, thinks I, I'll just bundle these along; somebody can do something with 'em. Have you heard about that preacher's family somewheres out West? He used to live here; married Mary Love. Maybe you remember 'em. I guess their case will be brought up in the society to-day."

Mrs. Kidder did remember something about a Mary Love, she said, as she announced herself ready by picking up the cat and putting it out. Then she took a look at the shining stove and zinc, and the two went out, and Mrs. Kidder very carefully locked the door and tried it.

This sewing society was not like the traditional ones. It was not a school for scandal and gossip, smile as you may, dear incredulous reader; but it was composed of a band of hearty, earnest, Christian workers, and as different from the usual village sewing circle as a blustering March day is from a calm, sunny, deep blue September one.

As Mrs. Gray had foretold, the case of the home missionary was brought up. The story of their privations had reached them through a letter from another home missionary to their pastor. It was an extremely sad case. The mother, unable to stand all the trials and privations of frontier life, had fallen a victim to the fever, leaving three helpless children, the youngest two years, and the eldest eight years old. Eight years old! How that smote upon Mrs. Kidder's heart! The father, unwilling to leave his charge, was struggling along against difficulties almost too hard to be borne, and now winter was coming on, and those motherless lambs were almost naked. What could be done? There was no money in the treasury, and the members of the society had responded so nobly to other calls that the president was afraid there was no surplus to meet the demand.

"Let us make up a box to send them," suggested one.

"I think we can fill a large box with necessities before many weeks," said another.

"Let us try," said the president. "We are none of us rich, but perhaps all of us have something we might spare—something the children have outgrown, or something we have ourselves cast aside. Let us look again, sisters, and see if we cannot do something for this family. Their case seems to appeal to us in particular. Think, O mothers! What if it were your own little ones!"

This womanly appeal went to every heart, and various as the minds were, the thoughts and plans brought proved to meet the demand. So earnestly did they grasp the project as their work, that before they were dismissed it was agreed that at the next meeting of the society each would report by bringing their contributions, so that they might know upon how much they could depend.

On the way home, Mrs. Gray and Mrs. Kidder talked, and planned, and wished, without coming to any settled mode of action.

"You have no one to grow out of their clothes, and my folks are obliged to wear theirs so close, and neither of us have much money to give away, but we can give our sympathies and prayers," said Mrs. Gray, as they parted at Mrs. Kidder's gate.

"Yes, I am sure they have my sympathies and prayers," said Mrs. Kidder, as she gave her dress a shake and wiped her feet.

"Sympathies and prayers for the poor, and a trunk full of clothes for the moths," said a voice within.

Mrs. Kidder started. No, no; not such a sacrifice; and she shut her lips firmly together, and tried to shut her heart's inner chamber against the invading thought. She went into the house, took off her shawl and hood, stirred the fire and put over the shining kettle, and tried to be firm and tearless. But she could not get rid of her unwelcome guest. The very teakettle seemed to say in its singing: "Sympathies and prayers." Mrs. Kidder steeped her tea, and poured an additional dipper of cold water in the kettle and set it in a cooler place.

After her almost untasted supper was cleared away, she took her knitting and sat down. But she was restless. The click of her needles and the ticking of the clock seemed to her like voices, and their measured sounds were "sympathies and prayers." She could not stand it. She knit to the seam, then folded the stocking and laid it upon the shelf, and took the lamp and went to her bedroom. She paused in front of the little dark closet wherein was hidden the treasure-trunk, and seemed about to open the door, then slowly shaking her head, she turned away. She could not make the sacrifice.

That night her dreams were peopled with naked, starving children, fighting over the treasured contents of her trunk, and among the wan faces she distinctly discerned her own darlings.

The morning found Mrs. Kidder troubled in mind and sick in body. She early made her way to the little dark closet, carefully lifted the precious trunk, carried it into the light, took the key from its hiding-place and opened it. One by one she took out the garments. First came two suits of bright blue merino. How vividly came to her that birthday party when her darlings were seven years old! How well she remembered the days and nights of work to complete these, and their sparkling eyes when they beheld them! No, she could not part with these. Next came bright-colored worsted sacques and scarfs. This with the crimson threads was Maggie's, her own choice; and Mary had wanted this with gold threads, so they might know them apart, she said. How could she give these? Next came the cloaks of sombre gray, with blue facings—New Year's gifts from their father on the last happy New Year she had ever seen. How the memory of it surged over her heart like a fearful simoon, drying its tears and making it an arid waste! No, she could not part with these. Then came the every-day dresses of various fabrics—lawn, calico, bright plaids and soft-tinted delaines, and the tiny ruffled aprons and comfortable undergarments, and shoes and stockings. How could she bear to know that other hands were thrust into the dainty pockets, other forms were fitting about in the neat dresses without a thought of the little forms long since dust!

No, she could not endure this. God would not demand the sacrifice. She would seek her duty in some other work.

That same afternoon Mrs. Kidder determined to visit a poor family in another part of town. She carried a gallon pail full of soup for the sick father, and a good allowance of her cherished gunpowder tea for the mother. But she felt very little reward, although the gratitude of the poor family was abundant. She felt that she was walking by sight, and not by faith.

The next Sabbath was the annual collection for the cause of home-missions. Mrs. Kidder gave double her allowance for that purpose. She could ill afford it, for she always gave "all that she could;" but somehow she felt so disturbed by something undone, that she felt she must perform some extra act of duty (or was it penance?) in order to regain her peace of mind. But peace came not with this act of benevolence; and Mrs. Kidder went home from the services feeling very little profited.

That afternoon she opened her Bible, and her eyes fell upon the words of Paul: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" None but God Himself saw her struggle, and none but He knew her victory. But with willing hands and a glad heart Mrs. Kidder the next day again drew out the treasure-trunk from its hiding-place, and opened it. But this time she lingered over nothing. She took out the locks of golden and brown hair, put them hurriedly into her bosom, then spreading a sheet upon the floor, she emptied the contents of the treasure-trunk into it. Once she paused as she caught sight of a pair of soiled stockings, with their elastic fastenings still around them. She thought she might keep these. But only for a moment did her hands cease in their work; she had promised all; and broken toys, soiled books, and clothing, everything, save two tiny thimbles and the locks of hair, were freely offered.

That evening a huge bundle was left at Mrs. Clark's house, directed "For the home missionary box. From a friend." But no one knew who had brought it.

On Wednesday the society met. Mrs. Gray stopped before Mrs. Kidder's house, but seeing the windows closed, and knowing herself to be a little late, she did not enter.

"Where is Mrs. Kidder?" inquired some one, but no one knew. She was usually there, perhaps she was ill. Mrs. Gray had not stopped—would call on her way home.

When the contributions were received, all wondered where the large quantity of beautiful garments could have come from. Every one of them was new to their wondering eyes, but they never guessed the donor nor ever knew the whole cost of the sacrifice.

RACHEL DILLOWAY'S SON.*

BY MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE long, sleepless night wore away, Rachel hardly knew how; and the morning dawned, as mornings will, whether tired human souls are ready for them or not. The problem with which she had wrestled was still unsolved.

It was with a feeling of positive relief that she found herself, when she arose and attempted to dress, utterly unable to proceed. She was not quite as strong, not quite as well able to endure, physically, as she had been in her younger days; and the struggle of the last twelve hours—a struggle which was not yet over—had been too much for her. She had hardly begun her toilet when her head whirled, the room grew dark and she was forced to lie down again.

She was thankful for the blinding pain that shot through her temples, compelling her to shut her eyes against the soft, warm rays that stole in through the crimson curtains, even as she would have shut them from the barbed lightning. For the pain brought a reprieve, at least. For a few hours longer she might put off the evil day. If she were ill in bed, surely she need do nothing, say nothing.

The fierce conflict of the night, entirely fruitless as it had been, had taught her one lesson. She found that she had at least reached a point where she must have human aid, and counsel, and sympathy. To some human heart she must turn, for the strength that grows out of a sense of companionship. Perhaps this knowledge brought a keener pang with it—for it meant the betrayal of the sorrow she had hidden so long. But it could not be helped. She must go to some strong, wise, tender soul and cry: "Tell me what to do! Show me the way in which I must walk, and then help me to walk in it!" She dared not trust her own unaided judgment in this crisis of her fate—and of her son's.

* Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1874, by MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

God? Yes. I know all you would say, and she knew it, too. Had she not wept and prayed? "Sooner or later," says M. Sainte Beuve, "every heart must have its agony and bloody sweat, its garden of Gethsemane." She had had hers that night. She, too, had cried, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me."

But God does not come down and talk with men or women, face to face. However hard the stress, however great the need, He does not, now-a-days, speak to them in audible language. Rachel was as conscious as any of us can claim to be of the spiritual presences. But there are times when the divine aid must reach us through human channels; and to such a time had she come now. She must have human help.

To whom should she turn? To whom could she turn save to—Robert? He was strong, and wise, and tender; and because he was, he would be pitiful. It is the weak who are pitiless. Robert had loved and honored his brother Royal. It could not be that he would cast him out of his heart now, even if she did tell him the whole sad story, and ask him to help her to bear during all the remaining days of her life the burden she had carried alone so long, and which had grown so heavy. She could not tell Roy. He was young; he would not understand; he would so resent the wrong done to his mother, that he would have no compassion on the dead man whom he had never seen. But Robert—she thought she might tell him; and he would help her to see what she ought to do. She would tell him just as soon as he should come back from New York.

But meanwhile? She could not think in that fierce storm of pain. She could only shut her eyes and fold her hands and—wait.

Roy was an early riser; and for several weeks he had made a point of going down to the factories before breakfast, just, as he said, "to see how business looked before the dew was off." However that may have been, he himself always looked like some glad incarnation of the morning when he came back.

All the freshness and glory of the dawn was in his face that bright September morning as he strode up the hill, after making his early inspection. He had been disappointed, but not seriously troubled or depressed, by his mother's refusal to see him the night before. It would all be right this morning, he said; smiling, with a little toss of his crisp, dark curls, as he thought that she had not dreamed of such swift and happy wooing. But in another hour he would have told her all about it. He did not mean that Rose should go back to "Aunt Jane's linter" again. She needed a mother, and his mother needed a daughter. Why, then, should they care for mere conventionalities, or for any idle talk of idle people? Rose and Daisy were a part of Dilloway House, henceforth. They belonged there. They could keep their happy secret for awhile—and then!

His heart beat quickly at the thought of all that "then" held in its unconscious clasp. More than "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory thereof!"

When he went up the steps the breakfast-bell was just ringing; and as he was hanging his hat on the hat-rack, Rose came down the stairs, the soft, shy color stealing into her face as she received his morning greeting. She had not yet grown familiar with their new relations, while to Roy they seemed as old and well-established as the hills. A man's betrothal is the blossoming of a long-cherished hope. A woman's often comes to her as suddenly as a flash of lightning. She has to become accustomed to that of which he may have dreamed for months.

"Has your mistress been down?" Roy asked of the little waitress, as he glanced around the breakfast-room and did not see his mother.

"No, sir. She is not well this morning, I think. Katy said she was to breakfast in her own room."

Just then Katy appeared.

"You are not to wait for Mrs. Dilloway, Mister Roy," she said. "She bade me say she has a headache, and does not wish to be disturbed."

A swift shadow flitted over Roy's face, and he started toward the stairs. His mother had been singularly free from the petty ills and ailments that make so many women seem like semi-invalids all their lives long. He could not remember half a dozen mornings, from his boyhood up, when she had failed to meet him at the breakfast-table. And of all the days of all the years he so wanted her this very morning!

But after a second thought he turned back again. Perhaps she had merely had a restless night, and was trying to sleep. It would be selfish to disturb her.

Katy had left the room, and the little waiting-maid had mysteriously disappeared. Daisy was chirruping to a pair of green paroquets swinging in their gilded cage, and trying to count the jets in their necklaces. Rose stood in the bay-window, looking down into the beautiful valley, but, if the truth must be told, seeing nothing.

Roy stepped quietly to her side, and, taking her hand, he led her to the table, and seated her with a most significant smile behind the coffee-urn.

"You must submit to fate," he whispered, just touching her forehead with his lips. "Destiny is swift and pitiless. Ah, and here is the 'mistress's posey!'"

Taking up the tiny cluster of sweet-scented leaves and blossoms, he would have fastened it in her brooch.

"No, no!" she cried, crimsoning, and pushing it away from her. "No, no! I cannot wear it; do not ask such a thing! You are too absurd. Besides, the flowers are your mother's. They don't belong to me."

"Even if you are behind the coffee-urn? Well, then, you must take them to her by and by. But the lady who occupies that position at Dilloway House always wears a morning-posey; the coffee would be flavorless if she did not."

He darted away, and returned in less than a minute with two or three sweet-peas and a spray of mignonette.

"Sweetest to the sweet," he said, lightly, as he laid them beside her plate. "Now, Miss Sterling, if you will give me a cup of mocha I will be in-initely obliged to you," and he took the opposite seat.

Daisy had seen nothing of this by-play. Intent upon her birds, she was counting: "One, two. One, two, three, four. One, two, three. They won't keep their heads still long enough for me to count their beads, Rose!"

"Come and get your breakfast, then," Rose answered.

"Why! how funny you do look sitting there!" exclaimed the child, as she turned toward the table. "It 'most seems as if you were an old married woman."

"Old?" cried Roy. "A libel, a libel!" Then, with a mischievous glance at the sweet, downcast face opposite him, he added, gravely: "Daisy, in the course of your varied and extensive reading, did you ever happen to meet these words of the poet:

"And coming events cast their shadows before?"

"Never," she answered, just as gravely. "I don't know what you mean, either. There are not any shadows here—that I see."

"That is the fault of your eyes," was the rejoinder, "not of the shadows. Mine are becoming so dazzled with the sunshine—or with something else"—and he put up his hand as if to shield them—"that I fear I shall not be able to see anything much longer."

"The sun does come in pretty brightly at that east window," said Daisy, literally. "I'll drop the curtain."

Which she immediately did, while Roy's gay laugh rang through the room.

Rachel heard it, up-stairs in the silence of her chamber—the joyous, merry laugh that had been such music in her ears through all her boy's life. He had been such a happy child—so full of abounding health and joy. How would he bear sorrow? What change would its unaccustomed ministry work in him? Would he grow hard and bitter—or even wicked, perhaps—when stung and tortured by some dark demon of unrest? And must it be her hand—the hand of the mother who loved him, she thought lying there upon her bed, a thousand times better than any young girl like Rose Sterling could love him—must it be her hand that should lift the poisoned chalice to his lips?

Katy came softly into the room—so softly that she would not have awakened a fly, if it had chanced to be asleep. But the eyes she had hoped to find closed were wide open.

"I told Mister Roy I thought you were sleeping," she said; "but he wanted me to come and see. He does not like to go to the office until he has seen you, ma'am."

Rachel thought swiftly. This was Thursday, and Robert had said he should be home next week. She could not banish Roy from her presence until then. He would insist upon seeing her—as he had a right to do. If she was ill enough to keep her room, he would feel that she needed her son. She must see him, and do the best she could.

"Let him come up," she said, as a sharp pain darted through her temples.

She would have read it all in his face the moment he opened the door—even if she had not known it already. It was all written there—the story of his love, his happy, successful wooing, and his eager longing to tell her all about it, and receive the mother-sympathy that had never been denied him. She closed her eyes as he lightly crossed the room and kneeled down by her bed, kissing her cheek, and lips, and eyelids.

"I am so sorry you are not well," he said, softly. "Sorry for your sake, and sorry for my own. For I want to tell you something, mother! A joy is not half a joy until you share it."

Rachel raised her arms with a sharp cry of pain, and put them about his neck. "Don't tell me, Roy!" she said. "Do not tell me anything. I cannot bear it now."

She did not mean to say this. She did not know what she did mean to say. The words were wrung from her. Then she drew his head down upon her breast, holding him in a close, almost a fierce embrace, while she kissed him with white, cold lips.

"O Roy! Roy!" she cried.

How could she give him up—to Isabel Leighton's daughter?

He lifted his head from her bosom and, drawing back, looked at her in blank amazement. What did she mean? What was the matter? Were these simply the wild words born of physical suffering? What had so unnerved his calm, strong, yet gentle, mother? He was strangely startled. Not tell her? Why, he had told her everything—all his life—ever since he could speak! Not tell her?

Probably nothing could so soon have restored Rachel to herself, as the sight of his uplifted face, pale with a certain undefined terror. How weak of her to be so overcome—to run such risks of betraying herself, when she had fully determined to take no steps whatever until she had consulted Robert.

She put back the hair from his forehead and smiled in his face; a wan ghost of a smile, it is true, but still a smile. She forced herself to speak quietly.

"Perhaps I could guess what you wish to say to me, if I were to try," she said, looking at him imploringly. "But you must wait. My head aches terribly. I cannot talk to-day—nor until I am better. Promise me that you will wait."

She was not mending matters very fast, poor woman; but she could think of nothing better to say.

"I will wait your pleasure, certainly," said Roy, the look of pained surprise still lingering about his eyes and mouth. "But can nothing be done for you? Has the doctor been sent for? Let me call him at once."

"No," she answered. "I will keep quiet. That is all I need."

He had arisen from his knees and stood looking down upon her, the expression of perplexity and distress deepening each moment. What had happened since he talked with her on the piazza last night? For he was not deceived. He knew very well that he could have told his short story twice over in the time his mother was telling him not to tell it; and that, prepared as she was by the conversation of the night before, it could not have caused her half the emotion she had exhibited during the ten minutes he had been in the room. She was ready for all he had to say, and why should she shrink from hearing it? Joy was a great healer; and his joy had always been hers.

Yet he knew little about pain; and perhaps bodily suffering was sufficient to account for all that disturbed him. At all events he would not worry her by any display of uneasiness.

"Well," he said, stooping to kiss her, "I hope you will be better after a few hours of rest. Good-bye. I'm off for the office."

As he reached the door, he thought of the flowers.

"Oh!" he said, "Rose was going to bring you Andrew's 'posy,' which lay forlornly on the breakfast-table. Shall I send her up with it?"

Doubtless it would have been wiser to have said yes. But Rachel had neither her usual clearness of vision, nor her wonted strength that morning. After a short, sharp struggle with herself, she answered: "No, I think I would rather be alone," and Roy went slowly down-stairs.

This was, to say the least of it, a most unfortunate illness of his mother's. It placed Rose in an unpleasant and awkward position. He knew very well that she must feel ill at ease and out of place, until his mother had spoken the words and given the kiss that should assure her she was loved and welcomed as the future daughter of the house. But it could not be helped. He must make the best of it. She must not know that he had any secret uneasiness.

Rose was waiting for him in the hall, with the little nosegay in her hand.

"What is it?" she asked. "Is she very ill? She seemed so well yesterday. Can I go up and carry the flowers, do you think?"

Roy drew her into the library and shut the door before he answered.

"Not so very ill," he said. "She has a headache, which a few hours of quiet will cure, I hope. So we will leave her alone this morning; and you shall put the flowers in my buttonhole since you will not wear them yourself."

What else he may have said is not a matter of public interest. But at the end of half an hour, Rose drew his watch from his pocket and held it up before him.

"Do you see that?" she asked. "You are an hour late, Mr. Royal Dilloway."

"Yes," he said; "I am playing the laggard this morning. But who ever had a fairer or a sweeter excuse? I don't like to leave you to your own devices, my Rose-of-the-world. What do you propose to do with yourself all the long hours until dinner-time?"

She shot a swift glance at him from under the curved, golden-brown lashes that were many shades darker than her hair.

"Pray don't give yourself any uneasiness on my account," she answered. "There are no more minutes in an hour to-day than there were yesterday, and they will fly fast enough. Imprimis, I shall mend Daisy's frock; then I shall go in the garden and gather some flower-seeds, wherewith to make Aunt Jane's heart glad; and then—"

She hesitated, pulling a geranium-leaf from Roy's buttonhole, while her color deepened.

"And then—what?" making a prisoner of the little fluttering hand, and holding it close.

"Then," she said, lifting her clear, brave eyes to his, "then I shall finish one or two designs for—Mr. John Farrington. He wants them; and I promised he should have them this week."

Something rose in Roy's throat, almost choking his utterance. He had never thought much about money, anyway. It had always been a matter of course, as the air he breathed, or the daily sunlight. The Dilloway fortune was an established fact; something that did not need to be talked about, or commented on.

But here was this young girl, as well-born and as well-bred as himself, as tenderly nurtured during all her childhood, who had been earning for herself and Daisy, with those little, soft hands, the same staff of life that had come to him, great, strong fellow that he was, without a thought or a care. For the first time in his life, his heart bounded exultantly as he thought of his wealth. If he could have laid the world at Rose's feet, it would not have been too much.

His evident emotion pained and startled her.

"What is it?" she asked, her voice breaking, as she drew herself away from him a little. "Don't you wish me to finish the designs? Will it trouble you?"

She wondered, the sensitive pride swelling in her own heart the while, if it touched his pride that she should ever have worked for—money? If, at the bottom of his soul, there was a lurking regret that the girl he had asked to be his wife had ever been paid by John Farrington?

Perhaps he read her better than she did him.

"Trouble me? No," he said, softly, while his own color came and went, and his heart beat strongly. "My wife shall draw all the pretty designs she pleases, and she shall do with them as she pleases. But, O my Rose, my darling, I am so glad the task-work is over! I am so glad you have given me the right to share with you that which has come to me so easily, and through no worthiness of mine!"

That day passed, and the next; and Rachel still kept her rooms, though not her bed. Roy was at his wits' end. He could not comprehend his mother. She was white and wan as a ghost. She looked like one torn and vexed by some dread, internal conflict. There was no doubt that she was ill. Yet he could perceive no great lack of strength as she moved about her rooms. There seemed to be no sufficient reason why she should not go down-stairs; certainly there was none why she should tacitly refuse to see Rose and Daisy, who had had the freedom of her dressing-room ever since they had been at Dilloway House, and had spent most of their mornings there. Their bright young faces ought to do her good rather than harm.

He had tried once again to speak of his relations to Rose, and again his mother had bidden him "wait." He obeyed. But none the less was his soul in a state of tumult, and consternation, and revolt. What did it all mean? The whole atmosphere of the house seemed changed. There was restraint, and silence, and repression everywhere.

Poor Rachel! she felt it even more keenly than he did. There was a wall being slowly builded up between her and her boy—"the only son of his mother, and she a widow." Every murmur of blended voices down-stairs, every laugh—for youth will be gay at times, even under the saddest circumstances—stabbed her to the heart. Often she rose up, thinking she would join them at any risk. But she never got farther than the door. She could not see Rose and Roy together without some acceptance of, or open refusal to accept, their new relations. She must wait.

Her whole soul cried out for Robert. She had telegraphed to him, unknown to Roy. She had told him she had need of him. Oh, when would he come?

On Saturday morning Rose came down to breakfast with a very grave though quiet face. The look was stealing over it for which Roy had been watching. She, too, had been rudely awakened from her happy dream. Daisy ran out for a fresh supply of the rose-hips as they left the table. She was making a rosary for each of the servants.

Rose went into the library, sure of being followed. She seated herself on the sofa, while Roy looked at her silently with expectant eyes.

"Come and sit down here," she said, reaching out her hand. "I want to ask you something."

He obeyed with a bold front, but inwardly quaking with a great dread of what the "something" might be.

"Or I want you to tell me something," she went on. "I want you to tell me just how much your mother knows of what has passed between us. Do not try to put me off with a vague answer—or to soften matters. I want to know the whole truth, Roy."

His face flushed, but he answered quietly: "I have told her nothing of what has actually happened; for her illness has prevented. But she knew what my wishes were—and my intentions."

"Are you sure?"

"Perfectly sure, Rose; for I told her that very night—Wednesday night—as we sat on the piazza, while you and Daisy were in the garden."

"Tell me what she said," she whispered, keeping a little apart from him, even while he held her hand, "for I am troubled and perplexed. I do not know what is right."

He told her, word for word, just what was said on both sides.

"And then?" her voice trembling.

"Then I went into the garden; and when I looked back, after a moment or two, she had gone into the house."

"And she has not been down-stairs since, nor allowed me to go to her. Yet Katy tells me she is better, and is sitting up most of the time. I cannot stay here, Roy! Don't you see? I must go back to Aunt Jane's."

What could he say to her? Her feeling was so natural, so entirely womanly, that it was unanswerable. He could only turn a distressed face toward her, with a look that was more eloquent than any words.

"You do not blame me?" she said, drawn closer to him by the dumb pathos of his eyes. "You see that I cannot help it? Your mother has been very kind to Daisy and to me. I love and honor her above all other women. But something has changed her feeling toward us. I am in her way. I cannot stay here any longer. I am an unwelcome guest. You know it, Roy!" and the proud yet tender voice died in a low, quivering sob.

"O Rose, Rose!" he cried, with passionate vehemence. "This is all some dreadful mistake! Mother loves you, I know. It will all be right as soon as she is herself again. She has changed even to me, and I cannot account for it. But I have faith in her, I have faith in myself, I have faith in you. She is under some cloud. She looks like a ghost."

"The cloud is my presence here," she answered, lifting her head that had fallen on his shoulder. "Can't you see it? I feel it. No sensitive woman could help feeling it. I ought to go, Roy. I must go."

"But this changes nothing?" he said. "You do not mean that this is to come between us? You love me, Rose?"

"Yes," she answered, under her breath. "Yes. But so does your mother, and she has loved you longest. She loved you before I was born. And she has been my friend."

"What does this mean, Rose?" he said, slowly, turning her face toward him, and compelling her to meet his startled eyes. "What are you going to say to me?"

"It is all in her hands," she went on, breathlessly. "It must be just as she says. I thought about it all night. I tried to put myself one side, and to think for her and for you. I must not come between you, Roy! I will not."

"But she knew all about it," he cried, passionately. "She told me to gather my rose, if I could; and I did her bidding. She must not say one thing to-day and another to-morrow, even if she is my mother. It is too cruel, Rose! and I cannot bear it."

"But you must bear it," she said, gently. "We must not be selfish. Just think of it, Roy! It all came to me last night as I lay awake. Your mother was very young when your father died; a young girl, almost; scarcely older than I am now. And she has lived alone all these years for your sake—shutting her heart against all newer loves. Now I cannot rob her of her son. Neither can I come here, into her very home, to give her pain. It is that that would be 'too cruel.'"

"But what can we do?" he asked, his voice softening a very little. "For I cannot give you up, Rose—and I never shall. You belong to me."

"Then we must be patient—and wait," she said, with a faint little smile. "You must be good, and I will be good. I will go back to Aunt Jane's—and by and by—sometime—perhaps—"

She stopped short—lifting her eyes, brimming over with tears, to his. He clasped her closer in an embrace that had in it even more of reverent tenderness than of youthful passion. Her love and faith disarmed him.

"O Rose of the world!" he cried, "it ought to be joy enough for one life to win you even after years of waiting! But you will go back to Aunt Jane's? You will take up the old, hard, lonely life? You—"

"Nay, it is not so very hard," she said. "And you will not make it harder by throwing obstacles in my way? You will help me, Roy! We will help each other to do what is just and right."

"But I know just how it will be," he answered, impetuously. "You will make the waiting so hard. You will not let me come to you. Aunt Jane's linter will be as far out of my reach as the stars are. You can't expect me to submit to this, Rose!"

"Yes—for awhile," she said, simply. "Things may change. We may see clearer by and by. But now—we must just wait and be patient. There's no other way. And—Roy—"

"What, love?" he whispered.

She raised her arms and put them about his neck, as a child might have done.

"You will be glad some day," she said. "You will be glad that we did not seek our own pleasure first."

There was silence between them for many minutes. At last she arose, with a glance at the clock.

"Now I must go and pack our trunks."

Roy rose, too, throwing back his head as one throws off a burden.

"Not to-day," he said, drawing her to his side again. "Rose, this is Saturday. Stay here till Monday. I know it is much to ask of you. But we cannot tell what even a day may bring forth; and if you expect me to wait months and years, maybe, before carrying out my plans, you can surely afford to wait forty-eight hours before carrying out yours!"

"But am not I to wait through the months and years, too?" she asked, with a quick, mischievous glance that was like sunshine after a shower. "The waiting is not to be all on one side, sir!"

The dear children! They were young and they loved. I doubt if they were so very dreadfully miserable throughout that doleful interview, after all—though they thought they were!

So Rose consented to stay at Dilloway House until Monday.

CHAPTER XXVII.

ROBERT reached Linborough late Saturday night; too late for the last train to Woodleigh. But if Rachel had need of him, he could not wait quietly until Monday; and there were no Sunday trains in that direction. He had hurried through with a part of his business in New York, and the rest he had left undone, wondering all the while what the telegram he had received might mean. Beneath its cool, business-like formula, his quick ear detected the undertone of pain. Rachel had need of him.

Rising early on Sunday morning, he ordered a carriage, and reached Woodleigh just as the last church-bell was tolling. The streets were full.

The people were trooping toward the little church, and there was Mr. Forde just going up the steps. The organist was playing a voluntary, and the low, trembling chords stole softly to his ear. But he went on his way up the hill.

Katy met him at the door with a look of surprise. She supposed he was in New York.

"Is Mrs. Dilloway at church?" he asked.

"No, sir, she is in her dressing-room. Mister Roy and the young ladies have gone to church."

"Will you tell her I am here?" and he walked into the library.

Rachel's dressing-room was, in fact, a sort of up-stairs parlor, having little of the dressing-room save the name. It was one of the suit of rooms so often alluded to, which the two brothers, Royal and Robert, had occupied jointly during all their boyhood, and which the former had re-furnished for his bride. It seemed to her that the most rapturous joys and the sharpest sorrows of her life had come to her there—and there she now waited for Robert. Waited with a white face, and her hands pressed tightly over her heart, as if so she might still its tumultuous throbbings. It was like death to her to tell even him what she must tell him that day.

There are women who will find it utterly impossible to comprehend this state of feeling, and who will pronounce it exaggerated and overdrawn. But, thank God! there are others whose own loyal natures will bear witness to its truth. There are those who can see that the highest type of womanly, wifely love has so much of the mother-element in it, it so instinctively broods and cherishes, that she who feels it can no more be turned from her husband by the knowledge of his follies, or even of his sins, than she could be turned from the son she has borne upon her breast. Rachel's love was of this type. It lost sight of the wrong against herself in its tender pity for him who had done the wrong.

Yet she was a woman, with all a woman's sensitive pride. It was not easy for her, even on her own account, to tell her husband's brother that she had been supplanted—that another woman had held her sceptre and stolen her crown.

She did not speak when Robert entered the room, but silently gave him her hand. It was like ice. He held it as silently, looking down upon her. The change in her face startled him. What had become of the soft, warm, changeful color that had given it so rare a charm? What had she done to herself? She looked ten years older than when he saw her last.

"I should think you did need me," he said at length, stooping down and laying his other hand upon her forehead. "What is the matter, Rachel? Why did not some one tell me you were ill? You look like the wraith of yourself."

Perhaps the very best thing that could have happened, happened then. Rachel was not given to tears. She had not shed one through all those dreary days. But now something—the touch of his hand upon her hair, his sympathetic voice, the sight of his face, the mere rest and comfort of his presence, it may be—unsealed the fountain. She laid her head down upon the table and wept, till it seemed to Robert she would weep her life away.

He stood beside her for five minutes, in strange trouble and perplexity, while he occasionally touched her hair with a slight, caressing motion. At last he said, dropping on his knees beside her, and taking both her hands in his: "You frighten me, Rachel! I shall go wild if you do not speak to me. What is this trouble? What has happened?"

"Roy—" she said, faintly.

"Roy!" he cried. "What of him? He is well—he is at church. What of him?"

She sat up with a great effort, drawing a long, sobbing breath.

"Oh, that is not at all what I meant to say!" she exclaimed. "Be patient with me a few moments, Robert. I have not cried before, and I have so much to tell you!"

He was in a fever of impatience. Had anything gone wrong with Roy? Would she never be able to relieve his anxiety?

She turned toward him at length, smiling faintly.

"You will think me very weak," she said; "and I see that I have frightened you. I am better now."

"But—Roy?" he asked, hurriedly, taking a seat beside her. "What of Roy?"

"Nothing," she answered. "That is, he is well, and he has done nothing—nothing wrong."

"Thank Heaven for that!" he cried. "I began to fear he had committed murder, or forgery, or the whole catalogue of the seven deadly sins. I should have thought he was dead, if Katy had not told me he was at church."

The light words, born of his sudden relief, jarred upon her, and he saw it.

"I can bear almost anything, if our dear boy is all right," he added, tenderly, as he took her hand again. "And so, I think, can you."

"But I did not say he was all right," she answered. "I said he had done nothing wrong. O Robert! I do not know where or how to begin with what I have to tell you!"

He looked at her wonderingly.

"Begin at the very beginning, Rachel. That is the best way, and the only way, to deal with most matters."

"But I must go away back twenty years or more, and open a grave to do it," she said, pushing back the hair from her forehead. "It is so far, Robert, and the grave is so deep."

He did not answer. It was better, he saw, to let her take her own time and find her own way to the light—if any light there was. He could not help her; so much was plain.

"You will not blame Royal," she said, after the lapse of several minutes, her fingers working nervously. "You will not blame Royal, or be hard with him. I have tried not to be for these many, many years; and I forgave him long ago—almost as soon as I knew it. But—he loved some one else better than he did me."

She spoke very slowly and calmly, not looking at Robert. But as she uttered the last words she buried her face in her hands, and her neck and forehead, and every inch of flesh that was visible, burned with a crimson flush.

To her amazement Robert laughed outright.

"Why, you foolish woman!" he said, the tenderness of his voice quite overbalancing the disrespectful adjective. "I did not expect this, after our talks on the island. I thought you were quite prepared for it."

Notwithstanding the past tense, and the allusion to "many, many years," he had not the slightest inkling of what she really meant. How could he have?

The color fled from her face again, and dropping her hands she looked her astonishment.

"It is a matter of course that Roy should fall in love," he added, smiling. "I supposed you had made up your mind to all that."

"I was not talking of Roy," she said, slowly, lifting her heavy eyes to his face. "I spoke of your brother Royal—my husband."

"Of Royal—your husband," he repeated, as one bewildered. "You say that of Royal? You cannot mean it, Rachel!"

But even as he spoke thus, half impatiently, a cold fear swept over him. She was so changed—so unlike herself. Was this a strange hallucination, born of some hidden and, perhaps, deadly illness? His hand fell upon her arm, and glided down to her slender wrist.

She read his thought. "You need not feel my pulse," she said. "I am quite as sane as you are, Robert, it is all true—what I told you. Royal—"

He turned suddenly and grasped her hands till she winced with pain, while his face flushed hotly.

"You must not repeat that again, Rachel! What jealous demon has taken possession of you since I went away? You are slandering one of the truest, noblest hearts that ever beat. I will not listen to you."

"I am not jealous; and you must hear me and help me, Robert. I have known this for seventeen years, nearly, and I have not troubled you with it. You must listen now; and you must not be angry with me."

"Angry? Pain is not anger." But, Rachel, this idea of yours is simply absurd. I knew Royal thoroughly. He loved you with his whole heart—as few men ever love."

He was silent for a moment, going over her words. "Seventeen years?" he repeated, incredulously. "You have harbored this fancy for nearly seventeen years? You must be dreaming, Rachel!"

"It is no fancy, Robert. Give me time and I will tell you all I know. But it is hard! I have kept silent so long that I do not know how to speak."

"When—when did it happen?" he asked, after a while, thinking to help her.

"The winter he was abroad. It was in Paris."

"Impossible!" he exclaimed. "He was with me nearly all the time. He made very few acquaintances. I know there was no woman on the face of the earth—certainly none among the few he knew in Paris—who could have shaken his allegiance to you for one hour. I know this, Rachel!"

"But I have read the letters," she said, in a voice that was scarcely audible, "the very letters she wrote to him. I never meant to tell, Robert. I did not mean you should ever know. But now I could not bear it any longer, for—"

She stopped short, and her face grew white as ashes.

"For' what? I cannot help you, Rachel, while you talk so blindly. We are both beside ourselves, I think. 'For' what?"

"For the woman who wrote them was Rose Sterling's mother!" she cried. "Do you understand now? Can you think what a pang it is to know that my son loves the daughter of the woman who lured his father's heart away from me? And before I knew this, Robert, Roy had told me all, and I had consented to his wooing."

"But how did you know it? Can you not tell me the story? How did you obtain the letters? and how do you, at this late day, connect them with Mrs. Sterling?"

He spoke rapidly, almost harshly. It was all so bewilderingly sudden and so painful.

"Because they are signed with her name—her maiden name—and because of other things! Rose has a curious box that is the very counterpart of one that belonged to Royal, and in which I found the letters."

Robert had left Rachel's side and gone to the window. He wanted something to steady him, a sight of the everlasting hills, or the tranquil, over-arching skies; for it seemed to him that the solid earth was heaving under his feet. That there was some method in this madness, he could not deny. But how could he believe that his brother had ever failed, for one instant, in his love and loyalty? that brother who had been the very incarnation of honor and of truth! And, besides—

Why, for this peerless woman—this Rachel—even now, when her life was half spent and she had passed the bloom and freshness of her youth, Jacob might well serve his twice seven years and count it gain!

Thus it happened that his back was toward Rachel as she spoke her last words, and she did not see his face. But as she raised her eyes she saw that he started violently; and the hand that held back the crimson damask of the curtain closed upon it so suddenly and tightly that the blood purpled beneath the nails. She had thought him harsh and cold; but he was not indifferent, it seemed. He was sorry for her. He would give her counsel and sympathy by and by, when the first shock was over.

When he turned toward her again, his face was stern and hard in its effort at self-control. His voice was low and constrained, and his lips were rigid.

"I must see those letters," he said, "and the box in which you found them. Where are they, Rachel?"

"I don't want any one to see them!" she cried. "Can't you take my word for it? The hand that wrote them, and the eyes that read them, are in the grave. Let them alone, Robert!"

"I must see them," he said, quietly. "There's no help for it, Rachel."

She went into the closet without any more words. When she came out, Robert sat by the table, with his face buried in his hands. She touched him on the shoulder.

"Here is the box," she said; "and here is the key."

It was strange—but they seemed to have changed places. His face, as he lifted it, was clayey white, and his hands shook so that he could not slip the key into the lock. She grew calm in her very wonder at his emotion.

"Let me do it," she said, and opened the box.

They were all there—the four letters, the little faded glove, the withered flowers, still exhaling the merest ghost of a perfume, the silver paper with the long tress of wavy golden hair.

"It is just as I found it," she said, a curious calm settling down upon her, "seventeen years ago."

Robert looked silently, lifting the little packet of letters, touching the glove half reverently, and finally taking up the silver paper. The hair, after so many dark, quiet years, gleamed softly in the sunshine, and curled about his fingers as if glad of the touch of a human hand.

"Oh, put it away!" exclaimed Rachel, covering her eyes. "Put it away! It seems as if it were alive—and it does not belong to you or me."

He dropped it upon the table, and his head sank beside it. A storm of stifled sobs shook him from head to foot—dry, tearless sobs that frightened Rachel. It was her turn to be the comforter, and she laid her hand upon his forehead, lightly as the fall of a snowflake.

"Don't feel so badly about it, Robert," she whispered. "If you do, I shall be sorry I told you."

He raised his head from the table, and, catching both her hands, carried them passionately to his lips.

"Oh, don't you see, Rachel? don't you see?" he cried. "I hardly dare to tell you, lest you cannot bear the joy. But do you not see for yourself? Tell me, dear!"

She looked at him wonderingly, shaking her head slowly.

"No," she answered. "I see nothing but what I have seen before."

He was silent for a minute; then rose and placed her in his chair.

"Then I have something to tell you," he said. "O Rachel, these letters are mine! They were written to me. This box and what it contains are all that is left of my young love that died and was buried so long ago. Royal had nothing to do with them."

She said nothing for many minutes. Robert had done wisely in placing her in the chair. Her head fell back against the crimson cushion. Her eyes closed. Her throat worked convulsively. Her hands fell nervelessly by her side. Robert watched her anxiously.

"Royal brought the box home—for me," he went on, in a faltering voice. "That spring I was going to Africa, and I asked him to take charge of it. I knew even then, when my heart was so sore, that it was all madness and folly, and that I should outlive it. I told him to hide the box away; and that some day, when I was a stronger man, I should send him word to destroy it. That is the whole story, Rachel!"

So many changes swept over her face as he spoke.

"But there is his monogram," she said, as from a sudden thought, without opening her eyes. "R. A. D.—Royal Ainslee Dilloway."

"No. Robert Ainslee Dilloway. It is my monogram. Did you not know that I, too, had the Ainslee for a middle name? I dropped the 'A.' when in college, because Royal's initials and mine were precisely the same, and it gave us a world of trouble; and I never resumed it. But when I ordered this box, I gave the three initials for the monogram, thinking it would be prettier and more graceful."

Tears were stealing softly from beneath Rachel's closed eyelids.

"O Roy! Roy!" she murmured, in tones of passionate entreaty. "O my Roy!"

Her heart had gone back again to the old pet name. She had not called her husband "Roy" since the night she read the letters until now.

Robert went to the other end of the room.

(To be continued.)

QUEER FOLKS.

BY M. E. COMSTOCK.

ROBERT'S wife never complained. We all wondered at it sometimes for Robert did not seem to prosper in worldly things. They still lived in the little, old, brown house. Nobody visited them, for Robert's wife never had time to go anywhere. She never seemed to care about what was going on in her neighborhood. If she heard of a sick person that hadn't many friends she always found time to go and see them. But she was a very busy woman.

Robert and his wife had lived in the little brown house ten years; their children never played with other children; Mrs. Robert kept no servant; Robert had an office on a good street; he was always well-dressed and, though quiet, usually had a pleasant word for everyone; he did his work at such ridiculously low prices that his profits were only steady instead of being large; he said he charged all it was worth; if he was satisfied he didn't know but other people might be.

Robert's wife had a call one day. A new minister had come to their part of the town. He had heard that the occupants of the brown house were very "queer folks." He was told that perhaps he wouldn't be made welcome there.

The minister did not talk about religion the first time he went to Robert's, but when he came home he told his wife that he wished there were more "queer folks" in the world. He heard no slander or gossip at Robert's, though his hostess was very sociable. He saw the best new publications on the table and, although Mrs. Robert admitted she couldn't go to church very often, because she had to stay at home with the baby and to do the necessary housework, he yet found her very familiar with the church movements of the day and with the latest books worth calling "literature," and he wished his wife would go and see her and draw her into society and church-work. Such a woman was too valuable to be spared.

Mrs. Robert rose very early in the morning, for she did all her own work except the little that Aunt Miranda, who lived with her, did and that wasn't much for Mrs. Robert wouldn't let her.

"You took care of us when we were children and now you must let us take care of you," she said. So when Aunt Miranda, who was sixty years old, got out the wash-tubs and went to washing, Robert's wife made her sit down. Miss Miranda Gilson had been in the habit of having her own way all her life and she showed proper resentment by going up-stairs and putting on her silk dress and lace collar and coming down and taking a book and reading till dinner time when Mrs. Robert put her tubs away and said: "Now Aunt Miranda if you will be so kind as to set the dinner table for me, I will be very much obliged to you, for really I am very tired."

This was the way the housework was done in Robert's family.

The lately arrived minister, his wife being confined to the house, about this time, with a new little son, sent a delegation of ladies to call on Mrs. Robert. They came into the broken little porch, pulled the well-worn bell wire, and the rustle of their silks and velvets seemed quite to fill the little parlor. Mrs. Robert entered in her calico, and did not seem at all extinguished. The ladies wanted her to go to church, which she said, receiving the tracts they brought her, she would be happy to do if they would allow her to take the baby or if they would pay her for embroideries she could do evenings, so that she could pay pew-rent, which she thought was very high in their church, and she admitted an involuntary repugnance to sitting in the seats reserved for the poor.

It was the ladies turn to be discomfited. They blushed a little and laughed at what they termed her plesantry.

The more intelligent of the two, who wore a camel's-hair shawl, to cover the confusion of the moment took up a foreign magazine from the center-table and said: "Our Alice wanted to subscribe to this but we thought it too expensive."

"It is worth the price," said Robert's wife. "I do my own housework in order to save a servant's wages, waste, and board and appropriate for periodicals."

The ladies felt nonplussed where they had meant to be patronizing and soon took leave, saying: "I hope we shall see you at church."

"Thank you," said Robert's wife. "When Cousin Katie comes I can leave the baby in her care, occasionally, but I presume I shall slip into a little mission-chapel, near by, where the seats are free and my old bonnet will not be so sharp a contrast as to provoke notice. The last time I went to church I heard it remarked upon as I came out, and I don't wonder, it is shabby, but the money I had laid aside for a new one was all I had to give when the cry for help came from the Home Missionaries."

And the ladies bowed themselves away remarking when they gained the street: "What a very singular person!" This was a remark very frequently made of Robert's wife. They did not know how to place her. Surroundings were very commonplace; comparatively mean. Mrs. Robert's manner was simple as a child's. "Yet," said Mrs. Velveten, "I never felt so nonplussed in my life."

A second-hand piano was for sale cheap. The owner was selling out. Robert asked refusal of it a limited time. He came in from the Post Office and showed a letter and check to his wife. "Ethel can have the piano," he said. The little girl had a gift for music. Robert bought it for her; he brought out his violin and accompanied and taught her in leisure hours. Summer evenings the sidewalk would be crowded, listening to the wonderful music.

Real estate was low, in consequence of a panic in business circles. A lovely, wide, old, rambling house, in fine repair, with spacious grounds was for sale for a mere song. Robert bought it and paid for it down. He said the beauty of the place was an educating influence for his children which he could not spare, even if he had to pay for it his "little all." Neighbors wondered and did not know that quiet literary and scientific labors, in which his wife shared, were beginning, now, to bring in an unexpected income. Robert went on in the same business, charging the same low prices. The girls aided their mother in the housework, and the eldest began soon to give music-lessons, her playing having attracted much attention at a charitable concert and brought her solicitations to take pupils.

Mrs. Robert received a great many calls now. Carriages were constantly coming to the door. Her husband had become a leader in literary and musical circles, and Mrs. Robert's quiet deeds of kindness among the needy having been discovered, she was sought for her executiveness as an officer in various benevolent societies, though she frequently said: "I prefer to go as a private friend to those in trouble, rather than as the delegate of an institution. It helps more."

A wealthy family came to town and took an elegant residence in the next block. Mrs. Social came for Robert's wife to call on them. Mrs. Robert had not time.

"I will defer my call then until you are at leisure," said the lady. "Shall I come next week?"

"I think not," said Mrs. Robert. "In fact I am never at leisure, and, to be frank, I have no intention of calling on them."

"May I ask your reasons?"

"I have implied them. They are people I should never have time for unless they were in trouble."

Mrs. Social flushed. "Indeed they went in the first society in Melbourne. They live elegantly and are very polished in manner and have everything that heart can wish, and could aid us very much in benevolent work."

"I am ready to meet them there and co-operate to the fullest extent."

"Not socially?"

"No."

"I believe them to have committed some crime of which you alone know," said the lady, pointedly.

Robert's wife was shocked. "Dear friend," she said, "we must select in this world. Life is short. The issues are great. We cannot afford to drift or act indiscriminately. I would not disparage a fellow creature, but we must have general principles to act upon. If sincere in my call I imply desire for acquaintance; this I have not. They may be my superiors in many things, but these people are not genuine; they spend before they earn; they outlive their income. I know this from those who have lost by them. They are idle; they are consumers rather than producers; they minister to the general good of society in a legitimate way. It is bad economy of interest and neighborliness to cultivate them."

"Are you not severe? Are not their lavish expenditures a general good to society?"

"Not balancing the evil of waste and extravagance, as some of the fundamental principles of political economy will show."

"You might impart your ideas and do them good."

"I am no reformer. Not good soil wherein to propagate my ideas! No; I've too much to do to take care of the beams in my own eye to try to remove 'motes' in general."

"That reminds me of the doctor's sermon last Sunday. By the way, who were those people with you at church. You always have some stranger in your pew; are always picking up 'queer fish' Ed says."

"Oh, that was Aunt Patty Rhodes and her daughter. They live way out on the turnpike road and never get a chance to come to church; I had the use of Mrs. Edsell's carriage, yesterday, and I sent out for them. I must own," said Mrs. Robert, with a smile, "I do enjoy making the Master's own feel at home in his house, and I find many who seem to feel no liberty to even seek a sitting there, because they possess neither silver nor gold."

Robert's affairs, as you judge, were improving. They only increased their industries and kept up all the old simplicity of living. There was always a little surplus wherewith to take advantage of opportunities.

Will Seely, a troubled, perplexed "good fellow" who was fast worrying himself into a dyspeptic, was a privileged acquaintance who frequently dropped in for an evening to listen to music and forget his money embarrassments.

"I don't see how you do it!" he said on one occasion, looking around the pleasant home, paid for and full of happy faces. "I don't see how you are so much better off than other folks!"

"Well, we gain by a loss in one direction," said Robert, in continuation of the conversation on "ways and means" begun half an hour since. "We leave 'worry' out in the cold. We don't take him into partnership with us!"

"I wish I could!" said poor Will. "What kind of bolts do you use to keep him out?"

"Living strictly within our means, come what may, if it makes us singular and misunderstood. This is one bolt and it shoves a little hard sometimes, but then it stays put. Earning all we can justly by steady work, each and all of us, is another bolt with a splendid fastening."

"Nonsense! there's some necromancy about it. You're all as full of play as colts; every one of you."

"The bow couldn't relax if it had not been bent pretty severely," laughed Robert's wife, who knew all about it.

Will Seely looked perplexedly into the glowing grate.

"The fact is you're all talented. Heaven has gifted you. That's where the laugh comes in. You eke out with your pen-labors and Ethel with her music and John with his drawings. I wish I was gifted!"

"What is it to be gifted?"

"You tell."

"Gifts are ready to flow in if we will put obstructions out of the way. Artificial living, costing too much time and thought, as well as money and anxiety, makes our ear dull to music, makes the tired brain unequal to clear perception; demoralizes the whole man. My wife and I don't claim to be 'smart' but we do hold ourselves like children obedient to the great laws of nature, which we do not think it safe to disregard. We work for what we have. We spend less than we have. We gather up the gold-dust of time and we can't afford to jump over every fence we come to just because the rest of the sheep do."

Seely laughed. "I feel like selling out and retiring with my family into the loft above my store. The spell won't last though! I know myself. If I should save something the first year, I should be so encouraged I should overspend double the amount."

"The devil got sick one day;
The devil a monk would be."

You know the rest of it! I wish I could stiffen up into moral courage though; upon my word I do! If my wife would join with me," he added meditatively, "but we might as well go to an asylum as to begin at our time of life on a new base. I wish I could, however; I wish I could!" said the troubled man.

"Each to his taste," softly uttered Madam Robert, in very pure French.

And pushing his way homeward, Will Seely pulled his soft hat down over his eyes and said to himself: "I declare the gilding and the gay colors always look 'loud' to me when I go home after one of my evenings at Robert's, and the girls' voices sound harsh and uncultivated. But it's my imagination I suppose. Maybe honest work in some way would refine my folks. Still, we live as handsomely as any one in the block; the young folks have always had all they want. We can't all be alike. Robert's family is an exception. They always were 'queer folks!'"

ARISTOTLE is praised for naming fortitude first of the cardinal virtues, as that without which no other virtue can steadily be practiced; but he might, with equal propriety, have placed prudence and justice before it; since, without prudence, fortitude is mad—without justice, it is mischievous.

DEBORAH NORMAN:*
HER WORK AND HER REWARD.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER XI.

DEACON STRONG was sitting with his eyes still upon the door through which Deborah had passed, the vision of her pure countenance almost as clear to him as though she were yet in the room, when, like one of those changes in a dissolving view which transforms beauty into ugliness, the thin, sinister face of Peter Maxwell was seen in its stead. The agent had glided in as noiselessly as Deborah had gone out. He came forward, his head bent and his form stooping in its usual cringing way, but with his keen eyes looking through half-closed lids intently at his master.

"What sent you here?" demanded the deacon, roughly, and with considerable impatience. Nothing could have been more unwelcome than the presence of this man.

"I went over to the mill, expecting to see you there," replied Maxwell, "and Mr. Trueford said he thought I would find you at home. So I came."

"What do you want? One would think you had some matter of life or death on hand, hunting after me so hotly."

"I don't know as to the life or death," returned his agent, "but I do know that there's trouble a-brewing."

"Trouble about what?" asked the deacon, his brows knitting, and the coarse, hard expression to which his face was accustomed settling again about his mouth.

"That girl's been in Sandy Spieler's saloon this morning."

"Who? Miss Norman?"

"Yes."

"Well, what of it?"

"More than you'll care to hear, I'm thinking."

"I'll hear first and judge as to how much I shall care afterward," said the deacon, trying to hide from Maxwell the strong interest his communication had aroused. "What did she do there?"

"She knelt down right on the floor and prayed until, they say, everybody's hair stood on end. Spieler got converted and has shut up his saloon."

"Faugh! That's mere talk," replied the deacon.

"Beg your pardon! I went to see for myself, and found it as true as gospel. The doors and windows were closed; and I saw lots of people standing about, talking and wondering. I never dreamed that she could fetch Sandy Spieler."

Deacon Strong dropped his chin and sat in deep thought for a long time. He was not only surprised but confounded. Maxwell broke in upon his reverie.

"If this thing is allowed to go on, there'll be the mischief to pay. We must put a stop to it some how."

"A stop to what?" queried the deacon, rousing himself.

"To this girl's going about in saloons, interfering with business. It's a nuisance, and will have to be abated."

"Her praying, you mean?"

"Yes, sir."

"I didn't know there was a law against praying," said the deacon.

"I didn't say there was," replied his agent, with some irritation of manner; "but there's the common law of trespass, and she could be stayed by that."

The deacon dropped his chin again and sat silent and very thoughtful.

"Closed his saloon?" he queried, looking up, after a few moments, as if in doubt whether he had heard aright.

"Yes, sir. Closed it up as tight as a jug."

"Extraordinary, to say the least of it. I never would have believed it."

"Nor anybody else. I, for one, thought Sandy Spieler had better stuff in him. She might have prayed until black and blue in the face, for all I would have cared."

"No doubt of it," said the deacon, speaking partly to himself. He knew the kind of stuff out of which Peter Maxwell was made.

"If the thing's allowed to go on, it will be lots of money out of your pocket," resumed Peter. "We've half a dozen houses that will not rent for a third the present prices if the liquor business is going to be interfered with by fanatical women who set law as well as common decency at defiance."

But, to the astonishment of Maxwell, Deacon Strong was wholly irresponsive as to any opinion or feeling in the case.

"Is that all you have to say to me?" he inquired, after Maxwell had expatiated on the subject for a while longer.

"Yes, sir. I thought you'd like to know about this affair," replied the disappointed and perplexed agent.

The deacon made a motion for him to retire, and Maxwell, with a crestfallen air, went out.

The day following was pay-day at the mill. Mr. Trueford had the pay-roll made out, and submitted it for supervision and approval. His kindly nature and pity for the poor, led him always to be as easy as possible with those who lost time from sickness or other causes over which they had no control. But the deacon's rules were very exact, and he was, therefore, rarely able to concede anything, though his heart ached as he looked into the disappointed faces and hungry eyes of half-starved women and children, for whom the rigid docking system often left but a slender pittance at the week's close. As we have seen, the overseer was a broken-down, spiritless man, afraid of his employer. He knew him to be hard and unpitiful; quick to punish any infraction of his rules; and sternly inflexible when his displeasure was once aroused; never hesitating a moment about discharging any one who disobeyed him, no matter what his position. And so, the overseer's necessities led him to be very prudent and careful not to give offence; while his native integrity made him faithful to the duties of his office, even though wrong was often done and suffering occasioned in their strict performance.

But having risen, as on the day before, out of his weakness and slavery, and for humanity's sake asserted his manhood, Mr. Trueford felt stronger and braver. Instead of turning upon him with wrath and indignation, the deacon had been moved by his remonstrances and appeals for justice as well as mercy. Could he not go farther? Now that the iron of this man's inflexible will was softened in the fire which had fallen upon it so suddenly, should he not strike while it was hot, and give it a new and better form? He had dared to speak out on the day before and plead the cause of the poor. Now he determined to follow speech by action, and lead the deacon, if possible, into a better way.

The overseer made no remark as he laid the pay-roll before his employer. Deacon Strong commenced examining it, his eyes passing from name to name, and along column after column of figures. Mr. Trueford stood a few steps away, watching his face intently. He saw it change after he had read a little distance, an expression of surprise rippling over it. Then the forehead contracted, and the coarse mouth shut itself firmly.

"What is the meaning of this?" he demanded, looking up from the paper. There was a shade of rebuking sternness in his voice, but Mr. Trueford saw that he was not angry.

"The time is all right," returned the overseer, quietly. "I kept it myself."

Deacon Strong sat with his eyes upon Mr. Trueford for almost a minute, undetermined what to say. The overseer was first to break silence.

"If," said he, in a respectful voice, "you do not approve the roll as I have made it out, I will alter it so as to conform to the old rule," and he reached his hand for the paper.

But the deacon held it fast.

"Sit down there!" He jerked out the command impatiently.

Mr. Trueford took a seat.

"I'm afraid of this!" said the deacon.

"We should never be afraid to do right," answered the overseer, in a calm voice.

If the desk or a chair had uttered this sentence, Deacon Strong could hardly have been more surprised. Mr. Trueford, his weak and pliant vassal, turned monitor and moralist! Mr. Trueford, who was not a professor of religion—who had no hope in Christ—who was under the curse of a broken law, and in disfavor with God! The deacon's astonishment kept him silent.

"If," added the overseer, gaining confidence, "there is a just and merciful God, who is all-powerful and everywhere present, it is safest to be like Him, and so deal justly and mercifully with our fellow-men."

"If!" exclaimed the deacon, catching at the doubt he thought implied in this word, a frown on his face, and a rebuke in his voice. "If there is a just and merciful God? If?"

"I do not say that there is, or that there is not," returned Mr. Trueford, his manhood still more asserting itself. "But what I do say is, that, if there be such a God, it is safest to be as much like Him as possible. And if He has given us a law, we must keep it to the very letter if we would rest in His favor. If I had believed in God as undoubtingly as you profess to believe, Deacon Strong, I would have been a truer and a braver man than I am to-day. I would have done the thing I saw to be right, regardless of worldly loss or man's displeasure. I would have rested in God, and waited for Him to lead me into safe and pleasant places."

The voice of the overseer grew impressive. His form seemed, in the deacon's eyes, to grow more erect, and his countenance to assume a dignity that half awed him.

"There is only one way to rest in Him securely," replied the deacon, "and that is through faith in the atoning blood of Christ. No effort to obey God's laws is any help to salvation. It is by faith that we are saved; and this not of ourselves; it is the gift of God. All attempts to keep the law are mere acts of self-righteousness, and not pleasing to God. We must come to Him in our vileness, and be cleansed through faith in the merits of Christ. It is in His righteousness that we become righteous. Accepting that, we are the sons of God and heirs of immortality; rejecting it, we remain in the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity, and will be lost forever."

The deacon warmed with His theme. It was the first opportunity which had presented itself for a long time to admonish his overseer, and point him to the way of salvation. But Mr. Trueford's answer took away some of his assured confidence.

"If ye would enter into life, keep the commandments." Who said that?"

"It was the Saviour himself who spoke," returned the deacon.

"Do you not suppose that He knew the way in which men should walk if they would gain eternal life?"

"Oh, yes. He came to show us the way. But He had first to suffer and die in our stead in order to open the way. He had to make an atonement for the sins of the world, and reconcile an offended God to His disobedient children."

The light which had come into the overseer's face faded out; and Deacon Strong saw in it the old dreary look of rejection which had always shadowed it when he talked to him about the salvation of his soul through faith in the atoning blood of Christ.

"I am so constituted, Deacon Strong," replied Mr. Trueford, "as not to be able to accept your plan of salvation. I can't comprehend it. It does not seem to me consistent with the nature of God, which is love. This substituted righteousness, which I see in most of your ordinary Christians, and which they profess to have got by faith, seems to me but a poor sham; the thinnest sort of a cloak; and fails to hide the selfishness that still keeps possession of their hearts. In business and among men, I find them quite as hard and grasping; quite as censorious and uncharitable; quite as neglectful of the poor, the sick and the prisoner as men who make no claim to having the love of God shed abroad in their souls as the reward of faith, not of obedience to His pure and holy laws. You must not be offended at my free speech. What I think and feel so crowds upon me that I must give it utterance."

His overseer seemed to grow taller and larger in the eyes of Deacon Strong. The respect that found a place in his mind on the day before, when Mr. Trueford gave voice to his real convictions touching the mill-owner's unjust treatment of his work-people, had grown stronger since then, and now a sentiment almost akin to fear took possession of him. The man was looking down into his heart and sitting in judgment upon his life; and not upon his life only, but upon the faith and doctrine whereon he rested for salvation. As in his first interview with Deborah Norman, so now, he felt the foundations of his trust shaken.

"We should never be afraid to do right," said the overseer, after a brief silence on both sides, coming back to the simple affirmation with which he had met his employer's doubt as to the expediency of abandoning the old rule of docking for lost time. "If God is just and good, and I believe that He is, though I cannot understand all His ways with men, it will come out best for us, even in this life, if we deal justly and mercifully with our fellow-creatures, though in doing so we sometimes sacrifice our worldly interests. Shall I tell you what came into my mind as I lay thinking in my bed last night? I think a great deal in the night-time, lying awake often for hours together."

The deacon nodded his assent. He felt a strange weight upon his bosom.

"It was this," said the overseer. "I was thinking about the poor people who work for us, and the miserable way in which so many of them live; and then this strange fancy came to me. I wondered how it would be if the Lord Jesus, who was in the world two thousand years ago, were to come again just now, and were to have a mill and poor people to work in it just as we have?"

He was looking steadily into the face of Deacon Strong, and was almost startled by the change he saw pass over it. The heavy mouth dropped apart and stood a little open; and the eyes dilated with an expression of fear. But this was for an instant only.

"Well, what more?" he asked, seeing Mr. Trueford pause.

"I wondered how He would treat them," continued the overseer. "If He would think and care more for the money He made out of poor women and children than for the comfort of their bodies and the salvation of their souls. If—" he hesitated for an instant, and then went on bravely—"if He would dock a poor sick girl, too weak to fill her tasks, at the rate of three days' wages for every two days lost!"

"Silence, sir!" cried the deacon, in a stern voice.

Mr. Trueford did not look abashed or frightened; but stood erect and loyal to his newly-recovered manhood.

"I cannot help my thoughts and fancies," he rejoined, in a firm but quiet voice.

"But you can keep them to yourself," said the deacon, with lessening severity.

"Pardon me, if I spoke too freely," returned

Mr. Trueford, a manly respect in his tones. "But it does seem to me that Christian men should, sometimes, have just such fancies as I had last night, and should ask themselves, in the light of Christ's teachings and example, whether if He were in the world now He would do as they do."

The deacon let his eyes fall to the floor. Mr. Trueford stood looking at him intently, trying to read his face. He had something more to say and wished to say it. For a little while he hesitated; then took courage and resumed:

"My thoughts went a little farther, sir. Will you not hear them? God knows I do not mean to offend."

The deacon's head bent lower; but he made no response.

"I thought how it would be," said the overseer, "if He were to come again and go about among those who call themselves by His name, and who regard themselves as in His favor. Who talk about having His love in their hearts; of being washed in His blood and made free from all sin; and of being elect and precious in His sight. I fancied I could see Him going into the stores, offices, shops and mills where these His disciples were busy at work, and observing how they kept their garments unspotted from the world. I thought I saw Him come into our factory, and go through every part of it, and stand and look at the pale, sick faces and wasted forms that crowd its rooms; and then go into the wretched little houses in which many of them live—some hardly fit for dog-kennels or cow-stables—and for which we charge them a rent larger in proportion to their cost than that of the handsomest dwellings in Kedron—"

"Silence!" cried the deacon again. "Silence, I say! You are going too far, Mr. Trueford! I will not put up with such unwarrantable liberty."

"I have nothing more to say, sir," calmly answered the overseer, letting his eyes fall from the deacon's face and turning partly away as though he were about to retire from his presence, "except this," he added, pausing and looking back, "don't hesitate about doing what you see to be right; for the right always comes out best in the end."

He stood for a few moments waiting for the deacon to speak. His last remark settled any doubt that might have been lingering in the mill-owner's thoughts.

"Let the pay-roll stand this week as you have made it out," said Deacon Strong. "But if any trouble comes of it, I shall hold you responsible." He added the last sentence in a tone of affected warning, and as a partial cover to his own sense of justice, which had been growing clearer and clearer under the new light that was streaming into his mind. A feeling of pride came in to bar an acknowledgment of his obligation to this man for the new light; for was not the overseer an alien from Christ, instead of a son through faith and adoption? and how could he, a child of grace, stand debtor to one who was yet a sinner? The deacon was straightened in his mind.

"The act must be your own," answered Mr. Trueford. "If you do not see clearly that it is right, don't do it. I am only your agent."

Never in all his life had Deacon Strong felt so baffled and so weak in the presence of any man as he now felt in the presence of this overseer, whom he had hectored and lorded it over until the poor man was, in common phrase, hardly able to tell whether his soul were his own or not.

But the truth had set him free. Rising above the level of his fears, his doubts, and his weak distrusts, Mr. Trueford had, for the sake of humanity, spoken the truth which he should long ago have uttered, and, lo! he found himself a free man, and strong in his freedom. He had a new faith in the right; a new sense of the fatherhood of God, and of the safety of those who, putting their trust in Him, held themselves to the law of justice and mercy in dealing with their fellow-men. He stood, consciously, on a higher level than this self-seeking Pharisee—we will not say hypocrite—and grew bold to admonish him; and such was the power of the truth he uttered, and the sphere of his new moral state, that Deacon Strong found himself weak and abashed before him.

It was a memorable day at the mill when the deacon's work-people received, on this occasion, their weekly wages. The pay-roll did not stand as submitted by the overseer. It had been gone over and over half a dozen times, and changed in twenty or thirty places; and the rule of change, singularly enough, was in favor of instead of against those who had lost time. Fractions of time, instead of being made units against the operatives, were dropped out of the account; and in several cases of known sickness, or very poor health, the wages were credited in full.

"God bless you, sir!" came with a sudden fervor and surprise from more than one pinched and stooping figure, as the outstretched hand took up from the deacon's desk the full pay, when only a part had been expected.

"But what's to become of me," said the deacon to one of these poor wretches, "if I pay for more work than I get?"

"Oh, but that will never be!" was the earnestly spoken reply. "We'll none of us ever forget you, sir; and we'll do more work for good-will than we've ever done for wages. We'll make it all up, and a great deal more."

Here was another surprise for the deacon. "Good-will" toward him from these people; and a promise of service for good-will greater than for pay! He tried to reject the declaration as only a form of words; but something in the tone and manner of its utterance held him fast, and the fear of loss which had troubled him died out of his mind.

When all the wages for the week had been paid, and the crowd of tired and in too many cases wretched-looking women, boys and young girls had departed—but few men worked in the mill—Deacon Strong and his overseer were left alone together. Neither said anything to the other about the scene which had just passed; though the mind and heart of each had been deeply impressed by it. In a few minutes the mill-owner went away and left Mr. Trueford to finish some writing that yet required to be done. When outside, he lingered for a short space of time, thinking deeply, and once or twice turned to go back, as if he could not leave his overseer without another interview. But at length he started off quickly, as if he were compelling himself to go, and took the way homeward.

CHAPTER XII.

DEACON STRONG was a "Sunday Christian." He crowded his religion into the first day of the week, and gave himself up to its observances with a pious abandon that was noticeable, and which gained for him, among those who never came in contact with his worldly life, the title of a "godly man."

When the noisy mill became silent on Saturday evening, and the deacon turned his back on the world and its six days' money-getting opportunities, he took up the garment of sanctity which had been laid aside at the previous Sabbath's close. His countenance assumed a more solemn aspect; his voice was pitched to a different key; his movements were slower; his manner more impressive. The business of getting on in the world had been pursued with untiring industry during the time allotted for that work; and now the business of getting to Heaven must be attended to with an equal earnestness and fidelity. The deacon was no drone—no half-way man. He believed in the doctrines of his church, and rested his safety on the thoroughness of his belief. He was a true soldier of the Cross, as he understood the sacred symbol; faithful to his colors, and ready to do battle with any and all whose standards bore not the peculiar legend inscribed on the one under which he was fighting. He had been in many conflicts—for, like the war-horse, he snuffed the battle afar off—and had discomfited many. His onsets were terrible. He bore down the enemies of his church with an impetuosity that nothing could resist; and no victorious general of an army could have been more vain-glorious than he in his hour of triumph.

To him, salvation was the result of a marvellous scheme, devised by infinite wisdom, in which God's glory was the first end, and man's rescue from destruction the second. His personal safety lay not in purity of heart and self-abnegation, but in his acceptance of the scheme. He honored God in this, and so was taken into favor, and made righteous by a transfer of divine righteousness. Thus he became a son of God by adoption; and a joint heir with Jesus Christ. Herein he had rested in a feeling of complete security.

But, on this particular Saturday evening, as he tried to withdraw himself from the world, and turn his thoughts to the pious things that were fitting for the Sabbath, he failed to rise into the old state of rest and spiritual confidence which he had regarded as the evidences of true discipleship. Deborah had taken him away from Paul and set him face to face with Christ, the Son of the living God, who spake as man never spake; and His words had come to him with a new and deeper meaning, and shaken all the foundations of the house in which his confidence dwelt. Now, more than in the two preceding days wherein his thoughts were immersed in worldly things, did the plain and simple declarations of our Lord accuse and rebuke him.

It was noticed in his family that the deacon was strangely quiet this Saturday evening; and that little outbreaks of wild and joyous feeling among the younger members were suffered to pass without rebuke. Soon after tea he went into the office, or library, attached to his dwelling and remained there alone until bed-time.

On Sunday morning the deacon was in his pew, wearing, as usual, his Sunday face. Sleep had composed his mind, and an hour's polemic reading since breakfast had steadied his faith, and brought him back to a clearer apprehension of the doctrines on which he had for so many years rested in conscious security. The nightmare which had oppressed him was passing off; his chest heaved more freely again; he sat erect, not doubting now—for to doubt was to sin. "He that doubteth is damned."

The Rev. Silas Deering, minister of his church, was a doctrinal teacher. In an age and generation when infidels, latitudinarians and free thinkers intruded themselves everywhere; when the very bulwarks of faith were being assaulted in the church as well as out of it; when sin did greatly abound, and the churches were making little apparent headway against the many evils that lifted their deformed and hideous fronts throughout the land, Parson Deering stood with his feet planted firmly upon the faith and doctrine of his sect, and held his people to their creed with an unwavering tenacity. Out of that creed he declared salvation to be impossible. In its complete acceptance was complete safety. He did not insist half so strongly on a good life as on a true faith. The good life was the natural sequence of a true faith, and would follow of course. It was not the good life that God accepted; but the faith that acknowledged and received Him. He would make all who so received Him pure and holy by an act of grace, and in an instant of time. The parson's text this morning, from Ephesians ii., 8, 9, fell upon the deacon's ears with a pleasant and reassuring sound:

"For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast.

"The great and essential doctrine of the Christian church, my brethren, is here declared with an explicitness of phraseology that leaves no room for misapprehension." So the preacher opened his subject, speaking slowly and with a solemn emphasis. "It is by faith that ye are saved; simple faith, and faith alone; faith in Christ and the efficacy of His atoning blood. Any and every other way leads to death and hell!"

He paused, giving a little time for his words to sink into the minds of his hearers.

"Not of yourselves," he resumed. "Mark the clear declaration! Not through works is grace received into the heart; but through faith only. It is because men in these latter times are drifting away from this central doctrine of the church, that the life of religion is dying out of their souls, and that infidelity is making such fearful progress in the land. In all ages, the tendency has been to reject the teachings of God and to try to get to Heaven by climbing up some other way. At no period has this tendency been stronger than now; and it is my solemn duty, as the God-appointed teacher and leader of this people, to lift my voice and utter a cry of warning. There is only one way to Heaven, and that is through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ and the washing away of our sins in His atoning blood. Keeping the commandments will not save us. Good works, be they never so perfect, will not save us; nay, being done in self-righteousness, they will only sink us deeper into hell! Only 'the righteousness which is of God by faith,' is of any avail to salvation. 'Ye are the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ,' says Paul; and again, 'A man is justified by faith.' And Peter is quite as explicit, when he declares that we are 'kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.'

"But ye know all this. It is the foundation-stone on which rest all the doctrines of our holy church. And what a blessed truth it is! What a grand and glorious scheme of salvation it reveals! Simple faith in the merits of our Lord and Saviour—nothing more. The utter giving of ourselves to God, that we may be made pure through the blood of sprinkling. 'No more of works.' Thank God, no! But of free grace! We sit down with folded hands at the Master's feet, weak, helpless, stained with sin, and cry out in our despair:

'Here, Lord, I give myself away,

'Tis all that I can do.'

And He accepts us through faith, and washes us clean. We rise forgiven. In an instant of time we pass from the bondage of sin into the freedom of Gospel innocence, and become the sons of God and heirs of eternal life.

"Let none deceive you, my brethren. It is by faith that ye are saved, and that not of yourselves—not of works—it is the gift of God. And if any of you sin—if any of you should fall through weakness of the flesh, or the subtle allurements of the devil, remember that you have an Advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous, who forever intercedes for you. Go to Him and confess your sin, and you will find Him faithful and just to forgive and to cleanse you from all unrighteousness. And let me warn you against any and all efforts to get back into God's favor through deeds of merit—through charity and good works. You may visit the sick, and clothe the naked, and feed the hungry, and distribute your goods to the poor, but these will avail nothing if you do not humble yourself before God, and ask in faith for a new application of the cleansing blood that was shed for you on Calvary.

"Oh, the blessedness of this way of salvation! Though our sins be as scarlet, through simple faith they are made white as wool. It matters not when nor where; it matters not under what conditions, or in what extremity. We may be bound and powerless to do any good thing; sick and in prison; in peril and nigh unto death; the waves may be closing above our heads, and but an instant remain between us and eternity, still, the everlasting arms are outstretched to save, and we have only to lay hold of them by faith, and all is well!"

As Deacon Strong listened to this re-affirmation of the doctrine on which he had so long rested for salvation, he became more and more assured in his mind, and less troubled about his relation to the wretched people who worked in his mill—"godless" people, who were out of favor with the righteous Judge, and objects not only of His displeasure, but of the displeasure of His people also. He felt safer than at any time since that visit of Deborah Norman, in which she set the plain words of the Lord Jesus in judgement upon his life, and made his heart faint within him as did the heart of Felix before Paul.

How erect the deacon sat now, self-poised and satisfied. His mind rested upon this doctrine of faith alone as a tired man rests upon a bed. He had been wearied by doubts and questions; but rest had come again; and in his new-found sense of relief he thanked God for so plain and easy a way of salvation. And with this sense of relief came a feeling of indignation against those who dishonored God by not accepting His mercy; and especially against those who questioned about the truth of this faith-alone creed, and asked with James, "What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith save him?"

In closing his sermon on this particular morning, the preacher, conscious that he had given the doctrine of faith so strong a presentation as almost to ignore good living as an element in the work of salvation, dwelt somewhat on the fruit of believing as an evidence of this change wrought on the soul by God's grace. But what he said in this part of his discourse made very little impression on the deacon. He was satisfied with the doctrine of faith alone as a soul-saving power, and did not care to trouble himself with lower things. The foundations beneath his feet were felt to be secure as the rocks, and he was content to rest thereon.

During the afternoon of that day, he spent an hour with his minister, discussing the theme of his morning's sermon, and getting new evidences of its truth. The poor rags of self-righteousness in which moral men clothe themselves, and then draw damaging comparisons between their lives in the world and the lives of believing and accepted Christians, were torn into tatters, flung upon the ground, and trodden under foot with indignation and contempt. The more men tried to please God by charitable deeds, while they rejected His plan of salvation, the more they offended Him; and their good deeds, if they remained out of Christ in the technical sense of that plan, would make their condemnation deeper and their punishment more severe. On the other hand, the vilest and most abandoned sinner, with no life of charity on which to rest for acceptance, had only, in the latest moment of conscious life in this world, to throw himself on the mercy of God, believe in the merits of His Son, and through faith be made pure as an innocent babe. Such a one would rise into the blessedness of Heaven, while the other would have only everlasting shame and contempt.

This was the doctrine held and preached by Parson Deering, and accepted by Deacon Strong. They believed also that, being in favor with God, their service to Him had special relation to the church, and that He did not look very closely into their lives in the world and among men, except so far as they held godly conversation therein, and kept themselves free from its pleasures, its follies and its crimes. To do this was to keep themselves unspotted from the world. Their duty as Christians was to remain true to the faith "once delivered unto the saints;" to observe all the ceremonies of the church; to give of their substance for its support; and to countenance and sustain all right efforts for spreading the Gospel, and hastening the coming of Christ's kingdom among men. To them God had committed a great trust, even a knowledge of the faith by which, and by which alone, the world was to be saved; and they could do no service more pleasing in His eyes than keeping the doctrine pure, and, so far as in them lay, by teaching and preaching it in their day and generation. The letter of the commandments must also be strictly kept. As to their spirit, the deacon had no finer sense by which to reach its perception.

The effect of this hour's conversation with his minister was to change entirely Deacon Strong's feelings toward Mr. Trueford. He was again able to set this man down to the lower level where he had always stood in his estimation. He felt angry at the thought of having been rebuked by one who was an alien from God, and under the divine displeasure; and particularly at having been led by him to set aside a long-established business rule, which he now saw could only bring loss and trouble. The doctrine of faith alone had its legitimate fruit again, and wrought in his soul the destruction of charity. Even his thought of Fanny Williams was not attended by the concern and pity that so deeply moved him on the day before. Who and what was she that he must trouble himself about her? If she were not able to do duty at the mill, that was her misfortune, not his fault. There were hundreds more like her in Kedron; and was that any reason why he should concern himself about them? Let their friends do that. Business was business. He was a manufacturer, as other men were merchants or bankers. He employed men and women for the service they could render, and paid them for that service. There the relation and responsibility began and ended.

As the day drew to its close, the mind of Deacon Strong began to withdraw itself from religious themes. He had enjoyed his Sunday privileges, and been largely strengthened in the faith and doctrines of his church. His satisfaction of mind was great; peace flowed as a river. Having done all that was needful to hold himself in favor with God, the current of his thoughts turned in an easy and natural drift toward the world, wherein his chief affections dwelt. His service of God was a constrained service, made in solemn self-denial, and refreshed only by the spiritual pride that set him above the great mass of outside sinners who were under condemnation and doomed to hell. He gloried in his "adoption;" in being an heir of God, and a joint heir with His Son; and expected to be a king or a priest in Heaven. If he had his choice, it would be a king; for then he would be in power and great magnificence.

Having, as we have said, done all on this particular Sunday that was needful to keep himself in favor with God, the current of Deacon Strong's thoughts turned in an easy and natural drift toward the world wherein his affections dwelt, and began busying themselves with questions of gain and loss. First and foremost came up for reconsideration his departure from the old, safe rule of docking his people. It had always worked well, he argued with himself, and saved him hundreds if not thousands of dollars every year. It was just, too; had he not settled that question in the beginning? An operative who lost a day robbed him of his profit on that day's work, and should be made to restore that profit out of the wages of his next day's work. Nothing, in his mind, could be clearer than this.

The deacon began to feel hard and angry toward his overseer. It was all Mr. Trueford's fault that the rule had been set aside at the close of the last week, and there would be trouble in restoring it. He let his anger rise so high as to result in a mental threat to discharge him as a punishment for his meddlesome interference. But self-interest toned this feeling down. His overseer was competent and faithful; a man whom he could trust implicitly. If he were only a Christian, he would be perfect; and yet, he had a latent feeling that if Mr. Trueford were to become a Christian, in his sense of the term, it might spoil him for the position he occupied. This reconciled him to the fact that his overseer was still in the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity.

No, he would not discharge Mr. Trueford. He would only read him a lecture of unusual severity, and frighten him by threats that he did not mean to execute.

Monday morning found the deacon restored to his old mental status. He was a child of grace; elect of God through obedience to the faith; and so all right as to his immortal interests. No, he would not be turned out of his way by a weak enthusiast like Deborah Norman, or by a Christless man like Amos Trueford. Who, or what were those that they presumed to sit in judgment upon him! He threw them away from him in thought and feeling as one would throw something vile or offensive.

Such was the deacon's state of mind when Peter Maxwell made his appearance that morning. There was a questioning look on the agent's sinister face as he advanced with his gliding almost noiseless feet and crouching figure, and stood beside the office table, his half-closed eyes hiding, as usual, their clear expression.

"Good morning, Peter!" said the deacon, in a firm, confident voice, almost smiling in his self-satisfaction as he spoke. The agent recognized the change which had come over his master's state of mind since their last meeting.

"Good morning, sir," was the cold response. Maxwell was not demonstrative.

"Anything new, Peter?"

"Humph!" The agent gave a shrug. "I should think there was if what I hear is true."

"What have you heard?"

"That every man, woman and child was paid full wages at the mill last week; full wages for the time they worked, I mean."

The self-satisfaction went out of the deacon's face. His brows fell; his mouth closed with the old, unsightly hardness.

"Who told you?" he asked.

"Oh, it's town talk!" answered Maxwell. "I've heard it from twenty different people."

"What is said about it?" The deacon was not wholly indifferent to the opinion of his neighbors.

"Some say the world must be coming to an end soon, and that you've got wind of it somehow." Peter's eyelids drew closer together, hiding even the color of the orbs beneath.

The deacon's lips parted in a grim smile. He was both amused and annoyed.

"And what else is said?" he queried.

"More than I can remember," answered the agent. "I heard one man say that he thought the deacon must be getting religion."

Maxwell had a chance to put in a thrust without much danger of getting hurt in return, and he could not let the opportunity pass.

"Who said that?"

"Len Spangler."

An expression of contempt dropped from the deacon's lips.

"He's not of much account in your eyes, I know," said Peter; "but Spangler is no respecter of persons, and will have his say. And I might as well tell you something more; though I don't fancy you set much store by his opinion, good or bad."

"Not much," answered the deacon, at the same time pricking up his ears.

"He said it was the best thing he'd ever heard of you; and that if this was the kind of religion taught in your church, he'd half a mind to join it. It was considering the poor, he said, and doing as you'd be done by; and that's what he called religion."

"He's a vile sinner and scoffer," returned the deacon, with some impatience of manner; but Peter saw that he was struck and moved by the language he had repeated.

"There's been a great deal of talk over town, and some feeling, at the way you've docked your mill-hands for loss of time," said Peter; "and many hard things have been said against you."

"People had better mind their own affairs," returned the deacon, sharply. "I carry on my business to suit myself; and it's nobody's concern but my own. If my rules are not liked, no one is obliged to work for me. My people are not slaves. They can go or come as they please. If they work they get paid for it; and if they don't work they don't get paid. That's the long and short of the matter."

"People will talk, you know, and there's no helping it," replied Maxwell.

"Let 'em talk! It's precious little I care." The deacon snapped his thumb and finger. But it was simple bravado. He did care, and Peter Maxwell saw beneath the thin disguise.

"And so it's really true!" said the agent, in affected surprise. "I didn't believe a word of it."

"Why didn't you?" demanded the deacon, slightly scowling as he spoke.

"Oh, because it isn't like you," answered the other.

Not like me! What do you mean?"

Throwing money away isn't your style, deacon. That's all."

The agent drew a little back from his master, who began to look dangerous. After the lapse of a few moments, he said: "There was a row at Harry Conlan's yesterday, and one of the windows got smashed in."

"What! A row!" ejaculated the deacon, showing surprise and annoyance. Harry Conlan was one of his tenants, and kept about the vilest drinking-den in Kedron. Unlike the deacon, he did not give one day in the seven to the business of saving his soul. To him all days were alike; or, if he had any different regard for Sunday, it was because his gains were larger on that day than on any other.

"Yes, sir. I thought you'd heard about it. It was an ugly row. Harry got a bad cut over one eye, where a man hit him with a tumbler."

"It wasn't on Sunday!" said the deacon, affecting a pious horror.

"If I'm not mistaken, yesterday was Sunday," returned Maxwell, who could cringe, or thrust, or be insolent, as the occasion might warrant.

"Does Conlan always keep his place open on the Lord's day?"

"Why, of course he does. That's his best day; plenty of idle men about, with Saturday's money in their pockets; and if he doesn't come in for his share he won't get another chance. It's the Sunday business that pays most of the rent," added Maxwell, with malicious pleasure. He wanted to stir the deacon's cupidity and set it against his pious scruples. "Take the Sunday business from Harry, and his stand wouldn't be worth two-thirds of what he pays for it now."

"But it's against the law to do business on Sunday," said the deacon.

"Except to sell liquor," remarked the agent.

"No; it's against the law to sell anything on the Sabbath." The deacon spoke with decision.

"Policemen, constables and jurymen read the law differently," returned Maxwell. "They find an exception in favor of liquor-selling, and refuse to arrest or convict. You know how that is as well as I do. You can't go to church on Sunday without passing half a dozen dram-shops. But keep your mill a-going, and see how soon the grand jury will take the matter up and put you into court."

"I'm sorry about this row at Conlan's." The deacon looked troubled. "I'd rather it had been anywhere else."

"So would I. But I haven't told you all." The agent put on a mysterious air.

"Then tell me all!" exclaimed Deacon Strong, impatiently.

Peter saw the anxious suspense that was shadowing his master's face, and enjoyed it keenly.

"The row came of a visit from that impudent Quaker girl, Miss Norman."

"A visit where? To Conlan's?"

"Yes, sir. They were in full blast yesterday morning, at the time you were in church listening to Parson Deering, when in came Miss Norman, and began to talk to Harry about the wickedness of selling rum. Now Harry is a rough sort of customer, and not the one to stand any nonsense of this sort; so he cursed her up and down, and told her to get out of his place in double-quick time, or he'd pick her up and set her bodily into the street. They say she didn't seem a bit frightened, but stood her ground; and a man who was there told me she looked more like an angel than a woman—but I guess he'd been taking a glass too much. Then Harry got furious, and, leaping over the bar, was about laying hands on Miss Norman, when somebody's fist took him under the ear, and sent him reeling against the wall. I don't know what became of Miss Norman, but I believe a man picked her up and carried her out. They smashed up things, and broke each other's heads for awhile inside, and then cooled off. It was a nice bit of Sunday work."

"Were any arrests made?" asked the deacon.

"Humph! Arrests! There wasn't a constable within half a mile of the place."

"Is anything said about it?"

"Oh, yes—lots."

"What?"

"It's said that you own Harry's saloon; and that it isn't just the thing for a deacon of the church to rent his house for a rum-mill; and a Sunday rum-mill at that."

The deacon winced.

"And I heard one man say," continued Peter—"I wouldn't just like to tell you his name—that he had serious thoughts of presenting Harry's place as a nuisance, and having you indicted as a party in complicity."

"Are you lying, Peter Maxwell?" exclaimed the deacon, starting to his feet with the sudden pain of this probing thrust of his agent, whose malicious temper he knew but too well.

"I have no occasion to lie," answered the other, coolly.

"Who said that?" demanded the deacon.

"I hardly feel at liberty to tell," was replied.

"Faugh! At liberty! Who was it? Speak out; will you?"

"If you must know, it was Jacob Lyon," replied Maxwell.

This man was a rival manufacturer in Kedron, who belonged to a church with which the deacon was at war; a man whom he not only hated with a strong sectarian hate, but with all the unhealthy rancors engendered by the antagonisms of business.

"Jacob Lyon!" There was a supreme contempt in the whole attitude and expression of Deacon Strong. "Jacob Lyon!" he repeated.

"Yes, sir. That was the man. I give you his very words; and, what is more, he spoke like one who meant what he said. He was down on you hard; and said he wouldn't give the snap of his fingers for the religion of a man who made gain by robbing his poor work-people of their honest wages through the week, and then took shares on Sunday with a prison-bird in the profit of rum-selling!"

All the color went out of the face of Deacon Strong. He reached forth his hands as one who sought to grasp a support. Passion contended with conviction; a sense of shame and guilt with burning anger. What could he do under such an indictment?—Retaliation was not possible. It would be like casting sensitive flesh against jagged rocks. The deacon saw his position, and cowered, mentally, before the enemy he hated and despised. If then and there he could have ruined him in fame and fortune, he would not have hesitated a moment about putting his hands to the work. He would have swept him out of his path with as little compunction as he would have felt in destroying a poisonous reptile.

(To be continued.)

WHILE I WAS DEAD.

BY ANNIE L. MUZZEY.

FINALLY emerging from the shadow that had enveloped me, escaping the burden that had oppressed me, I heard, as in a dream, some one say: "She is dead." Then there was an outbreak of sobs, and moans, and lamentations; of murmurings, of broken exclamations, grieving and regretful recollections distilling in tearful whispers of one to another: "How good she was!" "How dear she was!" "What a beautiful life was hers!" "Can it be that she is gone?" "Can it be that she will never speak, nor move, nor smile, nor sit with us again?" "Can we, O God, can we, must we give her up?"

Then the man whose passionate protestations of love had turned my heart from its first pure choice; and set all its pulses thrilling with wild, delicious pain, strode forward, and putting the wailing mourners imperatively aside, flung himself down beside the woman whose head seemed lying heavy on my feet, and raining mad kisses on the still, white face, gathered the lifeless form with convulsive tenderness to his heaving breast.

"Mine," he said, vehemently; "made mine by death! Now I have the right to say to you before the world, I love you, I love you, I love you, Evelyn Day, my life, my blessing, my hope, my angel, my inspiration, my all! Frown who may, cavil who will, condemn who must, no law or statute of man can hinder or restrain me from claiming you this hour as mine—mine absolutely, utterly and eternally, as I know, had your life been your own, you would have given yourself freely to me! Ah, that these pale, sweet lips might open only once to say what they were forbidden to utter in the flush and beauty of life and health—only once to say, 'I love you, Percy Le-grange—love you only, truly and wholly, my soul's elect, my Saul, my king among men!'"

And through all this wild, breathless talk he was dropping passionate kisses on the still, unheeding, unanswering woman of clay, straining her to his bosom in a fervor of despairing yet exultant love; while I, a real, living, breathing, vital presence, a being as actual and sentient as himself, stood unnoticed beside him, knowing his sorrow, feeling his pain, disquieted by his tumult, yet unable by word or sign or impression to manifest my sympathy, or to come between him and the senseless dust to which he had gone down in prostrate devotion. His soul, before my opened vision, glimmered and shimmered with reflected hues, like shallow water, ruffled and rippled by wind and pebble, soiled and turbulent with storms and inward strifes—no serene depths, no placid surface to mirror the peace and harmony, the blessedness and repose of the life upon which I was entering. Wide open were the gates between the realm of sense and the realm of spirit; but his face was set resolutely downward toward the darkness, and he would not see the light streaming out from the heavenly portals—the glory shining through the grim transparency which mortals call death. Into the gloom, and night, and horror of corruption he crept, seeking solace in the dismal triumph of undisputed possession at last, finding a brief, passionate pleasure in sounding the depths of his suffering, measuring the fulness of his loss, dwelling with slow, painful elaboration on each particular of his bereavement.

"O lovely eyes!" he groaned, kissing down the white lids over the fading orbs, "will ye never turn to me again with glad recognition, and the soft, warm light of welcome? O precious lips! will ye never part with the sweetly whispered words of affection for which my heart hungers with unutterable longing and pain? O pale cheeks! will ye never flush and glow with the tides of thought and feeling any more? Beautiful, floating hair, must your golden glory be shrouded and hidden in the darkness and dampness of the grave? O slender and exquisite hands, whose very touch was bliss, must you fall away into dust, and leave the tender offices of your life forever unfulfilled? God, my God! I cannot give her up! I will not give her up! Here in death I claim her as my own, and I will hold her to my heart thus, and thus until I die!"

And all the time, in the reality and beauty of the spiritual life, I stood beside him, and he would not perceive, and believe, and be comforted.

Was he so engrossed, so infatuated with that which had charmed and ministered to the material sense, that he could not be withdrawn from the worship and contemplation of the body, and lifted up to a conception of the higher power and graciousness and loveliness of the pure and unfettered soul?

I was grieved to the quick, but my love drew me and bound me strongly to him, and I could not, without intense pain, turn away and follow the shining ones who waited to guide me to other and sarer scenes.

Speechless, tearless, without outward demonstration of hurt or grief, Earnest Deville—the man to whom I had sworn an allegiance in which I had failed—stood apart, seemingly self-absorbed, self-sustained and undisturbed by the event which had so utterly overcome my later and stronger lover. Clearly I saw, in the minds of those gathered about in sorrow and sympathy, a doubt and question regarding the depth and certainty of his affection, and a swift comparison and decision in favor of the more demonstrative mourner.

"It is plain," they said within themselves, "that he did not love her so tenderly and profoundly as Percy, and that he does not grieve for her so deeply, and passionately, and truly."

Yet I saw, too, that the soul of this man, in outward manner so quiet, composed and, to the shallow observer, manifestly indifferent, was reaching out after me with infinite yearning, and that he had no thought nor care for the body, over which the other made such loud ado, simply because his love followed and clung with hope and faith to the spirit. Between him and the bright ones who had unsealed my vision to the mysteries of the inner life there seemed an interchange and communication of thoughts which soothed, comforted, sustained, strengthened and uplifted him, imparting the serenity, and repose, and peace of a superior condition—a serenity, and repose, and peace that I could not attain even under the influence of the angelic atmosphere surrounding me, for all my sympathies were with Percy in his stormy grief, and all my mind and strength were given to the effort to impress him with a sense of the reality of my existence, of the closeness of my presence, of the undiminished ardor of my love.

I felt that the angel guides who had waited to conduct and instruct me in the way and wisdom of the spiritual life, were turning slowly and sadly from me, and fading gradually from my sight, but I could not wrench myself apart from this man, who had so long and so strongly commanded me, without a degree of suffering as intense as though I were still visibly in the flesh with him, subject to his woes, his pains, his tempests, his despairs. Might I have drawn him up to the sphere of warmth, and light, and beauty to which angel hands beckoned me, I could have gone forward with gladness and absolute content, it seemed, but, held by the strong cords of love to one who would not lift his eyes above the dimness and darkness of earth, I was not in any sense free, and could not choose but stay with my heart, however I should long to flee away.

Ah, but it was bitter, bitter, to hear him raving and moaning over the woman dead, while the woman quick and living, waited beside him to comfort and inspire, and I was relieved when, at last, the worthless but worshipped body was laid away under the solemn charge of "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," for I had faith that thereafter he could more easily and naturally apprehend my real and continual presence with him in the life and work of the soul.

Yet was I doomed again to grief and disappointment. When he spoke of me, thought of me, he went shudderingly down to the grave, and moaned and groaned amidst its darkness and corruption; or he went back to the past when I said this, when I did that, when I was the joy, and inspiration, and comfort of his life, following me always with retrospective eye, as though I were forever gone—forever lost, a being who had been, but now, alas! was not.

Ah, you who have seen your loved ones float out on the tide of death, and railed at the cruelty of God, whose law so mysteriously divided you from your own, do you know that it was you that separated yourselves from them who are withdrawn from the perception of material sense only to be given more fully to you in the joy and comfort of the inner life? Do you know that they are grieved by your stony rejection of their continued love and sympathy, that their progress is hindered often by your downward, graveward, brooding thoughts, by your unreadiness, unwillingness to be guided to the sources of light and strength which they, with vision no longer obscured by the mists of earth, more clearly discern, and most ardently desire to open to you? Wearied and repulsed by such blindness, and deadness, and unbelief, the tenderest affection must be hurt and chilled, the strongest attachment weakened if not destroyed; yet I clung tenaciously to my earthly love, and since I could not draw him after me, I sadly turned my eyes from the beckoning brightness of the opening upper way, and lingered in the twilight of his lower world, pierced by his anguish, numbed by his despair through all the trying ceremonies attending the final disposal of the fair temple left tenantless to fulfil its last uses in the wise economy of nature's laws.

From the closed grave I followed him home, down to the secret places where his soul lived, and where, in the opaque sphere from which I was withdrawn, I had never entered. And I found, alas! that he did not dwell in a palace, that no such atmosphere of light, and purity, and beauty, as I had fancied, surrounded him in his solitude, that no such clear, tender, exquisite pictures of thoughts and impulses, as I had dreamed, adorned with grace of outline and harmony of color the inner sanctuary of his life, thrilling and filling him with inspiration to grand and noble deeds, prompting him to ceaseless yearning and striving after the good and true, holding perpetually before him the ideal which he seeks to make real. The haunt of his soul, of his actual, God-seen self, was dark, and narrow, and cold, as I had never conceived, with treacherous pitfalls, and secret places of sin that I had never known. In his heart of hearts, where he had sworn I was forever and forever enshrined, I found the pale phantoms of loves that had had their day, and last of all the covered face of a corpse over which he bowed himself in tears, and vowed that he could never love again. But a dead woman does not hold eternal sway over a man's affections. He is susceptible to the sympathy and consolations of the living. He may be wounded to the quick and broken upon the wheel of torture, but he is not beyond the reach and power of comfort. This man was not. Returning to him day after day in sheer misery because I could not choose but come until the bitterness of full knowledge and the pain of utter and repeated rejection had wrought our separation, I saw at last that the corpse with the covered face had fallen away into the dust and ashes of memory, and another face, with the bloom and beauty of youth upon it, lay on his bosom, flushed and glowing, as once the dead had been, under the tender ardor and passion of his eyes.

And I heard him saying: "So believe me, I love you only, wholly and truly of all women in the world, the dearest, loveliest, sweetest, best. If once I thought I loved another well, your precious self bears proof of the error that was not suffered to wreck our lives. Had death stayed his dart, and left with me the woman who I falsely dreamed could fill and satisfy my heart, I shudder to think of the gulf that would have yawned, dark and impassable, between you and me. But of a heap of dust, a phantom in the grave, we need have no dread. So kiss me, dear, and let no jealous fear, no troublous thought of one forever gone disturb your peace or shake your trust in me."

And this was the way that an ardent, glowing, impassioned lover talked, perhaps a six-month after the dear one, to whom he had vowed eternal fidelity, had vanished from the knowledge of material sense!

As I turned away in sickness and bitterness of heart, I found myself suddenly face to face with the clear, honest, aspiring soul of Ernest Deville, and the calm and repose of his purposeful strength, which had more than once steadied me in these trial days, penetrated me now with soothing and quieting power, and brought me into closer sympathy and communion with the spirit of Truth and Love. He was full of light and peace—this man, whom I had so misconceived in the dullness and deadness of my earthly vision, whose honor, goodness, purity, faithfulness, I had utterly failed to measure and comprehend until freed from the influence that had darkened and distorted every object on which I had looked. I stood eye to eye with the soul of things, and knew them as they are.

For above me was this brave, pure, loyal spirit in all the graces and attainments of the life which is not fully seen of men, and I saw him, even with the fetters of flesh upon him, living, tolling on a higher spiritual plan than I had ever gained, except in aspiration, hand in hand with angelic societies to which I had no passport save an upward reaching desire which could only be fulfilled by long and patient struggle. Yet his love, tender and true, drew me up and enfolded me in its safe, constant keeping, and I came to seek rest with him, finding the calm and comfort, the strength and encouragement that I needed in his steadfast and sincere nature that knew no variableness nor shadow of turning any more than the love of God.

But an intense longing arose in me that moment when his spirit caught me up out of the depths of bitterness and humiliation into the clear atmosphere of light and repose in which he dwelt—a longing to speak with him audibly in the language of the world from which I had passed, to make manifest to him, in the sphere of his labor and hope, the love, and sympathy, and appreciation which I seemed so imperfectly to express in the still communion of souls, and, with desperate effort, I put forth all my powers to utter his name, but only a feeble, unintelligible cry jarred on my sense, half-awakened to material life.

Slowly then grew upon my consciousness the impression of a hand softly stroking my forehead, and, as one rousing out of a troubled sleep, I opened my eyes and met the full, clear, steady, penetrating gaze of the lover who was present with me alike in the world of spirit and of matter.

I essayed to move, but some strange oppression weighed upon me; some fettering, white, death-like wrap bound me hand and foot.

"I am dead," I said, with a sense of something weird and awful about me.

"No! alive, thank God, alive!" Ernest Deville responded in a strong, fervent, triumphant voice, lifting me up and freeing me from the winding thing, with its shuddering suggestion of the grave.

I looked about me. The familiar walls of my own room greeted my vision, and through the open windows the breath of the syringas came in as I remembered—how long ago? Had I been dreaming only?

"You have lain two days in this cold, white, terrible trance, and they have called you dead," Earnest said, in answer to my look.

"And you?" I asked, recalling the experience through which I had passed.

"I watched by you. I could not think you dead," he answered, simply and briefly.

"Percy Lagrange—how is it with him?" I rapidly questioned, the vivid impressions of my dream, if I might call it that, still uppermost in my bewildered thought.

"He has been greatly overcome, but is now receiving tender consolation through the sympathetic ministrations of our Cousin Bertha."

And in confirmation, Percy's own voice came to me, with such a tone in it as I had marked with pain when I heard him say: "But of a heap of dust, a phantom in the grave, we need have no dread, so kiss me dear," etc.

I turned to the faithful friend at my side with outstretched arms.

"I died to prove your love, I will live to deserve it," I said.

And the kiss of an angel could not be purer, tenderer than the touch of his lips upon my forehead.

LABOR.—It is a mistake to suppose that labor is an unpleasant condition of life. It is a matter of experience that there is more contentment in attending to any kind of occupation than there is in looking for some occupation. Attend, therefore, to your business, and regard your business as being worthy of all your attention. Working men are apt to consider that their occupations alone are laborious, but in that matter they are mistaken. Labor of mind is generally even more fatiguing than labor of the body, and it is quite erroneous to suppose that others do not work as well as we do, simply because their work is different from ours. Labor is the earthly condition of man, and until the nature of man is changed, the want of something to do will produce all the horrors of ennui. Gambling and other reprehensible dissipations are all owing to the fact that human nature cannot support a state of idleness. To live without a purpose is to lead a very restless life.

Home-Life and Character.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY FIFSISSWAY POTTS.

THIRD SERIES.—No. 5.

HOW common it is if a woman is going away on a journey, or on a visit, to find her in the shoestore, perplexed and busy, looking over all kinds of pretty shoes and gaiters; and how often we hear her say: "I guess I'll take this pair, they are a little narrower across the foot;" or, "the heel seems very stiff, but they will get over that after I have worn them awhile."

The poor deluded dear! to think that she can visit, and be comfortable and chatty, in a pair of new shoes! Well, if a little bit of experience teaches her a lesson, it is well enough, perhaps.

A lady visited me once—she was very tired when she came—in the evening; I thought her very steps were tottering, and made her lie down. When she rose to go up-stairs to bed, I had to assist her, and really I felt troubled for fear she was seriously ill.

After we were in the bed-room, she said: "O Pipsey, I must confess! I'm not sick, but my new gaiters are one size too small, and very narrow, too. I want you to see my poor feet."

So I unlaced her gaiters and took them off. Her feet were purple and scarred, and a fold was in the sole of each, for they had been crushed out of all shape in the narrow gaiter. She bathed them in tepid water, and rubbed them gently, and when they had resumed their natural shape, and the blood began to circulate, she was comfortable enough. No woman is herself if her feet are tortured.

The deacon came home from Pottsville, laughing, one day last October. He said Jefferson Slater came so nearly missing the train that morning, that he had to run from the store into the cars with only one boot on. He was going to visit his mother in Michigan, and the last thing he did after he paid for his ticket was to buy a pair of new boots to wear.

I said: "Now, father, Jeff's visit is spoiled; you remember if it isn't, and find out about it after he comes back. Poor Jeff! I'm sorry; he should have known better."

About three weeks afterward, one morning after the mail train came in, father went down for the news, and when it was time for him to be coming back, I looked down the meadow-path, wondering what kept him, and saw him coming home by way of the road, in company with a man who walked like a poor old cripple. We thought it was a tramp, until they came nearer, when who should it be but our neighbor, Jefferson Slater!

Father laughed when he came into the house, and said: "Your prediction was correct. Those villainous new boots took all the enjoyment out of Jeff's visit. When he got off the cars at the City of Lansing, he hobbled about a mile on foot, and then took off his boots and walked the other four miles barefoot. He said he never was in such torture in his life; and, to make it worse, the weather was colder out there than it was here, and the road was frozen and knobby. I do say I felt sorry for Jeff, for he 'lotted so much on that visit with his mother, as he'd not seen her for nearly seven years."

We grew so tired of kitchen smells, that we persuaded the deacon a year ago into the notion of having new arrangements made. As soon as he gave his consent, we girls made our plans to have a new porch and kitchen at the south-east side of the house, to be thirty-three feet long and ten feet wide. The kitchen, ten feet square, was at one end, and the porch was wide enough to go over the cistern pump.

It is a charming arrangement; I could wish for nothing better for all the farm-houses in our land. A little of the early morning sunshine comes on the porch; then it is cool, and pleasant, and airy all the rest of the day. I sit out there and write, and oversee the work if I want to; the girls set the ironing-table there, or the sewing-machine, and we can all be busy carrying on our different kinds of work; and, best of all, we enjoy the pure, fresh, out-door air, and that is the most valuable consideration there is. My plant-stand is there, a mass of bloom, and foliage, and fragrance; a stand with the late papers on it; a rocking-chair, and sometimes a lounge. We can keep the door of the little kitchen closed, and its back window open.

I tell this because perhaps other homes need the same kind of an arrangement, and other women need the fresh airs of heaven free from the smells of the kitchen—the boiling, and the baking, and the stewing—of which one sickens and grows so tired day after day.

I had wanted another kitchen for years. One of my neighbors, an energetic little woman, told me how she had needed one, and they were not really able to afford it; and one day she asked one of her boarders what a small kitchen for summer would cost—not ceiled nor plastered—with upright siding, good floor, and roof, and chimney, and he told her he would make her one for thirty dollars and find all the material. He was paying her four dollars a week for boarding, and he built it, and she boarded him until it was paid for. I tell this, hoping it may help some other woman. Ours cost about three times that much with the big porch, and its wide roof, and floor, and upper ceiling, and paint; and then we used a good deal of stuff that we had on hand.

I've built a good deal in my life. I did tell you long ago how I used to handle tools, and what came of it. My folks will never tire of teasing me about the time I used heavy, two-inch plank for ceiling above the old fireplace, and how the poor work of mine came rattling down among the Pottses—and on the teakettle and the cat—one night as they sat round the fire enjoying themselves. We all had a very narrow escape.

Now, if any of you tired women need a summer-kitchen and can't afford one like ours, or one like my good neighbor's boarder made, why don't be discouraged, there are substitutes to suit all means. You can surely afford as good a one as our first one was. I'll tell you how that was, then you'll see.

A man who can plan, and contrive, and make something out of almost nothing, we call a "handy man."

Every neighborhood has its handy man, I am thankful to say, and I don't know how we common people could do without them, bless 'em! Our handy man was my school-mate, we sat together and studied out of the same book, and I rode on his sled, and we were very good friends from our babyhood.

We needed a summer-kitchen badly, and I sent for him and told him what I wanted, and asked him to look around among the out-buildings, and up in lofts, and among broken piles of lumber, and see if he could find material that would make a rude one. He did. He found stuff with two straight sides that answered for studding, some rather heavy boards that made upright siding, some stuff for the floor, and then roofing, that no one but a handy man would have thought of. The rafters were some sort of sawed stuff, and the shingling-lath some third-rate boards, split up. The shingles had done good service for twenty years on the barn, and about two-thirds of every one was quite sound and good; this good end he sawed off and used. The window was an old one, and put in in a way that it would slide off to one side when we wanted to use it. The door was rough, but answered the purpose as well as a better one. This little kitchen was attached to one end of the porch, and was one step lower. Now, it wasn't pretty, but with creeper-vines and morning-glories planted all round it and running up on poles, and a hop-vine shooting like a great column of green high above all the others, and then throwing back its surplus of loose, light, swinging leaves and tendrils—why, that little gray kitchen was a very marvel of beauty!

The handy man charged us a dollar and fifty cents a day, and he did the job in two days. Only three dollars! and, really, that little kitchen did me more good and helped me more than all the rest of the house.

Well, the same of a wood-shed, or wood-house; if you poor souls have to gather your wood up from the ground in all sorts of weather, you really must assert your rights in a kindly but decided way, and I'll assure you the wood-house will be forthcoming. Men don't think what an imposition it is to expect a woman to be prompt with her meals and her work, and all the time smiling and cheerful.

Coax them, and urge them, and insist on justice and your rightful dues, and in the time to come they will give you credit for the good you have accomplished.

While the handy man was building our porch and kitchen, he made two articles for me that I had always wanted; a nice, light, pine ladder that I can carry easily, and a stand to put my house-plants on. The stand has three steps and will hold thirty pots, and it has castors so that I can run it off the porch on to a platform, that I made out of an old door and a trestle, every night or during a shower.

He told me a great many new things, one of which you women will be glad to know, especially young women who are making preparation to live in homes of their own: how to make a mattress. We had a quantity of husks, more than we needed for our beds, and I had been wondering how I could manage to make a mattress.

"Well," said the handy man, "if you don't quite understand how the tick is made, you must go to the upholsterer's and see for yourself. You will find that the ticks are prepared in box shape, each corner is turned and sewed up in a straight line, then at each point of this line a narrow seam is run clear round the tick, meeting at the point where first commenced. You will need a long steel needle, made for tacking mattresses, a ball of carpet warp and some round pieces of soft leather. Fill the tick full of husks, very full I should say, for a husk bed will soon settle down and not seem full. Then spread them evenly all over it as possible, then sew up the opening where the husks were put in. Lay it upon a large table and thread the needle with double twine, bring the ends together and tie, the twine will then be four double, wax it well, thread on one of the bits of leather and push it down to the knot, then put the needle on the under side of the tick and push it straight through to the upper side, draw down closely, thread on another leather, cut the twine and tie the ends, drawing them down very tight. Do this way until the tacks are close enough to suit you. And if I was going to make a mattress," continued the handy man, "I could make my own needle out of one of the wires of an old umbrella. You know I could make a point to the needle and the eye is already made in them. We always use these wires to make needles to string apples with in the fall when we are drying fruit."

I was delighted with this bit of information, but I have not made the mattress, though husks are waiting. I think in preparing husks for beds there is no need of people taking so much pains preparing them. None but the finer and inner white husk should be saved, and there is no need of that being slit into mere strips, as it is generally done. I prefer the innermost husk, and it left whole.

He told me another little item that I might have known before. I was watering an ivy that grew in the house, and, though I was careful, I spattered some of the water on the wall-paper.

"Better," said he, "to fill a sponge with warmish water, and water your in-door plants that way; no danger then of spattering the walls."

I was wishing for a larger pot to set a geranium in—one with a hole in the bottom—larger than any of my empty ones; but there was none in the village.

"We'll manage that," said he, "if you'll give me a clean, new, gallon crock of the shape you want."

I did so, and he very carefully drilled a hole in the bottom of it, and it was just what I needed, and my geranium, that had been cramped and crowded, seemed, seemed to grow with a laugh and a shout after that.

A neighbor tells me how she makes cucumber pickles look smooth and plump. None of us like shrunken, flattened pickles, even if they do taste good. She fills her porcelain kettle about half full, and then fills it up with cold water almost to the top. Then she puts it on the stove and lets the water heat as soon as it will, stirring with her hand all the time. When the water is too warm for her hand, she pours it all off and fills immediately with cold water, and heats it as before. She does this nine times, and the last time she adds a little lump of pulverized alum to the water. Then she finishes her pickles by putting them into cold vinegar, and they come out round, and plump, and crisp. If one prefers spiced pickles, the spices can be put into the vinegar.

The same neighbor makes delicious cold-slaw. To a gallon crockful of finely shred cabbage she puts one cup of sour cream, two eggs, one half cup of vinegar and one tablespoonful of flour, well beaten together. She pours this over the cabbage in an earthen dish, and lets it cook until the eggs are cooked. Seasoned to suit with salt and pepper. This is excellent, and is to be eaten cold.

A girl-friend visited us lately, and she laughed heartily when we admired her trim little hat; she even blushed prettily, which was explained by the sentence: "Why, girls, I made this hat myself!"

Now of course we would be surprised and pleased, and that would make Em blush all the rosier.

I took up my penknife, sharpened my pencil, and said: "Now, Miss Emily Holt Waterford, you will please divulge. I have girls in every State in the Union, who will be glad to 'do up' their own hats, and if Pipsey tells them how to do it they will surely try it."

"Well," said Emily, "you see it is an old white leghorn braid; the first thing I did was to rip off the wire; then I gave it a good washing in clean, hot soap-suds. I rubbed it well with a cloth, then I put it into very sour milk, and let it be there till the next morning after all my chores were done. Then I wet up some cornmeal, and rubbed and washed it in that awhile, and plastered it all over with it. Then I hung it in the top of a covered barrel, and took an old basinful of live coals and sprinkled brimstone on them, and placed it on the ground, and set the barrel over it. You must be very careful and have the hat hung high enough that the coals will not scorch it. Cover it up closely, and about once every two hours get fresh coals and brimstone. When you think it is sufficiently bleached, brush off all the dry meal and dissolve some white glue in water and wet the hat. This is to stiffen it. Then put it on your block and shape it; fasten with pins, lay a fine white cloth over the hat and press with hot irons until it is dry. Then sew the wire round the edge, put in the crown lining, and your hat is ready to trim. When you want to color hats or bonnets black, go through the same process as for coloring cloth, and when dry, stiffen, block and press; but, before removing, varnish with one-half pint of alcohol, three ounces of gum shellac, and just enough Ivory Black to color. This quantity of varnish is enough for two or three hats."

I said to Emily: "I should have thought you would have had difficulty in getting a block to press your hat over, because this, though very becoming, is not the style, and milliners in general seem so to enjoy saying, 'That's not the style.'"

Em laughed and said: "That's what every milliner said when I asked to borrow a block to suit the shape of my hat."

"Well, what did you do then?" I asked.

"O Pipsey," she said, looking down, "you know there are some women who rise above every possible difficulty; you cannot corner them, or drive them to the wall; and our Jack says he thinks I am one of those. Jack said he could make me a block—he knew that he could; and the dear fellow was just as willing as though he'd been in the employ of a milliner all his life. But I contrived a substitute, and that was—a crock! It answered my purpose most charmingly; it was just the right size and height. When it came to putting on the trimming, I tended baby for our milliner while she did that for me. How prettily they can manipulate a bit of ribbon into a tasteful bow! Our milliner said I made a very good job of work, only that I should have used the heaviest iron we had while I was pressing. I am going to do up my sisters' hats, and I'm going to color and make over mother's straw bonnet. One has to be very careful and not inhale the fumes of the burning brimstone; it is apt to make her take cold."

There, girls, seems to me if you have any ingenuity at all, you can make a tolerably nice job of millinery if you follow out Emily's directions. If there is anything you do not quite understand, you must ask your own milliner, and in recompense for her kindness you must purchase anything you may require from her.

I always select hats for Ida and Lily; they never bought their own yet; and they are always pleased with my selections. I pay no attention to the style, because sometimes it is unbecoming to either of them. Pretty milliners shrug their shoulders and curl their lips, and say: "What strange girls! And they'd let an old woman choose their hats in preference to making their own selections! No woman could choose to suit me if she didn't know any more about the prevailing styles than you do."

When I come home, I tell the girls what the milliners say, and they laugh, and—oh, well I'll not tell what they do reply.

I never had as pretty a hanging-basket as I had last summer, and I want to tell you how I came to have such a nice one. I wanted to have vines run over the end of the new porch, but it was not made then, and the deacon said the best way would be to plant the roots of the Maderia vine in a box and let them be growing, and when the porch was finished, I could bury the box in the ground. But the job progressed very slowly, and the vines grew very fast, so fast that they ran on strings until they were ten feet long—very beautiful indeed. At last I grew tired waiting, it was the latter part of June then, and the idea occurred to me to cut off the strings a little bit at a time and slip them out and allow the vines to hang down. I did so, and by that means made a lovely hanging-basket in half an hour. I broke off the lower ends of the vines, and that made them send out new shoots and grow thicker. My vines remained green and beautiful until after the very cold weather in January. I think this is the quickest way of making a hanging-basket, and I hope it will reach you women readers in time that you may make the same kind.

This number of the HOME will find many of you planning your house-cleaning. Well, don't be in a hurry, and don't work too hard or undertake too much, and, above all, don't make fools of your precious selves. Take one room at a time; don't work all day; don't take all your stoves out and leave your rooms bleak, and cold, and cheerless as barns. Have a stout woman to assist you; let her do the white-washing, unless a man does it; don't try to imitate your rich neighbors just because you feel envious; don't scold your husband or children, and make them dine off their laps or eat cold victuals; and try and have one good cosey room all the time. Go about your work gently and quietly—many women think they are not working at all unless they are bustling, and clamorous, and making everything rattle and bang. It is a good plan to clean shelves, and cupboards, and closets at odd spells, beforehand. It is a great help, one will find, to have all such little nooks and corners in order before the work of general house-cleaning begins. Whole days can be saved by attending to these little things when one is not hurried. Let your work be governed somewhat by the weather, if the wind blows from the north-west, shape your work to suit it; if the sun shines and the airs come softly from the south, your work need not be confined to in-doors; in the former weather you can have a fire in your sitting-room, and rip the carpet and place the strip next the wall that came in the middle; if the latter, you can wash windows and woodwork. If you need painting done, buy the prepared paint and put it on yourself.

Ida painted our doors and window-frames last summer, and did it so well that one of the brothers said: "Who did the painting? Jack Miller?"

"No, little Jack Potts did it," she answered.

"The same little fellow who does the papering, too?" he asked.

"The very same," was the reply.

Papering is hard work for a woman, but she can do the measuring, and give orders, and assist, and see that it is done exactly right. Never paper over old paper, or on white-washed walls or dirty walls. Wash them thoroughly and wipe them, and then wash them in water in which you have put ammonia, vinegar, strong borax or soda, let them be perfectly clean.

THE MOUNTAIN WAY.

BY MRS. M. O. JOHNSON.

NOT long ago, two gentlemen, travelling in Europe, attempted the ascent of one of the Alpine mountains. Though, of course, toilsome, it was delightful. The mountain-side was clothed in the varied beauty of vineyard, forest and grassy slopes, sometimes crossed by little streams. Farther up, the path became more difficult; but even there was the grandeur of the glacier, and the increasing beauty of the prospect.

When near the summit, a sudden gale arose. Though it would be a real disappointment to give up the attempt, after all their toil so far, especially as their time was limited, the gentlemen thought it the part of discretion to return. The wind was blowing so fiercely that they could scarcely keep their footing. But the guides came to their side, saying, in a cheery, resolute way: "Take our hands, and you'll do it!"

With hands firmly grasped in those of the strong, robust, brave mountaineers, the ascent was in a few moments accomplished, and they stood, rejoicing, on the summit.

What a beautiful illustration of our life-path is this mountain way! All day those guides had walked beside the travellers, seeming scarcely to aid them at all, except, perhaps, a moment now and then, in crossing a stream, or climbing over a rocky pass; but ever alert, ever watchful, and at the first real peril, the first great need, holding out the strong, sure hand, and almost lifting them over the rugged way, till the mountain-height was won, and before them spread, in matchless beauty, hill and vale, forest and river, green field and silvery lake.

So we walk on, through the green pastures and beside the still waters of our home-life, perhaps with hardly a thought of danger or possible grief; hardly, it may be, recognizing, or even seeking, a Father's guidance and care. Yet His all-loving, all-wise Providence is about us still, by night and day, shielding and guarding us in a thousand ways, warding off unseen dangers, aiding our weakness, though we may be unconscious of aid, guiding us all the way; and at the first great peril or pain, temptation or difficulty—the first moment we turn our faces to Him, and reach out our feeble hands, we feel His strong, sure clasp, and are lifted over the slippery rocks: so onward and upward, sustained by His arm, comforted by His love, cheered by the hope He sets before us, at last our feet touch the shining heights of life eternal!

BORROWING TROUBLE.

ALTHOUGH we know very well, or may know, if we will but reflect, how useless all anxiety for the unseen future must be, there is nothing, perhaps, to which mankind are more strongly addicted, than concern and solicitude in regard to apparently impending future evil and misfortunes. The Lord, well knowing this propensity of human nature, therefore, wisely forbids all solicitude for the future, bidding us let the morrow take care of itself.

Perhaps a few considerations may be presented which will assist us in putting away these forbidden anxieties, and trusting with a more complete confidence in the Lord's providence.

First: we do not certainly know that the expected evil will, after all, take place. And we may be able to recollect frequent instances in which we have suffered great anxiety from the anticipation of calamities which were never realized.

Secondly: if the trouble which we look for should take place, it may not be so great, or so disastrous in its consequences, as we suppose. And it may be well to observe, that when great and severe trials and misfortunes do overtake us, they more frequently come entirely unexpected and without warning. Thus we are mercifully spared the pain of their anticipation.

In the third place, however great the coming evil may prove to be, we may be better able to bear it, or better provided against its mischievous consequences, than we fear we shall be.

Fourthly: whatever the future may have in store for us, we may be sure that no evil can befall us without the divine permission; and that, however difficult it may be for us to believe it, nothing is permitted to befall us without respect, directly or indirectly, to our future good. And we may, if we have had years of experience, sometimes have been able to see, that events which were deemed calamitous at the time of their occurrence, have proved beneficial in their consequent results, either in respect to our temporal or spiritual welfare. And we might perhaps still oftener have proofs of this, especially with regard to spiritual things, if we could be impartial judges of ourselves and our own real needs. Even if we seldom see these proofs, or never plainly, we have still no good reason to doubt the divine mercy and goodness; which we may reasonably expect will be made sufficiently plain and manifest to us in the life to come.

But none of these considerations will be of any use to us unless we believe in the Lord and His providence.

OUR future grows out of our present, and only by wisely and diligently using the powers we have, do we walk in the path of Divine Providence, and prepare for the blessings God has in store for us.

WE should do our present duties in the best possible manner, and trust in the Lord for the result. The present is in our power; the future we dream of may never come. If we do our best now, using every talent we have, we are certain to be in the best condition to receive any future good that may await us.

IT is often not difficult to admit the overshadowing presence of Divine care, and the all-penetrating influence of Divine Providence as a doctrine; but it is not always so easy to acknowledge it practically, and in our own case. Yet this is the very thing wanted. The doctrine only descends as a source of strength, purity and consolation, when we recognize it in its application to us in every circumstance of life, the bitter as well as the sweet.

The Home Circle.

FROM MY WINDOW.

BY LICHEN.

No. 12.

OLD winter has gone at last, and his lovely daughter comes "trailing her green robes over the hillsides and meadows," as she gayly trips along. The breezes sport with her hair, the brook leaps up and laughs in her face, as it goes dancing over the stones, sparkling in the sunshine. She flings white and rosy blossoms at the trees, and anemones and violets spring up beneath her feet. The birds in every tree-top welcome her, and the young leaves hasten forth to rejoice in her presence. O beautiful daughter of winter! lovely art thou in the freshness of thy youth—welcome are the blessings which thy hands scatter on every side. Thy smiles are more prized by the waiting children of earth than are rarest gems set with precious stones; for in them lie promises of golden grain and rich fruitage; of food and raiment, comfort and pleasure. Oh, the delight of roaming through the grand old woods, watching all their hidden treasures opening into new life! I know just where the violets' blue heads peep up beside fallen logs and tree roots, where the brown leaves have sheltered them so long from the wintry cold. I remember the handsful I gathered the last time I wandered over the hillsides, and through the wood, in the bright April sunshine, and the sweeter sunshine of youth and health. I know the dogwood is spreading its white banners to the breeze on many a sunny slope. I can see through memory's window the very spot where one stands, just at the edge of the grove, lifting its snowy tent from amongst the undergrowth of young oaks and sumach bushes. The slope in front of it covered with fresh young grass and starry forget-me-nots, reaches down to a tiny brooklet singing through the meadow, where the rabbit and field-mouse come to drink, and birds bathe and splash in the cool, rippling water. The sunshine is just as bright, the birds sing as gayly, the flowers bloom as sweetly as in those days so long ago; but something is gone which can never come again with any returning spring. Oh, youth and health! how beautiful ye seem when lost forever!

These soft, balmy days stir my soul as no others can. I feel like reaching out my arms toward sky and trees, and clasping something—I know not what. A feeling of longing and yearning. Do others have it, I wonder? Such days used to fill me with inexpressible pain and sadness, when I could go out only a few moments in the sheltered porch, and looking around at everything in nature springing into new life, while my own life seemed withered and dead, would think of past springs whose beauty and joy were gone forever. But as the years go on, and I grow more accustomed to it, and am able to see a little more of the outer world, these feelings gradually cease. Nature takes on now and broader meanings to the earnest watcher of its revelations; and though sometimes a tinge of melancholy mingles with the sweet pleasure which I now feel in viewing these scenes, it cannot destroy it. I know there is an eternal spring, where I shall find what earth has lost for me; and this is sweet comfort. I know the beauty of earth and sky around us here are only types of a higher, holier beauty there, where it is fadeless, immortal.

The days grow warmer and longer; the hyacinths, and jonquils, and narcissus have had their brief season and are gone, but the garden borders are still gay with tulips and daisies, and the blue iris raises its stately head to be admired. Then the rosebuds form, and grow slowly toward perfection—closely watched by the children's eager eyes—and at last open into bloom. Pink and white, yellow and crimson; an almost endless variety of shades and forms, and almost every yard is brightened by their presence. The May skies look down upon it all, May breezes blow in at the open windows and scatter rose-petals upon the floor. Bees are humming amidst the cloverbeds, butterflies sip the sweets from every flower and children's voices ring out in merry laughter from garden and meadow, orchard and street—wherever their busy feet can go.

Here comes Floy, up the garden walk—her hands full of flowers—singing, "Oh, charming May! oh, charming May!" charming she is; like my white lilies—so fair and pure-looking. Surely none but a lovely character can develop in such an outward mould.

A few days ago I left my window for a drive with a friend, to take a peep at the world which lies beyond my little boundary line of vision. First we drove down the busy streets, where the shop windows were gay with new goods, displayed to attract the attention of the passer-by, and merchants stood at their doors to welcome the coming customer. Groups stood on the sidewalk discussing the affairs of the day, or busy men hurried up or down on their various errands. Country wagons, drawn by mild-eyed oxen, stood in the middle of the street, while their owners bargained off eggs, chickens, butter, rag-carpeting, etc., for "store-goods." The little boy at the peanut-stand was selling off the last of his stock preparatory to going into the strawberry business, which will, in its turn, give place to the dewberry and blackberry. Everything seemed full of life, to the constant inhabitant of a quiet room, in a quiet neighborhood; for I no longer live on the busy highway, and this sheltered valley has few sights and sounds belonging to the noisy world. Leaving the thoroughfare, we turned to take a look at the river, winding like a blue thread amongst its banks, edged with cottonwood and maple. Lying so calm and still in the sunlight, it was hard to realize that a deep, swift current lay beneath the placid surface, bearing it away to the sea. Driving back through another part of the town, we passed most of the prettiest residences, whose yards were bright with roses, honey-suckles, clematis and a variety of annuals. Occasionally we stopped before the house of some friend, and chatted with her a few minutes at the gate. Then we met a group of young school-girls, who each had a word of pleased surprise at seeing us out. On our way home, we met a picnic party returning from a day in the woods. Some were in wagons, some in buggies, and a few couples on horseback. All the younger portion of them seemed in a merry mood. One wagon, drawn by a pair of handsome black horses, was decorated with an arch of evergreens and tiny flags, and contained a crowd of gay girls and boys. Rosalie and Edna were amongst them, crowned with hawthorn blossoms, their broad-brimmed hats adorning impromptu flag-poles. Edna's apron was full of ferns, and Rosalie held a small squirrel in her lap. Each greeted us with a gay salutation, and the boys all lifted their hats, and as the wagon passed on they commenced singing a favorite glee. Soon they were gone from sight, and in a few more minutes I reached home, tired and happy with all I had seen and enjoyed in that hour of freedom, the remembrance of which will remain a long time, though the day, with all those lovely spring ones yet to come, will soon be numbered with the past.

"LICHEN."

DEAR "EARNEST:"—Shall I give you a pen-and-ink portrait of your "LITTLE LICHEN?" I do not like the name she has chosen, for she more closely resembles the white clematis or virgin's bower, which clings so gracefully to whatever presents itself, filling all hearts with the fragrance of its blossoms and doing its best to beautify the world, even if it is confined to a "window." She is neither small nor large; fair as a lily; brown eyes, and has a wealth of auburn hair that ripples in the most beautiful waves. So much for her person. You can form some idea of the soul from the faint glimpses you get from her window; but you can scarcely realize what a bright spirit of Christian fortitude shines out of that room, the rich fruit of a life mostly made up of sorrow and sickness.

ONE WHO KNOWS AND LOVES HER.

QUERIES.

QUERY No. 1.—Will some good mother please tell me how to teach my boy the true use of money? I want him to be generous and just, neither a prodigal or miser.

QUERY No. 2.—How can I teach a sensitive, imaginative child, one who is timid, to be brave and self-reliant? My boy, who is nearly four years old, and was born and lives in the city, is afraid of all loud noises. A fireman's parade with music, a company of soldiers, and even the striking of the fire-alarm bells, sends him crying into the house; or, if in the house, he runs to my side in evident terror. I do not know that he ever was frightened by seeing a fire, or in any way, except that it is the loud noise.

QUERY No. 3.—Is it not best, in the case of nervous, imaginative children, not to talk much on religious subjects, but rather to let children see by your "daily walk" that you have firm religious principle? That a faith in God and love of the same, as our Heavenly Father guides us in all our actions?

QUERY No. 4.—Will the good mothers, aye, and the grandmothers, who read the HOME, please give us the benefit of their experience?

VARA.

CANADIAN "PEN-TALKS."

HOW busy the children are! Johnnie, who has just arrived at the dignity of thirteen years, thinks he is old enough to help papa, and with a one-horse plough is working in the orchard behind the barn. Maysie and Nan, the next two "steps," are busy in the garden preparing the ground by fine raking for the amaranths and other immortelles that are to be grown there, and which occupy a good deal of their leisure in summer and winter. Every other day these flowers must be gathered and tied into little bunches, then hung, head downward, in a dark room to dry, and when the autumn days are dull and sunless, we bring out our store of flowers, grass and mosses to be made into winter bouquets for the Christmas markets. Just now the plants are but two-leaved mites in the hot-bed, and will soon be ready to transplant, when, with water-proof and clogs, our little girls will take each damp, cloudy evening for their work. Mary is busy sowing herbs—the mint, thyme, sage, worm-wood, rue and lavender; each has its place in her garden plot, for she designs to be a doctor some day, and is always stowing away in her garden some healing herb, or curative, to be used in that coming time.

Will and Jamie are still following their usual employment, hunting for caterpillars' eggs. All through the long winter months, when we are snowbound, the recess was spent in a scamper to the orchard, where the bright eyes and eager hands searched for the rings of the tent-caterpillar that proves so destructive to our apple-trees in May and June. In order to encourage them in the good work, papa gives a cent for every dozen of the nests gathered, and very often has to count several hundred, after a successful raid. The little ones, who have only mother for a teacher, and study their lessons in the interval of doing pleasant tasks and household duties, read with great interest anything pertaining to entomology, and were both amused and instructed by a clever article in "Arthur's" of last year, called "Our Insect Friends," which served as a reading-lesson for a class of three scholars several days.

How do you manage with so many children? It is very common for friends to make this remark to me; but I can do nothing but wonder when I hear it, and sometimes find myself able to pity those who have but one or two children, often more trouble than half a dozen who are early taught to be self-reliant and helpful to each other. And if a mother is truthful and honorable, as well as loving and kind, scorning broken promises and petty subterfuges, her children will not be so likely to become dishonorable in their dealings or unreliable in their character.

Ours is not by any means a perfect household. Sometimes when recess comes, and the boys tumble out of doors for a roll in the snow, or to sail toy boats in some miniature pool, I can see from the window Will and Jamie stop in their play and begin to tussel for the mastery on some point of importance; but a glance at the window where I am sitting is enough to quell the tumult, or if I have to go outside I need only say:

"Let dogs delight to bark and bite,
For God has made them so;"

and the little rebels are instantly ashamed of letting their "angry passions rise."

And now after our six months winter (for the snow fell early in November), the trees are beginning to bud, and among the maples and elms we hear that the birds have come. I open the windows to the sun, and see already budded the fragrant hyacinths, the beds on the lawn are dotted with the fragile snowdrops, and crocus purple, yellow and white, while to my mind comes the refrain of a sweet poem that always haunts me at this season of the year:

"Sing, robin, on the budded spray,
And sing your blitheest tune,
Help us across these homesick days
Into the joys of June,"

A TRUE LIFE.

TRUE, from the Anglo-Saxon træowe, faithful; German from trunen, to trust; and, as we have it, conformable to fact, faithful, loyal. Life, from the Anglo-Saxon lif, body; German, leben, to live, that is, state of being, existence.

So a true life is faithful to live; in other words, to live a life conformable to fact. But do we take the facts of life and live them? Instead, we seek what is beyond us, scarcely ever content with surrounding circumstances; we are constantly grappling for something, and even if we seize and realize its possession, the novelty wears off, and it is another something of the past. That is not living a life of facts, a practical existence, thereby making it a true one.

It is not left to men or women of high intellectual powers, remarkable genius, men of science or others whose goodness or greatness is heralded through the land. It lies within us all to lead a true life. Live for the hour, for we know not what a day may bring forth. Do what lies before you, conscientiously knowing it to be your duty, even if other occupation or employment would be more to your taste and carry out ambitious thought; do it with your might, and if an all-wise Providence sees best to bring your day-dreams to realization, take them with a thankful heart as gifts to be returned.

Many a true life passes by unnoticed in this bustling, working world, where all seem for self. The cry for Number One echoes and re-echoes over hill and vale, mountain and glen, putting us to shame as telling of life helping life; even the minutest bud peeping beneath its sheltering leaves, show how One above made all for each other. Still, yet the cry: "I am for number one!" Not two, three or thousands. "No! I took care of myself, let others do the same."

Ah! I hold that a true life is one ever doing known duty with gentle patience; giving, lending; now a smile, perhaps a tear, whichever is needed in life's battle of toil and struggle. What sweeter comfort than to feel that you have dried a tear or brought a smile on a weary face; a trifle in the day's round, but it is another link in the golden chain that binds a true life from this to one infinitely greater, broader, grander and truer, which is the sure reward of one, who through trials, temptations, griefs and sorrows, passes away to be forgotten; aye, yes, forgotten, as Time reaps this yearly harvest of things that were and are not; but taken up into the fold, where existence is endless, to everlasting bliss. MY GIRLS AND I.

BY CHATTY BROOKS.

SECOND SERIES.—No. 5.

I SAW Elsie washing a pair of gauntlet gloves the other day; they were gray lisle thread and not soiled at all except the fingers. She ripped off the wide wrists, and when the gloves were dry, pressed and stretched them, and put the wrists on again. If this is done carefully they will look as well as ever they did.

She and Mary were ironing their print dresses Saturday; both were made with ruffles alike, only the ruffles on one were cut bias, and the other straight. I observed that the dress with the bias ruffles was a great deal harder to iron than the other, and took a good deal longer, and, when done, looked no better. A bias ruffle is harder to hem, too.

We were speaking of hats yesterday. Josephine says she has worn her hat, a black Neapolitan, four years, both summer and winter, and every girl in the Institute thinks Josie's hat is the prettiest one in Millwood. So we concluded that black Neapolitan was the cheapest, and best, and prettiest, and most economical hat worn. She says fresh pansies, and rose-buds, and a green spray, and a new ribbon, makes a summer-time hat of it; and heavy ribbon, a dark crimson rose and a bunch of thick, dark, tropical leaves transforms it into a substantial winter hat.

Josephine showed the girls the scrap-book she made during the holidays, last winter, and they are delighted with it, and now every girl has a little box into which she puts every pretty poem, good recipe, fine wood-cut or funny picture she finds. Josie told them it might be three or four years before they would have enough to fill a scrap-book, but to be saving of good things and in the end they would be well recompensed. Hers is as entertaining as a good book. The choicest of fugitive poetry and the funniest pictures are in it. She made it out of a patent-office report, cutting out every third leaf. The paste must be made smooth, of flour and water, boiled until it thickens, and a cloth laid between the iron and the page when it is pressed. Only a few pages must be filled at one time.

The girls had public society one night a few weeks ago, and Josephine and Mary were appointed for discussion.

Two days before, a boil came in the dimple of Mary's chin, red and inflamed, and it began to swell and fill out the curve between lip and chin, and she despaired of taking any part in the discussion, but Josie stopped it by wetting it with spirits of turpentine three or four times. She said it was not a wise plan, but under the circumstances it was right. The boil disappeared and Mary took the negative side of the question and gained it.

Boils indicate impure blood, and, ordinarily, such treatment would not be advisable.

Through the winter our handkerchiefs all became stained and yellow, and I proposed to the girls on the last washing-day that I would bleach them white. They gathered them up, and I put six cents' worth of oxalic acid in a gallon of boiling water, poured it over them and stirred them up and let them remain in it until the water was cold, then I rinsed them and laid them out among the patches of green grass and they were soon as white as snow. Our little green back yard makes a good bleaching-ground.

Wednesday Morning.—I have a good joke on two of the girls that I want to tell you of. They sleep in the same bed-room that I do, and when they came up to bed one night I heard one say: "She breathes as though she were asleep."

"Yes, she's asleep," said the other, "and now I'll show you the note that I received to-day. It is from Fred Wilkins, the young law student at Simmons's—you remember him—as proud a little fop as ever flirted a cane, and he thinks every girl in Millwood is in love with him. This note requests a private interview, on next Tuesday evening, and I don't know how to answer it, and I had a mind to show it to Aunt Chatty and get her to write a reply. Mother told me I must keep nothing from her."

"Oh, don't you hate to show her a letter from a young man? I would."

"No, no more than I'd hate to show it to a girl, and then she'd know how to answer it better than any girl would, you know," was the trustful reply.

My heart warmed toward the dear girl, but I breathed on regularly, as though I were asleep and dreaming.

The next morning she took me aside and showed me the young man's note and asked me to write a reply for her to copy. She said: "Of course I want no interview with him, but then, Auntie, don't tell him in a cross way that would make him angry; you know his mother died last winter, poor fellow, and we wouldn't want to make him feel badly at all. Tell it to him easy as you can, Auntie," said the dear, tender-hearted girl.

Then I said in the note it would not be convenient for me to grant an interview on next Tuesday evening, presuming that he would take a hint that no evening would do. The young man showed the reply to the professor's assistant and made the remark that it was easy to see that any other evening would do, but he'd not ask her again. She was mortified when she heard of it, and said: "Auntie, I wish, just because his mother died, we had not tried to unite positive, and pretty, and courteous things, in the same little note. The reply should have been couched in decided language that would have admitted of only one interpretation."

Saturday afternoon.—Mrs. McWilliams's former preceptress, a lady from New England, visited the professor's family a fortnight ago, and, during her stay, she lectured one evening to young ladies. It was the most motherly talk I ever heard. We were all delighted with it. I tried to remember some things concerning etiquette. Let me see:

"Quiet ease is indicative of good breeding; no well-bred woman ever fidgets with her hands or feet, or plays with her rings or her watch-chain.

"It is not lady-like to fold your arms in standing, or to speak of those with whom you are slightly acquainted, by their first names.

"To be irritable, easily thrown off your guard, or to make a quick, pert reply is ill manners. We should be gentle and courteous to all alike. Endeavor to be punctual on all occasions, and never be in a hurry.

"Whispering in church is impolite; avoid making noises or sudden movements; never turn the head to see who is coming, or take out your watch to note the time. It is an offence to the minister for any one to look at her watch after she enters the church, and yet how frequently is it done, and accompanied by a yawn.

"Violent perfumes are to many persons offensive, sometimes even distressing, and in church it may be the beautiful woman becomes a nuisance to be avoided and dreaded.

"In the cars true politeness is often called into requisition. If you enter a car and find all the seats taken, take it coolly, other people have done so before you.

"If a lady or gentleman proffers you a seat, don't forget to show civility by thanking for it; don't take it as a matter of course. If the cars are crowded no lady will fill a whole seat with her bundles. She has no right to do it; there is true politeness even in a crowded conveyance.

"At a hotel do not assume or indulge in supercilious airs; do not give orders; do not let the servants be even more polite than yourself; remember the 'thank you,' and 'if you please,' and 'you are very kind.' They cost you nothing and they are worth more than money.

"Endeavor to be polite, really and truly, not from any rules or arbitrary forms, but for the love of always desiring to do right. Some one says, in studying to acquire politeness, we are too apt to begin on the outside instead of the inside; instead of beginning with the heart, many begin with the manners, and leave the heart to chance and influences.

"The golden rule contains the very life and soul of politeness: 'Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.'

"True politeness is perfect ease and freedom, treating others as you would have them treat you. We must possess a sense of equity, good-will toward our fellow-men, kind feelings, magnanimity and self-control. Cultivation will do the rest."

MY SURPRISE PARTY.

DID you ever have a surprise party? Perhaps you have had one just like mine, or similar to it. If so, I congratulate you, or sympathize with you, or both, just whichever is most agreeable to your view of the case.

My surprise party happened in this wise. It was before I had cleaned house in the fall, and I was trying to get all my odd and distasteful jobs done up before I commenced operations in that direction. So this day of which I write, I had resolved upon setting about the very worst of all my hateful tasks; and that was coloring the warp and some rags for my new carpet, which I intended to cover the floor of my sitting-room this winter; so I had hurried around and washed the breakfast-dishes, made my bed, and finished the sweeping, and I congratulated myself everything was working most charmingly.

I had never undertaken such a task as coloring alone, so I presume I was a trifle over-anxious in regard to the results. I had just deposited the dye stuff over the fire in the little back kitchen, and was watching it dissolve. Of course it couldn't dissolve unless it was watched—and I began to think it never meant to if it was. So there I stood, looking and waiting, and the little bright-eyed bubbles kept rising up and darting around like so many spry little fishes; but the big, hard lumps of catique were just as big, and just as hard, as when I first began to watch. All my anxious looks and energetic poking with the stick never melted them in the least, and I was just thinking how much warmth, and patience, and coaxing it takes to have any influence upon the adamantine natures of this world, when my philosophic reverie was rudely broken in upon by a sudden rushing, and scrambling, and stamping of many feet, and I opened my eyes to behold the front door uncereemoniously burst open, and myself surrounded by a swarm of—oh, no, not bees—but children; but I don't know as I should have felt more bewildered for a moment if I had been suddenly overwhelmed by a good healthy swarm of bumble-bees, for close following behind them were the mammas and aunties, besides one who was neither mamma nor auntie to any of them, and who, of all the rest, I wouldn't have had visit me that day, as she never had visited me before; and she was such a dear, sweet little woman, and everything so nice in her own home.

My first perplexing inquiry (mentally, of course,) was, "What shall I get for dinner?"

Just like a woman, wasn't it? I suppose a man would never have let such a little thing as that worry him. If his moustache was properly curled, and his back hair combed toward his eyes, and his shirt bosom satisfactorily starched and smoothed, he'd just give his cuffs a sly pull to bring the sleeve-buttons into sight, and sit right down, with unruffled equanimity, with nothing more to do, only to entertain or be entertained, as circumstances might be. As for dinner, he'd let that take care of itself, and look out for itself, until he got hungry, and then he'd remember all about it, and begin to look out for it, too, you may be certain.

Well, my hair was combed, and I had on a new calico wrapper; so my first and most solemn question at that moment was the one I wrote a moment ago. I was intending to take things rather easy that day (cooking included), so as to get along fast with my carpet affair. But how often we are forced to acknowledge the truth of the old Scotch song:

"The best laid plans o' mice and men Gang aft agley."

And so all the plans I had formed early that day were speedily frustrated, and all before half-past nine o'clock in the morning.

It was coloring-day, and I found it too true,
All things had assumed a most contrary hue,
The bright tints of the morn
Wore a shade quite forlorn,
And I sighed as I saw them so dismally blue.

But this was only of momentary duration. As soon as the bonnets, and hats, and shawls, and sacks (how many things folks do wear!) were doffed and spread out scientifically over the white counterpane on my bed, they (the ladies, I mean, not the aforesaid garments) one by one marched into the pantry, and deposited certain suggestive-looking parcels and mysterious newspaper packages, until the shelves were crowded as far up as hands could reach.

Upon a sly, subsequent examination, my eyes opened wide and sparkled, I know, as I bobbed my head in and out among the well-laden shelves, sniffing my nose with satisfaction, lifting up a corner of a paper and peeping under to find what dainty morsel was hidden beneath, and almost smacking my lips in anticipation of what was in store. Here in one corner was a whole nest of warm biscuit, fresh from the oven, plump and feathery, nestling cosily together like I've seen little downy ducks close up in a huddle, with their heads under their wings. Not far from these I found a frosted cake and a jar of fruit, while the smaller but equally palatable goodies were chinked in around to fill up the empty niches, such as pickles, pears half as big as your head—if your head isn't very big—some quinces for canning.

And something I did not find in the pantry, but which came with the rest, was a new dress for the baby!

Of course I would have been very ungrateful if I could not enjoy the visit after all that—with all those good things to begin a dinner with. So I took off the pot of coloring—the lumps were not yet dissolved—and went about cooking my meat and vegetables with a light heart, and a heart prepared to enjoy the whole affair to its fullest extent. A little girl, to save steps and wash dishes, soon put in her appearance, sent up by the thoughtfulness of my "other self." And so I had leisure to visit some, as well as cook and wait on table.

Things didn't look as blue at dinner-time as they did at nine o'clock in the morning, and long before the train came that was to bear the loved ones back to their homes, the old roseate tinge had returned. I don't know how it might have been had they not been thoughtful and kind enough to bring along the "loaves and fishes;" but these made everything all right; and I think I shall ever remember with pleasure—especially when I look at my new carpet—my first surprise party.

HATTIE F. BELL.

THE MORNING WALK.

FOR two weeks Mrs. Edson had toiled early and late, making up spring dresses for her household. The dressmaker could give her only two days longer, and everything must go on in high-pressure style. She hardly stepped outside of her little sewing-room for days together, except to eat or sleep.

"You'll be sick a month to pay for it," expostulated her husband. "You had far better take the work more deliberately. You are growing pale and careworn over it, and I must protest against your sewing at this rate. I shall feel it my duty to disable the sewing-machine and send it off for repairs," he added, with a smile, as he hurried away to his business.

But Mrs. Edson's spirits were too dull to answer back the smile. She was growing nervous, and irritable, and dyspeptic, as might be expected, from taking her meals in such haste as she had of late. The work seemed determined to go wrong, nothing quite pleased her. The world itself seemed generally out of tune.

"We shall need just about a half a yard more of this material to trim the overskirt," said the dressmaker.

"O Roxanna, can't you make out in some way? The children are all at school, and Jane is baking. There is no one to go for it but me, and it is fully three-quarters of a mile to Atkins's store where we got it."

There seemed no other way; and as it was urgently needed, Mrs. Edson finally decided to go for it herself. It was a beautiful day. The trees were just budding, the birds singing, and the flowers peeping up from the dark ground. Mrs. Edson loved all these dearly when she felt she had time to enjoy them. Unconsciously their influence stole over her heart, raising her spirits many degrees. She met several acquaintances, and had a few words of pleasant chat, saw a new dress on the street which solved a problem in trimming for her, and finally came home with cheeks and eyes bright and spirits light as a feather.

"Your walk has done you good," said the dress-maker, nodding her head.

"I believe you are right," said the lady. "I can work with twice the spring I had before."

"Make haste slowly" when you have a "mountain of sewing to do." It will save time to take a half an hour's walk every day. J. E. McC.

A LETTER.

DEAR MR. ARTHUR:—Do you allow any member of your happy "Home Circle" to disagree with another? And will it be considered rank heresy if I venture to differ with "Pipsey Potts" and one or two others? If not, please allow me to say a few words to them. To begin with, Pipsey, I have tried your way of making starch, and also "Exie's," and I can't make them work. I don't mind lumps in the bottom of starch, but in these cases they would float on top. So, I have returned to my old way of making it with a spoon. Blending the flour and water, that is. Pipsey, I really think that "Rube" had the best of the argument with you. According to that I can readily agree with him that you are "just like the deacon."

"Chatty Brooks," if you will come and stay at our house awhile you will alter your mind about mopping floors. That plan will do very well if water is plenty and very convenient, but our floors would be mopped about once a month if I followed your directions. Perhaps you do not live on a farm and have three or four careless men and boys around. I do dislike a pine floor. They are too soft to be easily cleaned or to look well after they are cleaned. We have one—an afterthought—the others are black walnut and cottonwood, and there is some satisfaction in scrubbing them. "Chatty," your olfactory nerves must be nearly as acute as those of the Rev. De Witt Talmage. "We girls" always thought ma's were excellent (we always said she could smell burning coffee a quarter of a mile away,) but I don't remember that she ever employed them to test our scrubbing.

Don't think I am arguing for untidiness. I admire thorough cleanliness, but it can be carried too far. This desire to have everything spotless and orderly about the house regardless of circumstances, I do really believe is at the bottom of the ill health of nine out of ten of our sickly, faded, worn-out women.

I'll mention a case which will show what I mean. A few years ago, one of our farmers went East and brought back a wife, an ambitious but not healthy woman. She told me, rather exultingly, more than a year afterward, that "she had scrubbed her dining-room floor every day the previous summer with strong lye, and rinsed it until it was clean enough to be eaten from," adding that "if the hands (of whom they had a half-dozen) came in and tracked it, she cleaned it again after they went out." At the time of telling me this, she was suffering from an attack of nervous fever, and kept her bed for more than a month, while a stranger cared for her infant, and she worried daily lest the house was not kept tidy. Such women make a house almost as uncomfortable as an habitually untidy one.

I am "Chatty's" debtor, however, for the account of her walk to church with fidgety Mary. I know how it is myself, "Chatty," and extend my sympathy. I must also thank you for that passage on behavior at church. It will fit any congregation of which I know.

"Pipsey," please tell us how to induce young girls to dress themselves properly, and not change thick clothing for thin, in cold weather. Puss will do it, and I remember that I always did (and have suffered for it since), but my experience goes for nothing with her. MELVA.

WINTER BEAUTIES.

THE beauty that winter hides in out of the way places is, I think, not more than half appreciated. I have often thought, when looking into our old log spring-house, on a cold, frosty morning, "What a treat for a lover of beautiful laces." For hanging from wall and ceiling in filmy folds, laces the loveliest patterns of the most intricate and delicate tracery. Too purely white, perhaps, to pass for hundreds of years old; not costly enough, perhaps, for those who value things for the money value, but a source of pure pleasure to a lover of nature. Just look at that miniature cascade rushing on, quite swelled with the autumn rains until it assumed proportions one would, from its appearance in summer, never suppose it capable of. Jack Frost laid his hand firmly upon it; and, lo! its beauty is not destroyed, but changed. Such lovely columns! why, a whole city in miniature can be traced, to say nothing of innumerable goblets, vases and all varieties of cut glass.

Then, a walk in the woods, where the contrast between every evergreen that peeps from out the snow with the snow itself. Why, even when the ground is brown and bare, there is much beauty to be met with in a walk under the leafless trees, especially upon a soft, balmy day when the patches of sunshine through the branches remind us of God's loving care over us all the time, but only acknowledged with thankfulness upon especially being felt by us. Oh, winter is beautiful, seen in nature, and the heart full of nature's love lifts itself more readily to nature's God. MONA.

If men would but throw a live, practical Christianity into the daily duties of life, mankind would be better; there would be fewer calamities to fasten upon a "mysterious Providence;" the life and the Christian profession would then go hand in hand, and religion would seem to be something else than a Sunday garment to be put on and doffed at leisure.

RELIGION is the best armor in the world, but the worst cloak.

Evenings with the Poets.

THERE IS NO DEATH.

BY EDWARD BULWER LYTTON.

THERE is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in Heaven's jewelled crown
They shine forevermore.
There is no death! The dust we tread
Shall change beneath the summer shower
To golden grain, or mellow fruit,
Or rainbow-tinted flower.

* * * * *

There is no death! An angel form
Walks o'er the earth with silent tread;
He bears our best loved things away,
And then we call them "dead."
He leaves our hearts all desolate,
He plucks our fairest, sweetest flowers;
Transplanted into bliss, they now
Adorn immortal bowers.

* * * * *

Born into that undying life,
They leave us but to come again;
With joy we welcome them—the same,
Except in sin and pain.
And ever near us, though unseen,
The dear immortal spirits tread;
For all the boundless universe
Is life—there are no dead.

THE TWO ANCHORS.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

IT was a gallant sailor man,
Had just come in from sea,
And as I passed him in the town
He sang "Ahoy!" to me.
I stopped, and saw I knew the man—
Had known him from a boy;
And so I answered, sailor-like,
"Avast!" to his "Ahoy!"
I made a song for him to-day—
His ship was then in sight—
"The little anchor on the left,
The great one on the right."

I gave his hand a hearty grip.
"So you are back again?
They say you have been pirating
Upon the Spanish Main;
Or was it some rich Indian man
You robbed of all her pearls?
Of course you have been breaking hearts
Of poor Kanaka girls!"
"Wherever I have been," he said,
"I kept my ship in sight—
"The little anchor on the left,
The great one on the right.'"

"I heard last night that you were in:
I walked the waves to-day,
But saw no ship that looked like yours.
Where does the good ship lay?
I want to go on board of her."
"And so you shall," said he;
"But there are many things to do
When one comes home from sea.
You know the song you made for me?
I sing it morn and night—
"The little anchor on the left,
The great one on the right.'"

"But how's your wife and little one?"

"Come home with me," he said.

"Go on, go on; I follow you."

I followed where he led.

He had a pleasant little house;

The door was open wide,

And at the door the dearest face,

A dearer one inside.

He hugged his wife and child; he sang—

His spirits were so light—

"The little anchor on the left,

The great one on the right."

'Twas supper-time, and we sat down—

The sailor's wife and child,

And he and I; he looked at them,

And looked at me and smiled.

"I think of this when I am tossed

Upon the stormy foam,

And, though a hundred leagues away,

Am anchored here at home."

Then giving each a kiss, he said,

"I see in dreams at night,

This little anchor on my left,

This great one on my right."

WHO IS SHE?

THERE is a little maiden—

Who is she? Do you know?—

Who always has a welcome

Wherever she may go.

Her face is like the May-time,

Her voice is like a bird's;

The sweetest of all music

Is in her lightsome words.

Each spot she makes the brighter,

As if she were the sun,

And she is sought and cherished

And loved by every one.

By old folks and by children,

By lofty and by low;

Who is this little maiden?

Does anybody know?

You surely must have met her;

You certainly can guess;

What! must I introduce her?

Her name is—Cheerfulness.

THE SUNFLOWER.

FAITHFUL to the faithful sun,
Aye, turning as he turns,
And opening full its glowing breast
Until it throbs and burns;
Drinking in the golden light,
With ecstasy of bliss:
Scarce could a fitter symbol be
Of Christian faith, than this.

Likeness of its King it shows,

To witness all the days

(With glowing disk from which there flows

A sheaf of mimic rays)—

That like to what is loved the most

The soul will surely grow;

And if on Christ our eyes are set

We'll likeness of Him show.

WHAT I KNOW ABOUT GARDENING.

BY CHARITY L. MAPBETT.

ROSES AND PINKS.

CHAPTER XIV.

ROSES should be taken up as often as every fourth year, and the roots shortened and soil renewed by adding rich loam and well-rotted stable-manure. Where it is not practicable to lift them, as in case of climbers and large standards, the earth should be removed about them, and other and richer soil substituted. This operation will also have a tendency to lessen the number of rose-bugs—around the roses, at least.

Roses should be budded in July, or as soon as the bark peels readily and the buds at the axil of the leaf is well defined. It is interesting to inculcate roses, and useful, if different varieties on one stalk is the end wished; but a rose on its own root is so much more to be desired than a grafted or budded one, that the trouble is not repaid, if layering can be done. I have budded roses from branches taken from bouquets, and by making layers afterward, obtained roots of the same, but roses are now too cheap and plenty to pay the time and trouble.

When buds are set, they will need shading, if they are exposed to the sun. This can be done in any way that the situation suggests; a shingle stuck in the ground, if the operation has been performed low enough, if not, a branch of evergreen, or a piece of matting or paper, tied to the bush, or a stick stuck in the ground for that purpose will answer nicely.

Ever-blooming roses are readily increased by cuttings from slips of young wood just beginning to harden, or after the first bloom is past, which is usually about the 1st of July. Set them in the ground on the north of a wall or fence, and shade them with a glass, leaving only one or two leaves on the cutting. In most cases, in about six weeks they will have formed roots sufficient for planting. All roses may be grown from cuttings with pretty fair success, if the nearly-ripened wood or shoots are smoothly cut off the main stalk at their intersection, and placed in eight-inch pots, half filled with charcoal, broken fine at top, and covered with turfy loam and silver sand in equal parts, to the depth of three inches. Place the cuttings so that the ends may be near the charcoal, and press the soil firmly round them, then sink the pot in a cold frame in coal-ashes and let it remain until spring, when many of the cuttings will be found rooted, or callused for that purpose. They should then be potted singly in small pots and kept in a cool, shady, not over moist place, until the roots are fairly started and making their way out of the pots at the bottom; then set in the borders or in a pot one size larger if they are intended for pot-plants. Slips of roses should never be hurried; time must be allowed them to form a cellus at the end, before sending out roots, and if all the sap they contain is used in a forced growth of leaf, there will be no provision for roots, and you will be wondering why your plant died, after it had begun to grow so finely.

Monthly roses should be kept clear of seed capsules. The branches should be pegged down, when it can be done easily, as it will encourage the growth of new side-shoots, and "the more shoots, the more flowers," as a general thing. The ground around ever-blooming roses should be often stimulated by digging in old manure, or pouring it on in a liquid state. Guano is highly recommended by some for roses; I have never tried it, having an old-fashioned liking for stable-manure, particularly old hot-bed bottoms.

Spring pruning of roses is very essential. I have seen it set down as "nipping mischief in the bud," and fully concur with the remark.

Tea-roses and others that are tender may be kept through the winter by lifting them carefully and placing them (rather crowding them) into a cold frame, or the much-lauded cellar corner, if a light, cool one is at hand. Evergreen boughs, stuck tent-like around them, and tied at top, will in many cases protect roses sufficiently, where they are in danger of an occasional winter killing if left to themselves, or at least to injuries to the buds, very detrimental to full and satisfactory blooms.

New roses with fine-sounding names often confute the old saying that "a rose by any other name is just as sweet," being not only less sweet, but less desirable in all respects, so it follows that "rarity and catalogue celebrity" are not to be relied on in making up a collection.

If roses are unavoidably kept out of the ground in the spring until very dry, they should be wholly covered with earth in some moist place, and left until the wood is plump and showing signs of life and growth, then properly set in the ground and shaded until well established. The same method should be practised with all plants of woody fibre when in like condition.

The process of layering as well as budding is now so common as to need no description. There are but few catalogues on floricultural works, without cuts representing both methods fully with plain directions. I use small pieces of muslin, cut bias, and spread with melted grafting-wax, for budding, as it serves, not alone to keep the bud in place, but protects the wound from the action of the sun and winds. The size of the plaster must be regulated by the size of the stock on which the bud is inserted. A little practice will enable one to determine the size and mode of applying these strips, bearing in mind that whilst the wound is to be covered, the bud must remain exposed. As this plaster is not intended to cover more than half round the stock, it will not interfere with its growth, if it happens that you forget to remove it after the incision has healed.

Good grafting-wax may be made with one pound of rosin, half pound of beeswax and quarter pound of lard, melted together, poured into water and pulled or worked like molasses candy, before it gets entirely cold. If to be used in a warm climate, less lard should be used, or it may be too soft.

The pink family are, with me, next to roses in favor, no matter by what particular sobriquet they are known. China pinks are very easily grown, and present an endless variety of color and form. Where the winters are not too severe, they give very little trouble; they are not safe, however, with the thermometer at zero, and will require, in such places, cellar treatment, or a cold frame protection. The great point in saving all pinks through the winter, is in keeping them perfectly dormant. To this end water sun and air must be apportioned judiciously. When left to themselves in the ground, they must take their chance in a measure; though even then a shade of evergreens will be of great use; but in a cold frame or cellar they should not be watered, except to prevent absolute shriveling. The sun should not reach them, as that would increase the necessity for water; but air should be supplied as freely as possible without danger of freezing. If kept dry, they will bear considerable frost. Rats and mice are very fond of pinks, and if within their reach will soon destroy them. In cold frames there should always be kept a dish of meal and arsenic ready for their use, and in cellars infested by them some method must be devised for keeping the plants out of their way.

BOSTON BROWN BREAD.

WE all like to say a word about home matters, and I want to add one, not new, perhaps, but practical at least.

Now, my dear readers, it would be a waste of time for me to attempt to prove to you the superiority of brown bread over white. Of course you all know it has the reputation of being healthy, and therefore everybody approves it theoretically, if not practically.

Putting this theory into practice, by making brown bread, or causing it to be made for our tables, is not always attended with the most desirable results.

Instead of that ideal loaf fancy pictured, we have a heavy, sticky, black, hard-crust, dubious-tasting compound that no fancy can make inviting, no sensible person commend.

Charles says the bread is simply abominable; Lizzie cannot deny the fact, and wonders, if she made it herself, what makes it look so, for she did just as Mrs. So-and-so had told her she did. If Biddy made it, of course it was not the want of skill that caused the failure, but something in the materials quite beyond the Hibernian ken.

Really, is there no remedy for this? Poor bread is a dreadful trial. One cannot even say of it as a philosophical friend was wont to say of the vexations of life, "It is good enough for sinners," probably because we have not learned to control the appetite of our fallen nature, which cries out against poor bread.

Boston Brown Bread, like some other things originating at the Hub, is unrivaled. To be sure, every one who tries it does not think so, but that is, I am persuaded, either a defect of education or the result of unfortunate experience.

Have I stimulated your curiosity? Would you really like to know how I make it, or don't you care a fig? I can assure you I have tested it times without number.

The ingredients required are, Indian meal, rye flour, common molasses, some cold water and soda or baking-powder. The meal should not be the finest and whitest the "market affords," but rather yellow and coarser than that usually furnished by the grocer. Take two-thirds meal and one-third rye flour. It is a good plan to measure both into a sieve and sift them through together, as this insures thorough mixing, which is very important. Pour into your mixing-bowl a cup of molasses and three cups of water. When measuring the molasses, do not fill the cup to the brim, but let each cup of water run over a little. Stir the molasses and water till well mixed, and then slowly add the meal and rye. If baking-powder is used, it should be mixed with the meal. If soda is used, dissolve one teaspoonful in a very little water before enough meal has been stirred to make it stiff.

To bake it properly requires two iron basins of equal size, capable of holding a couple of quarts apiece. Pour the dough into one basin, and invert the other over it. When the dough is just right, neither too stiff nor too soft, it will settle gradually after it is poured into the basin without the aid of the spoon.

Bake one hour and a half in a steady oven. When it is taken out, leave it for a few minutes—not more than ten—in the basin, still covered. Then take it out and cover with a cloth. Be careful not to set where the wind will blow upon it, or in a strong draft of cold air while cooling, as either may cause it to fall.

After doing all this, you should have a large, light, fragrant, tender-crust, dark-brown loaf that will be a delightful addition to the breakfast or tea-table.

ABBY LAROH.

INSECT DESTROYER.

THE Journal of Chemistry publishes a recipe for the destruction of insects, which, if it be one-half as efficacious as it is claimed to be, will prove invaluable. Hot alum-water, it says, will destroy red and black ants, cockroaches, spiders, chintz-bugs, and all the crawling pests which infest our houses. Take two pounds of alum, and dissolve it in three or four quarts of boiling water.

Let it stand on the fire till the alum disappears; then apply it with a brush, while nearly boiling hot, to every joint and crevice in your closets, bedsteads, pantry shelves and the like. Brush the crevices in the floor of the skirting or mop boards if you suspect that they harbor vermin. If, in whitewashing a ceiling, plenty of alum is added to the lime, it will also serve to keep insects at a distance. Cockroaches will flee the paint which has been washed in cool alum-water. Sugar barrels and boxes can be freed from ants by drawing a chalk-mark just around the edge of the top of them. The mark must be unbroken, or they will creep over it; but a continuous chalk-mark half an inch wide will set their depredations at naught. Powdered alum or borax will keep chintz-bugs at a respectful distance; and travellers should always carry a package in their hand-bags, to scatter over and under their pillows in places where they have reason to suspect the presence of such bedfellows.

BRILLIANT WHITEWASH.

TAKE half a bushel of good unslacked lime, and slack it with boiling water, covering it during the process to keep in the steam. Strain the liquor through a fine sieve or strainer, and add to it a peck of clean salt, previously dissolved in warm water, three pounds of ground rice, ground to a thin paste and stirred and boiled hot, half a pound of powdered Spanish whitening, and a pound of clean glue, which has been previously dissolved by first soaking it well, and then hanging it over a slow fire in a small kettle, within a large one filled with water. Add five gallons of hot water to the whole mixture; stir it well, and let it stand for a few days, covered from dirt. The whitewash should be put on quite hot; for this purpose it can be kept in a kettle on a portable furnace. It is said that about one pint of this mixture will cover a square yard upon the outside of a house if properly applied. Brushes more or less small may be used, according to the neatness of the job required. The wash retains its brilliancy for many years. There is nothing of the kind that will compare with it, either for inside or outside walls.

EDITOR HOME MAGAZINE—DEAR SIR: Every reader of the "Deacon's Household," in your excellent magazine, gets so much practical knowledge from good "Pipey," that I think it is no more than right for your readers to help her in every way they can when the good old soul gets into trouble. For the benefit of your many readers in general and "Pipey" in particular (if there is any benefit to be derived from it,) I send you the following, clipped from a newspaper:

According to an English journal, hard putty can be removed from a window-sash by simply applying a piece of heated metal, such as a soldering-iron or other similar implement. When heated (not red-hot,) the iron is to be passed slowly over the putty, which is thereby rendered so soft that it will part from the wood without difficulty.

Fashion Department.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

THE spring styles are full upon us, the early date of Easter this year bringing them out a few weeks earlier than usual. Nearly all fabrics are rough, twilled and fuzzy in their texture. Armure, diaper, large and small basket checks and diagonals of various widths, and in combinations of widths, are woven in goods that sell for thirty cents a yard. These are dyed in popular shades, and, although half cotton, their colors are pronounced firm, while they are really handsome in appearance. Algerines are rougher than ever, and a new fabric in all silk is woven with doubled threads in order to give it a coarse appearance. This silk is in ecru color, plaided with black or brown, and also in plain tints. Other silks in various shades of ecru, are woven in large basket patterns of only one tint.

Plaids are excessively popular in calicoes, and in contrasting shades of piques, faconets, cambrics and printed foulards, and in all sorts of goods, from woollen grenadines and algerines to camel-hair. This style is so universal, that a popular fashion writer remarks that if this fashion is accepted by the general feminine public, we shall all look as if we were laid out in squares, or had been tessellated.

White cottons are also woven in rough clusters or ornamental work, intermingled with lace or network, and accompanied by trimmings. These goods are found in gray, brown, ecru, buff and brown tints. The effect is similar to that of the Hamburg webbings which were introduced last season, but are much less expensive.

About the only distinction there is in the matter of trimmings this season is that everything is put on perpendicularly or diagonally, and nothing is seen cross-wise. Almost every kind of material is used in trimming, and used in every style. Many materials are self-trimmed, while lace, gimp, fringe, Titan braid, galloon, embroidery, feathers, bands of velvet, raveled silk ruches, yak and linen laces woven in guipure patterns, and, in fact, everything that can be devised in the way of trimming, is seen upon the fashionable costumes, the attempt only being made to have the style of using these trimmings differ in each individual instance, so that every lady may have a style by herself, if possible.

Buttons are especially prominent this season, and are of all sizes and devices—shell, pearl, burnished steel, cut in facets and also mingled with fire-gilt, papier mache and pearl in Oriental designs, polished wood in various colors, some round like a knob, and others hollowed out like a cup, solid jet, and jet and silk, silver burnished or oxidized, gold, engraved, polished or set with cameo shell or precious stones—all these, and numberless other styles, are offered for use.

There is some slight modification in bonnets and hats from the winter styles. Bonnets are made to more closely resemble hats, and hats bonnets, than even last season. They are prettier and airier in shape, and are, almost without exception, trimmed with feathers, felt and soft straws are the predominating materials.

New Publications.

Alice Brand. A Romance of the Capital. By A. G. Riddle, author of "Bart Ridgely," etc. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Our thanks are due the author for a copy of this work. Mr. Riddle is fast earning a place among the best American novelists. His novels are pre-eminently American in character, being invariably descriptive of real people and real places. This story will be one of general interest, as its scene is laid in the national capital, and persons of national notoriety, either in desirable or undesirable ways, are brought prominently forward, and mentioned by their names. Ex-President Johnson, the late Chief Justice Chase and Mrs. Croly, the lobbyist, are among those thus brought within the book. The story which is developed through the volume, and which serves a thread upon which to hang graphic descriptions of political and social life in Washington, is romantic in its character, at the same time that it is natural and pleasing. No one who knows anything about Mr. Riddle as a writer, will fear that he will ever permit vice to triumph over virtue in his stories. Their endings are always satisfactory and felicitous. While we can say much in praise of the literary merits of his book, the best thing, to our mind, is, that its animus is perfectly pure. There is no sanctioning evil, or even accepting it as a legitimate necessity of our social conditions. Gifted with the most delicate perceptions of right and wrong, and with a chivalrous idea of honor, his stories cannot fail to have a good influence upon the literature of the day, and serve to purify it a little, from the grossness and sensuality which is being dragged into it from foreign sources. "Alice Brand" deserves, and will, no doubt, acquire an extensive popularity. It is for sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

"The Metropolitan, a Weekly Journal, Devoted to Literature, Art, Fashion and Civilization," published in New York by E. Butterick & Co., is a most excellent household paper, and seems to grow better with every number. Besides its weekly illustrations of the fashions, it contains a large amount of good reading, especially adapted to the home circle. We want more of just such family papers as The Metropolitan. Wherever it goes it will bear a healthy influence. The paper and typography are beautiful. Its literary editor is George W. Bungay, who gives, in a recent number, the following graceful poem, entitled "The Snow Fall in March."

"A great white sheet has been let down from heaven,
Containing nothing common or unclean;
Earth wraps it round her family of hills,
As a fond mother folds her drapery
About her children shivering in the storm.
How softly falls the snow on starry wings,
Each flake a white-winged messenger from Heaven,
Lighting as softly on the humble shed,
Beneath which labor finds sweet rest on straw,
As on the roof that shields luxurious ease;
There is a snow-fringe on the new-made grave—
White lace work woven by the weaver Wind.
O Spirit of the unseen air, thy voice,
The wind, utters the grief of all mankind.
Build a white stairway to the arching sky!
Heap hill on hill, and mount to mountain add,
That we may climb beyond the clouds and meet
Our darling angels in the shining land."

We have received from W. W. Whitney, Toledo, Ohio, a piece of new music entitled "Fantasia." It is simple in style, and adapted for learners, at the same time that it is very pretty. We have also received from the same publisher a song entitled "Drifting from Home." The words and music of this song are both very pleasing, and it will, no doubt, be popular.

Deutsche Rundschau. Berlin: Gebrueder Paetzel. The American agents, Stechert & Wolff, New York, have sent us the January and February numbers of this high-toned German periodical. The February number is an especially rich one, and contains, among other articles, papers "on the modes of travel in Africa," by Dr. Schweinfurth, and on "Petrarch and Boccaccio as founders of the Italian Renaissance-Culture," by H. Hettner, both of which are of deep interest, and will well repay perusal. As we have already stated, this magazine represents the most advanced literature of Germany.

The Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago, on the 12th of March, 1850, the Woman's Medical College made its first feeble beginning, in the City of Philadelphia. At that time women as physicians were untried, and a great doubt pervaded the entire country as to their capabilities and ultimate success. Scarcely ever was an enterprise begun under more discouraging auspices. Not only did the public disbelieve in the scheme, but the entire medical fraternity, with some very few brave individual exceptions, frowned upon it, and brought all their influence to bear, not only against the measures taken to educate women as physicians, but against those who in any way countenanced them, or gave them material aid.

For many years it was a fight for life with the institution against the difficulties thrown in its way. But women came forward eager to acquire medical knowledge; and it sent forth its graduates into the world, to do battle in its favor. They readily made their way, in spite of the opposition and prejudice against them, and through them the public became convinced of the value of the institution which prepared them for their professional labors.

About fifteen years ago, the college for the first time was enabled to open a hospital—something very much needed by the students, in order to give them practical knowledge of diseases and their treatment in addition to the theoretical which they acquired within the walls of the college. But even yet the institution labored under difficulties. The college and the hospital were beneath the same roof, and many inconveniences, for want of room, were felt in consequence.

On the 12th of March, 1875, just twenty-five years from its first organization, the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania celebrated its "silver" anniversary. The occasion was made doubly a happy one, since on that evening it took possession of a new college building, just completed especially for its use. This building is a handsome structure, on the corner of Twenty-Fourth and College Streets; it is large and commodious, and in every way adapted to the needs of the institution. The occasion was one of hearty congratulation and rejoicing.

This medical college has done a noble work. It has sent its graduates to all parts of America; and many, by the renown they have gained, reflect credit back upon the college. It has also sent women physicians to India, and there they have met with most encouraging success, being received by the native princes with a degree of favor which was entirely unexpected. In one of the inland cities of India, where two of the graduates of this college have established themselves as missionary-physicians, the native prince, upon having explained to him their proposed labors, donated them a large tract of ground for the purpose of having established upon it a training school for girls, and also sent two of his wives to be educated as physicians. Such favor they had never dared to hope for; and it is an encouraging sign of what may be the future of women in India. For the influence of such an institution in such a country, especially if it be encouraged by those in authority, cannot but be marked and widespread.

The days of doubt and discouragement for this college seem to be over. It has acquired a recognized position among similar institutions, and its graduates have settled past appeal the question of woman's capabilities as a physician. Before it there seems to be a prosperous future; and we hope it may go on toward its golden anniversary with ever-increasing favor from, and usefulness toward, the public.

The Duty of Recreation.

MRS. ANTOINETTE L. BROWN BLACKWELL, in an able essay on "The Relations of Woman's Work in the House to the Work Outside," says: "So far from admitting that women have occupation enough in their family duties, I maintain, unqualifiedly, that every woman, rich or poor, not actually an invalid, confined to one room, is in imperative need of a daily distinct change of thought and employment. The change to mere recreation is not sufficient. None but very young children can find adequate satisfaction in unlimited play.

"Women need a purpose; a definite pursuit in which they are interested, if they expect to gather from it tone and vigor, either for mind or body. If their necessities compel this, let them seek for the stimulus of pecuniary gain, with the hopeful feeling that they can earn more abroad than they can possibly save at home. * * * Women are in less need of more work than of a more sensible class of occupations on which to wisely expend their energies. To this end, also, we need a general reconstruction in the division of labor. Let no women give all their time to household duties, but require nearly all women, and all men also, since they belong to the household, to bear some share of the common household burdens. Many hands make light work, and hearts could be lightened in proportion. I would seek to have society so readjusted, that every man and every woman could feel that from three to six hours of each day were absolutely at his or her own disposal; and that the machinery of business, or of the family would go on unimpeded meanwhile.

"This systematic leisure is essential. It would promote morality, and restore our national robustness. From the president and the secretaries of state and of finances down to every hod-carrier and every drayman, and to every woman of their respective families, as much as three hours of every day should be conscientiously set aside for rest or recreation; or when that is found impracticable, then, at least, for a complete change of occupation. This is a duty to one's self, to the family, to society and to posterity. The work done would gain in quality vastly more than it would lose in quantity. The nerves of all coming generations would rise up and call us blessed if we could inaugurate such a change!"

Le Cercle.

THIS new field-game, if we may judge by the hearty commendations it received last year, is in a fair way to supersede croquet. It is played with spherical mallets, and gives opportunity for more varied and greater skill in playing than croquet, and has many of the fascinating features of billiards. It has also the advantage of requiring, when necessary, less space than croquet, and can be played in smaller yards or enclosures. Our readers are referred to an advertisement in this number where the game is displayed in a diagram.

"The Alarming Footsteps."

IN our January number we gave a fine engraving of the "STEPPING-STONES," by Wm. Frederick Yeames, of the Royal Academy. In this number we present another characteristic picture engraved from a painting by the same artist. It is thus referred to and described by the London Art Journal:

"The stolen interview of the two lovers, habited in costumes of the last century, is partially disturbed by the pattering footsteps of a young child, which seems to have left its foot on some wandering expedition, when the maiden fancied she had left it safe for the night; but the little pet dog has 'given tongue,' and apparently is keeping the intruder at bay, while the girl looks round somewhat timidly to see who it is that breaks in upon her happy moments. There is no real cause for disquietude, though children are very observant, and often make unwelcome use of what they see and hear; besides,

'Conscience doth make cowards of us all!'

"There is but little in the picture as a subject, yet what there is could scarcely be better represented."

Answers to Correspondents.

REA.—We cannot give you the information you desire regarding the publication of a recipe book. You will have to address some publisher, who will give you his terms. If a publisher is sufficiently pleased with a book, he will either buy it outright from the one who has prepared it, or allow him a certain percentage on the sales. If he does not care to publish the book at his own risk, then the author will have to do so; must go to the expense of advertising it, and will be entitled to all the profits, if there are any. It is impossible for any one to tell beforehand how much a book will "realize." Some books never pay the cost of printing; others bring a handsome profit to publisher and author. In preparing manuscript, either for book or magazine, for the press, you should write on but one side of the page, and if you use narrow sheets instead of wide ones it is better. We cannot recommend any special publisher. You will see the names of a number in our book notices.

E. S. B.—We would be much gratified if we could give you any satisfactory information in regard to employment for your invalid friend. But the application lies entirely out of the range of our knowledge.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER at Union C. H., S. C., wishes to know what will erase from a linen dress the iron rust caused by washing the dress with iron buttons (which were covered by linen) left on. If the dress is a white one, the iron rust may be taken out by oxalic acid, a few drops in a little water. If it is figured or colored, we do not know of anything which will take out the stain. Perhaps "Pipsey," or some one else, may suggest a remedy.

Publishers' Department.

OUR BOOK-BUYING DEPARTMENT.

Our subscribers and friends will see by this number that we have adopted a Book-Buying Department to the business of our office, and are now ready to supply books by mail, or by express, from the lists of all the leading publishers in the United States. All the new books will be promptly mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price. We give, in this number, a list of the most recent books issued, and purpose giving every month a similar list, to include all the best new publications.

People living remote from cities often find it, as we know from our large correspondence, very difficult to procure the books they desire to possess. If they see books noticed in the magazines and newspapers, the prices are rarely if ever given, and so they cannot order them by mail. To meet this difficulty, we shall give each month the prices of all the new books, and arrange to furnish all or any of them by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price.

BOOK CLUBBING.—Where several books are ordered and a package made up to go by express, the charges to be paid by those receiving them, very liberal discounts from retail prices will be made. By taking advantage of this clubbing arrangement, a number of persons may join and procure the books they desire at very moderate prices. In this case, the list should be made out and sent to us, when we will give the price at which the whole number of books will be sent.

Books, new and old, from the catalogues of any of the leading publishers in the United States, will be supplied through our Book-Buying Department.

If more than one picture is wanted, our subscribers can have them for 50 cents each, on receipt of which they will be promptly sent by mail, carefully put up on strong rollers. Engravings of like character and quality with these, do not sell at the picture stores for less than $5.00; and none of the above subjects are to be had from picture dealers for less than $3.00, and some of them for not less than $15.00.

Our subscribers will see, therefore, that we offer them a rare opportunity to supply themselves with first-class engravings at a trifling cost.

CHATSWORTH: THE VICTORIA REGIA.

THE VICTORIA REGIA.

BY MARION KNIGHT.

IN the March number of the HOME MAGAZINE appeared an article from my pen, describing the magnificent palace of Chatsworth, with its state apartments, its library, picture and sculpture galleries, its extensive grounds, and its grand conservatory. The reader may remember, or if he does not, if he will turn to that number of the magazine, he will find a brief description of this conservatory, and a reference to the Victoria Regia house. In the illustration which stands at the head of this article will be seen a view of the interior of this Victoria Regia house, with the gigantic lily displaying its immensely broad leaves upon the surface of the artificial pond.

VOL. XLIII. -25.

The Victoria Regia is a native of Bolivia, in South America, and was first discovered by D'Orbigny, the traveller. It belongs to the family of the Nymphæaceæ, and bears a strong resemblance to the water-lily with which we are all familiar. The same plant was also discovered by Scomburgk, in British Guiana.

If any one will pay a visit to a river or pond in his vicinity, during the present summer, and take a look at the water-lilies growing upon its margin; if he will exercise his imagination, until by its aid the leaves of this plant broaden to a width of from three to six feet, and the flowers, sometimes white, sometimes yellow, and again violet, become magnified to a foot in diameter and height, he will have a tolerably accurate idea of the appearance of this wonderful plant. Its perfume is delicious, though perhaps not more so than that of our own native water-lily. Says one writer, in describing this plant, "The large discs of round leaves, from five to six feet in diameter, are so many huge dishes of perfume." The leaf-stalk is below the centre. The leaves are smooth and green above, while on the under side they are reddish, and divided into a great number of compartments by the veins, which project, leaving between them triangular or quadrangular spaces, each filled with air, by means of which the leaves are supported on the surface of the water. There is a rim around the edge of the plant about two inches high, which makes it appear like a large circular tray. So well is the leaf buoyed upon the surface of the water, and so strong are its fibres, that large birds stand and walk upon it, while seeking their prey in the water below.

The following is a description of the blossoms of this aquatic plant, quoted from a traveller: "The calyx consists of four leaves of a brownish red outside and white inside, each six or seven inches long and three inches wide. From these leaves of the calyx a considerable number of petals spread out in a circular and symmetrical form. These are white at first, but become darker first at the centre, and gradually turn to the color of the carnation. In many respects it is very like our water-lily. The petals, which are more than a hundred in number, gradually assume the form of stamens as they approach the central receptacle, which is fleshy, and bears large and farinaceous seeds on the surface." These seeds are inclosed in a spherical fruit, which, when ripe, is as large as an average-sized cocoa-nut. On account of the nutritious character of these seeds, the Spaniards have named this plant "water-maize." The English, more patriotic, have bestowed upon it the name of their queen, "Victoria Regina" or "Victoria Regia."

JOHN RUSKIN.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

LINKED to the name of Turner is that of Ruskin, and only the future can decide which is the greater of the two, that of the artist or of his eulogist. One painted with brush and palette, the other with words, and the pictures of both are alike full of meaning and beauty. Ruskin himself, though accused of arrogance, reverently sits at the feet of Turner, and aspires no higher. But, since Wordsworth, no man ever lived so near the heart of nature as he, or explained more clearly the significance of her teachings. The infinite changes of sky and water, of mountains, trees and rocks, he lovingly notes, tracing in each the working of some spiritual truth, and bringing everything, as he says himself, "to a root in human passion or human hope." His deep religious faith and poetic imagination color the impressions he receives from the external world, and make the very grass beneath his feet an emblem of cheerfulness and humility. To him the lowly mosses and lofty mountain peaks alike reveal God's glory and purposes.

"Meek creatures!" he says of the former, "the first mercy of the earth, veiling with hushed softness its dintless rocks; creatures full of pity, covering with strange and tender honor the scarred disgrace of ruin—laying quiet finger on the tumbling stones to teach them rest. No words that I know of will say what these mosses are. None are delicate enough, none perfect enough, none rich enough. * * * Strong in lowliness, they neither blanch in heat nor pine in frost. To them, slow-fingered, constant-hearted, is entrusted the weaving of the dark, eternal tapestries of the hills; to them, slow-pencilled, iris-dyed, the tender framing of their endless imagery. Sharing the stillness of the unimpassioned rock, they share also its endurance; and while the winds of departing spring scatter the white hawthorn blossom like drifted snow, and summer dims on the parched meadow the drooping of its cowslip-gold, far above, among the mountains, the silver lichen-spots rest, star-like, on the stone; and the gathering orange stain upon the edge of yonder western peak reflects the sunsets of a thousand years."

Is it possible to read that passage and not look at mosses forever after with touching interest? Will not its memory color our thoughts, and give us new delight, as we climb the hills, or roam through the woods? Are we to censure a man who can feel and speak like this, even though at times he utter strange extravagances, disheartened and overcome by the materialism of the age amid which his lot is cast? Who knows but his exquisite interpretations of nature are due to that very sensitiveness and peculiar organization which people condemn?

But before vindicating the writer, it would be well, perhaps, to give a few details concerning the man. Most of them I gather from his own writings. He was born in London, 1819, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. His father was a wine-merchant, and began business without capital. Before laying by anything for himself, he paid off certain ancestral debts. For this, Ruskin says, his best friends called him a fool, and he, the son, has written on the granite slab over his grave, "An entirely honest merchant."

Ruskin says also that his father had a rare love of pictures, and that he "never met with another instance of so innate a faculty for the discernment of true art, up to the point possible without actual practice."

From the time he was five years old, Ruskin used to travel through the country with his father and mother in a post-chaise—a tour partly of business, partly of pleasure—going the rounds of the wine-merchant's customers, and stopping at the noblemen's houses wherever a gallery was to be seen. At that early age, the boy cared little for pictures, but a great deal for castles and ruins, perceiving as he grew older that "it was probably much better to live in a small house and have Warwick Castle to be astonished at, than to live in Warwick Castle and have nothing to be astonished at"—a truth some people never learn.

In the third volume of "Modern Painters," he has described the emotions with which he first looked upon nature. It is a beautiful passage, and I should like to quote it entire. But space forbids, and I can only give an extract.

"In such journeyings," he writes, referring to those mentioned, "whenever they brought me near hills, and in all mountain ground and scenery, I had a pleasure as early as I can remember, and continuing till I was eighteen or twenty, infinitely greater than has since been possible to me in anything; comparable in intensity only to the joy of a lover in being near a noble and kind mistress, but no more explicable or definable than that feeling of love itself. * * * Although there was no definite religious sentiment mingled with it, there was a continual perception of sanctity in the whole of nature, from the slightest thing to the vastest—an instinctive awe, mixed with delight; an indefinable thrill, such as we sometimes imagine to indicate the presence of a disembodied spirit. I could only feel this perfectly when I was alone; and then it would often make me shiver from head to foot with the joy and fear of it, when, after being some time away from the hills, I first got to the shore of a mountain river, where the brown water circled among the pebbles, or when I saw the first swell of distant land upon the sunset, or the first low, broken wall covered with moss. * * * These feelings remained in their full intensity till I was eighteen or twenty, and then, as the reflective and practical power increased, faded gradually away in the manner described by Wordsworth in his 'Intimations of Immortality.'"

To his mother, Ruskin's writings owe much of their spiritual earnestness and beauty. She taught her son the Bible, made him learn long chapters of it by heart, and read it through, aloud, hard names and all, once a year. He thus acquired a thorough knowledge of the book, a taste in literature, and a certain power of taking pains. "Once knowing," he says, "the 32d of Deuteronomy, the 119th Psalm, the 15th of first Corinthians, the Sermon on the Mount, and most of the Apocalypse, every syllable by heart, and having always a way of thinking with myself what words meant, it was not possible for me, even in the foolishness of youth, to write entirely superficial or formal English."

Besides the Bible, his only reading as a child was Walter Scott's novels, Pope's translation of the "Iliad," "Robinson Crusoe," and the "Pilgrim's Progress." His mother had it in her heart to make him an evangelical clergyman, and might have done so but for an aunt who was still more evangelical, and gave him cold mutton for his Sunday's dinner. Not liking that, he didn't favor the project, and the end of it was that he got all the "noble, imaginative teaching of Defoe and Bunyan," yet didn't become an evangelical clergyman.

There is little else to be told of his personal history. His marriage, like that of so many literary men, proved unhappy. It was legally dissolved, and Mrs. Ruskin afterward became the wife of Millais, the great English artist. No reason was assigned for the separation save uncongeniality.

Of poverty Ruskin knows nothing practically. An only child, he inherited all his father's wealth, and has thus been enabled to write independently of publisher or critics. Part of his life has been spent in travel; his works show with what result. Evoked by him, pictures of Swiss and Italian scenery rise before the inner vision, linked forever with noble emotions and deep moral significance.

He was a young man, twenty-four years old, when he made his first literary venture in a volume entitled, "Modern Painters (Parts 1 and 2), their Superiority in the Art of Landscape Painting to all the Ancient Masters, by a Graduate of Oxford." Only the first part of the title was retained in subsequent editions.

Never did book create a profounder sensation. Suddenly, and without warning, it struck a powerful blow at the public opinion of the day. No wonder the critics raised their voices in angry protest. Here was an attack directed against certain established beliefs and prejudices; here was a bold denunciation of Claude, Salvator Rosa, Gaspar Poussin, and other old masters, who were thought to possess the entire secret of landscape painting. Canons of criticism in art that had been accepted for years, were defied and overthrown by this young radical; he tore aside the veil of conventionality that had blinded men's eyes, and turned their thoughts from the worship of past to the appreciation of present greatness.

"Let us not forget," he writes, "that if honor be for the dead, gratitude can only be for the living. He who has once stood beside the grave, to look back upon the companionship which has been forever closed, feeling how impotent there are the wild love, and the keen sorrow, to give one instant's pleasure to the pulseless heart, or atone in the lowest measure to the departed spirit for the hour of unkindness, will scarcely for the future incur that debt to the heart which can only be discharged to the dust. But the lesson which men receive as individuals they do not learn as nations. Again and again they have seen their noblest descend into the grave, and have thought it enough to garland the tombstone when they have not crowned the brow, and to pay the honor to the ashes which they had denied to the spirit. Let it not displease them that they are bidden, amidst the tumult and the dazzle of their busy life, to listen for the few voices, and watch for the few lamps, which God has toned and lighted to charm and to guide them, that they may not learn their sweetness by their silence, nor their light by their decay."

There was an interval of seventeen years between the publication of the first and the last volume of "Modern Painters." Most of this time was spent by Ruskin in faithful study and investigation, that he might learn the truth respecting art, and be able to judge of it rightly. The whole work includes five volumes in all, representing every phase of artistic development from that of the young student to the mature and ripened judgment of age. So written, it was impossible that there should not be inconsistencies between certain portions, for "all true opinions," as the author himself says, "are living, and show their life by being capable of nourishment; therefore of changes." No man can be certain of reaching final truth.

But from his main purpose Ruskin has never swerved; testing all works of art by their concurrence with, or subjection to, those of God, and making clear from beginning to end that what is best and noblest in art, is best and noblest in morals. And is he not right? Has any great work ever been done—work that was to last through the ages—except by one sincere, truthful and humble? Thought must first be turned from selfish contemplation before it can soar into the spaces of infinity; genius is only grand when unconscious. There must be an inward life reaching up toward love and purity in its perfectness, or human achievement, however glorious, will lack vitality, and its very memory perish.

Strange doctrine of materialism! Who can but shudder at what it would prove? We are to look at the clouds, and see only their gold, and scarlet, and vermilion—nothing more. We are to wander through the woods, and note the fitful play of light and shade between the leaves, and their beautiful arrangement—nothing more. We are to ascend the mountains with eyes blind to "their gates of rock, pavements of cloud, choirs of stream and stone, altars of snow, and vaults of purple traversed by the continual stars." Epithets, as applied to nature, can no longer be used. For who would ascribe steadfastness to the pine, humility to the violet, or rage to the torrent, if no invisible power were manifest in their existence? Invisible! Why, the world itself is ruled by things unseen, not seen. Thought furnishes its motive force, and spirit is everywhere triumphant over matter.

What, then, is materialism? Let those who understand answer.

That Ruskin should be criticised by advocates of this doctrine, was the natural consequence of his peculiar teaching. But that any who are not materialists should complain that he gives to art a moral responsibility, not justly its own, is a phenomenon difficult to understand. What is Art but the pursuit of Beauty, and what is Beauty but the emanation of Divinity? Can the painter, the poet, the sculptor or the musician reach supreme excellence without faith in things spiritual? He is ever the greatest who, knowing good from evil, seizes the one and rejects the other.

Never was this more clearly demonstrated than in the writings of Ruskin. He shows us Religion linked hand in hand with Nature and Art—three radiant figures standing out clear in the light of God. To the visible forms of things, he adds an inner meaning, and makes their laws of growth and change typical of that Divine dispensation under which we, too, live. Truth and beauty, he teaches, are only to be attained by a faithful study of nature; it is reality we want, not vague imaginings. And so earnestly does he feel all this, and so eloquent and effective are the words in which he expresses it, that he thrills the heart, and compels instant sympathy, Considered merely as a writer and word-painter, he takes high rank. In the long, musical swell of his sentences, and in a certain tendency to digression, he reminds us of De Quincey, but his style is due rather to innate faculty than to modifying influences. He mentions Wordsworth, Carlyle and Helps as the modern writers to whom he owes most, and thinks that his constant study of Carlyle must have colored his language as well as his thought. But this is never observable; Carlyle and he resemble each other in their hatred of falsehood, their powers of description, and perhaps in a certain quaint flavor of humor, but no farther.

Ruskin's style is distinctively his own. Such power has he over words, and such precision in using them, that he can bring out the minutest facts of nature, and make us see the sunbeams dancing on the leaves, the sea-waves breaking into foam, and the very wreathing of the mist, and waving cloud-sentinels along the mountains. Scattered through his writings are hundreds of illustrative passages; I content myself with one. It is the description of sunlight after storm, in Italy, near Rome.

"The noonday sun came slanting down the rocky slopes of La Riccia, and their masses of entangled and tall foliage, whose autumnal tints were mixed with the wet verdure of a thousand evergreens, were penetrated with it as with rain. I cannot call it color, it was conflagration. Purple, and crimson, and scarlet, like the curtains of God's tabernacle, the rejoicing trees sank into the valley in showers of light, every separate leaf quivering with buoyant and burning life; each as it turned to reflect or transmit the sunbeam, first a torch and then an emerald. Far up into the recesses of the valley, the green vistas arched like the hollows of mighty waves of some crystalline sea, with the arbutus flowers dashed along their flanks for foam, and silver flakes of orange spray tossed into the air around them, breaking over the gray walls of rock into a thousand separate stars, fading and kindling alternately as the weak wind lifted and let them fall. Every blade of grass burned like the golden floor of heaven, opening in sudden gleams as the foliage broke and closed above it, as sheet-lightning opens in a cloud at sunset; the motionless masses of dark rock—dark though flushed with scarlet lichen, casting their quiet shadows across its restless radiance, the fountain underneath them filling its marble hollow with blue mist and fitful sound; and over all, the multitudinous bars of amber and rose, the sacred clouds that have no darkness, and only exist to illumine, were seen in fathomless intervals, between the solemn and orbéd repose of the stone pines, passing to lose themselves in the last, white, blending lustre of the measureless line where the Campagna melted into the blaze of the sea."

Ruskin has been accused of verbiage, and his word-painting has been called an easy matter. Analyze that passage, clause by clause, and you will think differently. Find an epithet, if you can, that does not state some fact, or define some quality. Notice their delicate truthfulness and precision, each one fitting into its place and harmonizing with the whole.

Soon after the appearance of Ruskin's first work, a new school of painting sprang up in England, the result mainly of his teaching. It raised the standard of revolt against a certain conventionalism in art dating from the time of Raphael, and was therefore called Pre-Raphaelitism. From its adherents it demanded uncompromising realism, and faithfulness to nature in her minutest details.

The critics combined their forces against this school as they had before done against Ruskin. How dared one use his eyes, and paint what he really saw instead of that which tradition declared he ought to see? And how came it that Ruskin should come forward as their champion—he who had given boundless admiration to Turner, and so ridiculed the Dutch painters. Let his own words tell.

"From young artists," says he, "nothing ought to be tolerated but simple bond fide imitation of nature. * * * They should keep to quiet colors, grays and browns; and should go to nature with all singleness of heart, and walk with her laboriously and trustingly, having no other thoughts but how best to penetrate her meaning, and remember her instruction; rejecting nothing, selecting nothing, and scorning nothing; believing all things to be right and good, and rejoicing always in the truth. Then, when their memories are stored, and their imaginations fed, and their hands firm, let them take up the scarlet and the gold, give the reins to their fancy, and show us what their heads are made of. We will follow them wherever they choose to lead; we will check at nothing; they are then our masters, and are fit to be so. They have placed themselves above our criticism, and we will listen to their words in all faith and humility; but not unless they themselves have before bowed, in the same submission, to a higher Authority and Master."

Ruskin's meaning seems clear, yet it has been strangely misunderstood. Readers do not always discriminate between the two points of view from which he looks at painting, prizing it first for technical excellence, but above all for the poetic thought it embodies. One thing only he condemns utterly—mediocrity putting on the guise of genius. Conventional rules cannot make a painter, nor the study of prosody a poet. Pre-Raphaelite or otherwise, the painter in whose work he discerns want of feeling and absence of thought, falls at once under his rebuke. Art has to do with creation, not manufacture, if she would keep the heavenly lustre of her robes, and not trail them in the mire.

Besides "Modern Painters," Ruskin has written other works, no less eloquent and beautiful. The "Stones of Venice" are full of grand pictures and stimulating thought. In "Sesame and Lilies" he speaks of books and women, with a true appreciation of what is best in both, crowning the latter queens of their households and of the world. "The Ethics of the Dust" is a beautiful study of crystals and their formation, applying the facts of inanimate to human nature. "Unto this Last," is a treatise on political economy—a work that has been more ridiculed and maligned than any of his others. And it cannot be denied that its arguments are often illogical, and its conclusions unjust. But what gives it worth are the blows aimed against the selfish materialism of the age, and its utter abhorrence of that covetous spirit which is the Nemesis of modern society. Others may compromise with the evil—Ruskin, never.

But what is to be done? This much, as he declares in "Fors Clavigera," a series of monthly letters to the workmen and laborers of Great Britain. He engages to give one-tenth of his yearly income toward the founding of a community, to be called the "St. George's Company." Whatever land is purchased shall be cultivated by its members "with their own hands and such help of force as they can find in wind and wave;" there shall be no railroads or steam-engines on it, "no untended or unthought-of creatures." The laborers shall be paid fixed wages, and their children educated compulsorily, one condition of such education being that the boys shall learn either to ride or to sail, and the girls to spin, weave and sew, and "cook all ordinary food exquisitely." They shall also be taught vocal music, Latin, and the history of five cities—Athens, Rome, Venice, Florence and London. Gentleness to brutes, courtesy to each other, rigid truth-speaking and instant obedience, shall constitute part of their moral training. Leading pure and simple lives, they will possess the first condition necessary to the cultivation of art, and little by little it will spring up among them and reach upward.

Land has been already purchased, and the experiment is to be tried—with what result awaits to be seen. Others rail at social abuses, but Ruskin seeks out a remedy, and his scheme, even though impracticable, is consistent with the spirit in which he denounces modern crime and folly. It cannot be denied that he views these evils with exaggerated feeling, and utters, at times, strange paradoxes and incoherences that lead people to undervalue the strength of his teaching, and dwell rather on its weakness. But in judging Ruskin, one must take into account the peculiar character of his genius, his constitutional irritability, his deep religious fervor and exquisite sense of the beautiful, whether in art or nature. Then picture him battling with a world, full of meanness and hypocrisy, outraged at every turn by external ugliness, wounded by doubt and disbelief, and unable to see even the faint light that illumines this darkness.

Let us not cease to be grateful, even though, as the years pass, he grows more bitter and misanthropic, and fulminates strange anathemas against this modern life of ours, and its countless inventions, ascribing to the last the greater part of our sin and wretchedness. Remember not his faults, but rather the unselfishness and purity of his character, and his earnest love for all that is truly good and great. Think of that beautiful home on Denmark Hill, in the London suburbs, filled with exquisite works of art, yet unable to give peace and content to the heart of its owner. For he cannot shut out the mournful cries that reach him from the outside world; he cannot rest in apathetic unconcern while men, created in the image of God, go down to the grave like brutes. He may err in judgment, and talk unreasonably, but his protests are not without a meaning that we should do well to heed. Were it not for a few bold spirits like his, stemming the tide of falsehood and corruption, and guiding men's thoughts from material interests to spiritual, who knows whither we should drift in this unbelieving, money-making age?

One extract more, and I am done. Ruskin is speaking of Turner, but think over the words, and ponder them carefully.

"Love and trust," he writes, "are the only mother-milk of any man's soul. So far as he is hated and mistrusted, his powers are destroyed. * * * No man can serve you either for purse or curse; neither kind of pay will answer. No pay is, indeed, receivable by any true man; but power is receivable by him, in the love and faith you give him. So far only as you give him these can he serve you; that is the meaning of the question which his Master asks always, 'Believest thou that I am able?' And from every one of His servants to the end of time—if you give them the Capernaum measure of faith, you shall have from them Capernaum measure of works, and no more. * * * As the flower is gnawed by frost, so every human heart is gnawed by faithlessness. And as surely, as irrevocably, as the fruit-bud falls before the east wind, so fails the power of the kindest human heart, if you meet it with poison."

The immediate neighborhood of Mantua presents few attractions to the lover of the beautiful in nature. Nevertheless, the city itself possesses many objects of interest in its ancient buildings and works of art. The immense bridges, six in number, which connect it with the main land, form a striking feature in the general view. Of these bridges, the largest and most imposing is the Ponte di San Georgio, which, crossing the entire lake, is two thousand, five hundred feet in length, and dates from the fourteenth century. A portion of Mantua, which the visitor is expected to admire, lies in the neighborhood of the Piazza Virgiliana—a large square surrounded by trees, with the lake in front. One of the most important buildings to be noticed, as being a relic of the still visible ancient splendor of Mantua, is the Castella di Corte. It is a huge edifice, with noble towers, which, however, are greatly decayed and battered, bearing witness to the many misfortunes, by battle and siege, which the city has sustained. Built originally as a palace by a member of the celebrated Gonzago family, it is now used partly as a prison, and in part for public offices. The once grand, but now deserted imperial palace, with its five hundred rooms, and its innumerable frescoes by the old masters, is another one of the sights of Mantua. The floor of this building is of porcelain.

MANTUA.

BY E. J. N. SAMMLER.

MANTUA, a strongly fortified city of Lombardy, with a population of some thirty thousand inhabitants, is justly accounted one of the bulwarks of Italy. It is also celebrated as the birthplace of Virgil; though, in fact, the great Roman poet was born at Andes, a little village two miles distant, where a palace was built by one of the Gonzagas, and from him received the title of Virgiliano. Mantua lies some twenty miles a little to the south-east of Verona. Its situation is unique, it being built upon two flat pieces of land, between which flows the river Mincio. Surrounded by lakes, some of which are natural, others artificial, being formed by damming up the waters of the river, it is by no means remarkable as a healthy location.

The churches of Mantua are also very imposing structures, rich in works of art, and in monuments of antiquity.

The central part of Mantua shows signs of considerable commercial activity, but the outskirts are exceedingly quiet. Among the public enterprises of the city are an academy of fine arts, a public library, containing nearly a hundred thousand volumes, a lyceum, a gymnasium, a workhouse, two orphan asylums, a botanic garden and many other scientific and industrial institutions.

Mantua is a very ancient city, older, it is said, even than Rome. During the days of her prosperity, when under the government of her own dukes, the city was celebrated as a manufacturing centre, and had a population of fifty thousand.

PLEURS.

IN the public library at Zurich, there is a book, published more than seventy years ago, on the destruction of Alpine villages, from which the following account, of the comparatively unheard-of City of Pleurs, is obtained. In a charming situation on the River Maira, a few miles before it flows into Lake Como, and but little distance south of the Swiss border by the Splügen Pass, lies the City of Chiavenna. An hour's walk from there toward the Pass of Maloggia, eastward, up the beautiful bank of the Maira, brings one to a place where a greater number of human beings were once buried alive than anywhere else known in the world. Even in Pompeii, as is supposed, less than a thousand people were overtaken by the fiery deluge from Vesuvius. But here three times that number were overwhelmed, with all their signs of life and civilization. And all were buried forever. There has never been any excavation at this place. They were a prosperous and happy people. It was one of the gayest, richest, most pleasure-loving little cities of Lombardy. Hanging above it was a mountain four thousand feet high: not very high for that region, but much too high for the safety of the inhabitants. It was called Monte Conte: the half of it which still stands, with one side abrupt and perpendicular, is still known by the same name. On the night of the fourteenth of September, 1618, it split in two from base to apex, and half of it lies a wide spread grave-mound over the deeply-buried little city. This terrible avalanche was so instantaneous; it closed in the extreme outside houses so entirely; it was so complete and overwhelming, that it was impossible to discover the least vestige of Pleurs remaining.

The substance that fell upon it was a mountain-side forest, and an immense depth of broken rock and earth. Enormous blocks of rock, some sixty feet thick are heaped in the most frightful confusion. Below the valley is wooded without sign of habitation, perhaps, because another suspiciously-steep mountain is there; but a mile or two beyond that are farms. Other mountains twice as high are to be seen in picturesque peaks and outlines; and on the opposite side of the Maira is one of the most beautiful cascades in the world, probably, entirely unheard of in books, or in travel. It falls over a succession of ledges in four broad, thin sheets, each sixty to one hundred feet wide and about as deep. To the few who have heard of Pleurs, and turn aside from going down into Italy from the Splügen Pass, to view this place, it cannot fail to be highly interesting..

This city was called Pleurs, or the Town of Tears, because, strange as it may seem, it was situated upon the broad earthy tomb of another village, which had itself been overwhelmed by a like catastrophe. But that was many hundred years earlier, yet the fact is well known. The mountain from which that ancient avalanche slid away displays the ruin wrought upon it more distinctly than Mount Conte, which overwhelmed Pleurs. As that mountain did not leave a surface of earth, that could become converted into soil and spring into vegetation, but its steep, towering wall is a mass of broken, flaky rock, in thin horizontal layers. While the restorative powers of nature have caused vegetation to cover Mount Conte, both the steep cleft side of the half mountain that stands and the half that lies prostrate. A straggling forest of chestnut trees, in the more earthy places, covers the site, with clumps of whortleberry bushes among the rocks. It seems singular, that in those old times—the beginning of the seventeenth century—rich gentlemen and nobles, fashionable people and successful merchants, should have had the same way we have of going with their families to summer resorts. But the old Romans, we well know, had their country villas. Cicero speaks of retiring to his suburban abode—to his “books, and tablets, and literary leisure;” and, perhaps, we have very little that is new in our ways of life. Well recorded facts show that at the time when Pleurs was destroyed, a few hundred more people were in town than the resident population, and they were summer visitors. A party from Milan went down to Chiavenna a few days before, and on account of very rainy weather, remained there till the afternoon before the avalanche occurred. That being a pleasant day they set out to go to Pleurs. On approaching the town, they were alarmed at seeing several slides of gravel and rocks, and finding that some of the vineyards had been buried, most of them returned to Chiavenna, but some kept on. At Chiavenna, the people wondered, the next morning, at what had become of their river, for the Maira was dry. The mountain had fallen across the valley, and the city of Pleurs, with the out-lying village of Celano, had disappeared forever. There was a very old stone cathedral in Pleurs, rich in plate and sacred ornaments. Also two or three nobles' palaces. Its destruction spread mourning and terror through the region of Northern Italy.

THE SPRINGTIME.

BY S. D.

IN the beautiful, budding springtime,

The violets sweet and white,

Peeped forth from their emerald leaflets,

Like forgotten snow-flakes white.

They scented the April breezes,

And swayed the young, green leaves

Of the grand, old weeping willow,

Which drooped o'er the moss-grown eaves.

From the dark-brown mold sprung the crocus,

While away in the forest deep,

The forget-me-not and spring beauty,

Awoke from their long, dark sleep;

They sprang from cold earth's bosom,

The nodding ferns to greet;

Smiled at the wax-blossomed wind-flower,

And welcomed the daisies sweet.

They lifted their fragrant petals,

Kissed by the sun and showers;

To list to the ring-dove's cooing,

Through the long, bright, happy hours.

O Spring! thou art whispering ever,

Of the grander life to come—

By all thy growing seeds and buds

And thy leaflets green and young.

MEMORIAL HALL.

THE BUILDINGS OF THE CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

THE construction of the buildings for the International Exhibition at Fairmount Park, is progressing with satisfactory rapidity. There is no fear expressed of their incompletion at the opening of the exhibition, on the 10th of May, 1876. The principal of these buildings are the Main Building, the Art Gallery, the Machinery Hall, the Agricultural and Horticultural Halls. There will be required, in addition to these buildings, a number of smaller structures, which will be erected during the present season.

When one considers the vast undertaking of building these extensive structures, which cover in the aggregate a surface of about forty acres, and is still further reminded that the grading of the ground of the Park preparatory to their erection was not commenced until July, 1874, the progress made will be found to be indeed wonderful.

The Main Exhibition Building is in the form of a parallelogram, one thousand eight hundred and eighty feet in length, and four hundred and sixty-four feet in width. It extends east and west. The main entrance will be on the north side, and will lead directly to the Art Gallery, which stands at a distance of three hundred feet. The east entrance will form the principal approach for carriages, visitors being allowed to alight at the doors of the building under cover of the arcade. The south entrance will be the principal approach for street cars, the ticket offices being located upon the line of Elm Avenue, with covered ways provided for entrance into the building itself. The west entrance gives the main passage-way into the Machinery and Agricultural Halls.

The superstructure is composed of wrought-iron columns, which support wrought-iron roof trusses. The sides of the building for the height of seven feet from the ground are to be finished with timber framed in panels between the columns, and above the seven feet with glazed sash.

There will be a central avenue or nave through the building, one hundred and twenty feet in width, and one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two feet in length. On each side are parallel avenues of equal length and one hundred feet in width; while between the nave and side avenues are aisles forty-eight feet wide, and on the outer sides of the building are smaller aisles twenty-four feet in width. There are to be three transepts through the centre of the building, the central one one hundred and twenty feet in width, and the side ones one hundred feet. All the other cross aisles will vary from ten to forty-eight feet in width.

The Art Gallery is to be a magnificent structure located on a line parallel with and northward of the Main Exhibition Building. It is situated on the Lansdowne Plateau, and overlooks the city. It is elevated on a terrace six feet above the general level of the plateau, the plateau itself being one hundred and sixteen feet above the Schuylkill River.

The architecture of this gallery is in the modern Renaissance. The materials are granite, glass and iron. No wood will be used in the construction, and the building will be thoroughly fire-proof. This building is intended to remain as a permanent feature of Fairmount Park after the close of the exhibition.

The main front of the Art Gallery will face the Main Exhibition Building. It will display in the centre an entrance consisting of three colossal arched doorways of equal dimensions. There will be a pavilion at each end, while between the pavilions and the entrance are arcades, constructed to conceal the long walls of the gallery. These arcades will each consist of five groined arches, and will form promenades looking outward over the grounds and inward over open gardens, which will extend back to the main wall of the building. The garden plats within the arcades are each to be ninety feet long and thirty-six feet deep, to be ornamented in the centre with fountains, and designed for the display of statuary.

The rear or north front is to be similar to the main front, but in place of the arcade will be a series of arched windows. There will be a pavilion at each corner of the building, and the walls between on the east and west sides are to be relieved by five niches designed for statues.

It is impossible in the limits of this article to explain the general interior arrangement of this building. It is sufficient to say that the space furnished for paintings and statuary will be ample, and the whole building, in both internal arrangement and external finish, a structure of which, considered as a national art gallery, we may be proud.

The Machinery Building is located at a distance of five hundred and forty-two feet from the west front of the Main Exhibition Building, the north front of the former being upon the same line as that of the latter.

The building consists of the main hall, three hundred and sixty feet wide by one thousand four hundred and two feet long, and an annex on the south side of two hundred and eight by two hundred and ten feet. The entire area covered by the building is nearly thirteen acres.

The Horticultural Building is intended, like the Art Gallery, to remain a permanent feature of the Park. It is located on the Lansdowne terrace, a short distance north of the Main Building and Art Gallery, and has a commanding view of the Schuylkill River, and the northwestern portion of the city. The principal materials of which it is to be built are glass and iron. The length of the building is three hundred and eighty-three feet, width one hundred and ninety-three feet, and height to the top of the lantern seventy-two feet.

There will be a large central conservatory; and on the north and south sides of this principal room are to be four forcing houses for the propagation of young plants, covered with curved roof of iron and glass. Besides these rooms, there are to be vestibules, restaurants, reception-rooms, offices, etc. There are to be galleries both inside and outside of the building, and upon the roof a grand promenade, which will have an area of one thousand eight hundred square yards.

Near this principal building will be a number of other structures, such as a Victoria Regia House, Domestic and Tropical Orchard Houses, a Grapery, and similar horticultural buildings. The surrounding grounds will be arranged for out-door planting, and, under the auspices of the National Horticultural Society, organized for the purpose of co-operating with the Centennial Commission, it is expected that an imposing display will be made. It is proposed to plant, among other things, representative trees of all parts of the continent, so that side by side the visitor may see the full variety of the forest products and fruits of the country, from the firs of the extreme North to the oranges and bananas of Florida, and the grapes and other fruits of California.

The Agricultural Building will stand north of the Horticultural Building, and on the eastern side of Belmont Avenue. Its materials are to be of wood and glass. It will consist of a long nave and three transepts. The ground plan of the building will be a parallelogram of five hundred and forty feet by eight hundred and twenty feet, covering a space of above ten acres. In its immediate vicinity will be the stock yards, for the exhibition of horses, cattle, sheep, swine, poultry, etc.

The International Exhibition of 1876 will be opened on the 10th of May, and be closed on the 10th of the following November. All governments have been invited to appoint Commissions for the purpose of organizing their departments of the exhibition. Exhibitors will not be charged for space, but must provide show-cases, shelving, counters, etc., at their own cost. The articles to be put on exhibition have been classified in ten departments, as follows: 1. Raw materials—mineral, vegetable and animal. 2. Materials and manufactures used for food, or in the arts, the result of extractive or combining processes. 3. Textile and felted fabrics; apparel, costumes and ornaments for the person. 4. Furniture and manufactures of general use in construction and in dwellings. 5. Tools, implements, machines and processes. 6. Motors and transportation. 7. Apparatus and methods for the increase and diffusion of knowledge. 8. Engineering, public works, architecture, etc. 9. Plastic and graphic arts. 10. Objects illustrating efforts for the improvement of the physical, intellectual and moral condition of men.

Besides the Exhibition Buildings proper, numerous applications have been made by manufacturers, and by the Commissions of foreign governments, for permission to erect pavilions and various ornamental and useful structures within the Exhibition grounds.

INTEGRITY is the first moral virtue, benevolence the second, and prudence is the third. Without the first, the two latter cannot exist, and without the third the two former would be often rendered useless.

A BEAUTIFUL DAY IN JUNE.

BY JANE O. DE FOREST.

POETS may sing of the balmy breezes of spring, of budding branches and of lovely apple-blossoms, of the dark, dense foliage of the later summer-time, of the many-hued leaves of autumn and the snowy fields and glittering glories of winter, but nothing can be more perfect this side of Heaven than a beautiful day in June. The leaves and grasses have that most lovely shade of green, darker than in May, and brighter than during the later summer months. The sky is of a clear, deep blue, and seems to arch lovingly over the newly-clothed earth. The sun shines brightly, but without undue fervor; the winds blow softly and coolly, laden with the perfume of roses, syringas, honeysuckles, clover-blossoms and ripening cherries. The luscious strawberries are hiding beneath their leaves, awaiting a transfer from their lowly beds to our tables. Birds of various kinds, as the robin, the thrush and the wren, sing merrily from the trees.

Looking out from a front window of my cottage home this sunny afternoon, I am enchanted with the loveliness of the day, and take in deep draughts of the pure health-giving air, a real "elixir of life." How the breeze sighs in the stately pine at the gate, and brings to me occasional balsamic odors. The trees and shrubs and grasses are swayed gracefully to and fro, and glisten in the sunshine.

Oh that more of our days were so calm and beautiful, that life might be more June-like to the toiling, struggling masses of humanity! Alas! that "perfect days" are so rare.

One must live in the town or country really to see and appreciate such delightful days. The majority of those who have always lived in large cities, know but little of these lovely glimpses of Nature. Shut in by high brick walls, they find occasional relief by visiting the city parks, now becoming so numerous; but these resorts are mostly monopolized by the wealthy and well-to-do portion of the inhabitants, for the hard-working poor have little time or money with which to seek recreation. In the country everything is different, for even the "farm hands" have the same opportunities for enjoying the beauties of Nature as their employers. People of wealth can afford to reside in cities, as they are able to spend their summers among the green fields; but it is indeed a mystery why so many of the poor will persist in living in crowded tenement houses and suffer year after year from cold and hunger, lack of pure air and sunshine, when so many broad acres in our great country are awaiting cultivation.

Those philanthropists which shall eventually, let us hope, lead out from their desolate homes the suffering denizens of our great, overcrowded cities, find homes for them in the villages and the country, and teach them to become useful members of society, will surely be more worthy of admiration than any beautiful day in June.

ZEAL is very blind or badly regulated when it encroaches upon the rights of others.

THE AGRICULTURAL BUILDING.

RALPH RIDLEY.*

A HANDSOME man of forty-five stood lingering by the bedside of his wife, whose large, tender eyes looked up at him almost wistfully. A baby's head, dark with beautiful hair that curled in scores of silken ringlets, lay close against her bosom. The chamber was not large or richly furnished, though everything was in good taste and comfortable. A few articles were out of harmony with the rest and hinted at better days. One of these was a large secretary of curious workmanship, inlaid with costly woods and pearl and rich with carvings. Another was a small mantel clock of exquisite beauty. Two or three small but rare pictures hung on the walls.

Looking closely into the man's strong intellectual face, you would have seen something that marred the harmony of its fine features and dimmed its clear expression—something to stir a doubt or awaken a feeling of concern. The eyes, that were deep and intense, had a shadow in them, and the curves of the mouth had suffering and passion and evidences of stern mental conflict in every line. This was no common man, no social drone, but one who in his contact with men was used to making himself felt.

"Come home early, Ralph, won't you?" said his wife.

The man bent down and kissed her, and then pressed his lips to the baby's head.

"Yes, dear; I don't mean to stay late. If it wasn't for the expectation of meeting General Logan and one or two others that I particularly wish to see, I wouldn't go at all. I have to make good, you know, all the opportunities that come in my way."

"Oh, yes, I know. You must go, of course." She had taken her husband's hand, and was holding it with a close pressure. He had to draw it away almost by force.

"Good-night, dear, and God bless you." His voice trembled a little. He stooped and kissed her again. A moment after and she was alone. Then all the light went out of her face and a deep shadow fell quickly over it. She shut her eyes, but not tightly enough to hold back the tears that soon came creeping slowly out from beneath the closed lashes.

Ralph Ridley was a lawyer of marked ability. A few years before, he had given up a good practice at the bar for an office under the State government. Afterward he was sent to Congress and passed four years in Washington. Like too many of our ablest public men, the temptations of that city were too much for him. It was the old sad story that repeats itself every year. He fell a victim to the drinking customs of our national capital. Everywhere and on all social occasions invitations to wine met him. He drank with a friend on his way to the House, and with another in the Capitol buildings before taking his seat for business. He drank at lunch and at dinner, and he drank more freely at party or levee in the evening. Only in the early morning was he free from the bewildering effects of liquor.

Four years of such a life broke down his manhood. Hard as he sometimes struggled to rise above the debasing appetite that had enslaved him, resolution snapped like thread in a flame with every new temptation. He stood erect and hopeful to-day, and to-morrow lay prone and despairing under the heel of his enemy.

At the end of his second term in Congress the people of his district rejected him. They could tolerate a certain degree of drunkenness and demoralization in their representative, but Ridley had fallen too low. They would have him no longer, and so he was left out in the party nomination and sent back into private life hurt, humiliated and in debt. No clients awaited his return. His law-office had been closed for years, and there was little encouragement to open it again in the old place. For some weeks after his failure to get the nomination Ridley drank more desperately than ever, and was in a state of intoxication nearly all the while. His poor wife, who clung to him through all with an unwavering fidelity, was nearly broken-hearted. In vain had relatives and friends interposed. No argument nor persuasion could induce her to abandon him. "He is my husband," was her only reply, "and I will not leave him."

One night he was brought home insensible. He had fallen in the street where some repairs were being made, and had received serious injuries which confined him to the house for two or three weeks. This gave time for reflection and repentance. The shame and remorse that filled his soul as he looked at his sad, pale wife and neglected children, and thought of his tarnished name and lost opportunities, spurred him to new and firmer resolves than ever before made. He could go forward no longer without utter ruin. No hope was left but in turning back. He must set his face in a new direction, and he vowed to do so, promising God on his knees in tears and agony to hold by his vow sacredly.

A new day had dawned. As soon as Mr. Ridley was well enough to be out again he took counsel of friends, and after careful deliberation resolved to leave his native town and remove to the city. A lawyer of fine ability and known to the public as a clear thinker and an able debater, he had made quite an impression on the country during his first term in Congress; neither he nor his friends had any doubt as to his early success, provided he was able to keep himself free from the thrall of old habits.

A few old friends and political associates made up a purse to enable him to remove to the city with his family. An office was taken and three rooms rented in a small house, where, with his wife and two children, one daughter in her fourteenth year, life was started anew. There was no room for a servant in this small establishment even if he had been able to pay the hire of one.

So the new beginning was made. A man of Mr. Ridley's talents and reputation could not long remain unemployed. In the very first week he had a client and a retaining fee of twenty-five dollars.

The case was an important one, involving some nice questions of mercantile law. It came up for argument in the course of a few weeks, and gave the opportunity he wanted. His management of the case was so superior to that of the opposing counsel, and his citations of law and precedent so cumulative and explicit, that he gained not only an easy victory, but made for himself a very favorable impression.

After that business began gradually to flow in upon him, and he was able to gather in sufficient to keep his family, though for some time only in a very humble way. Having no old acquaintances in the city, Mr. Ridley was comparatively free from temptation. He was promptly at his office in the morning, never leaving it, except to go into court or some of the public offices on business, until the hour arrived for returning home.

A new life had become dominant, a new ambition was ruling him. Hope revived in the heart of his almost despairing wife, and the future looked bright again. His eyes had grown clear and confident once more and his stooping shoulders square and erect. In his bearing you saw the old stateliness and conscious sense of power. Men treated him with deference and respect.

In less than a year Mr. Ridley was able to remove his family into a better house and to afford the expense of a servant. So far they had kept out of the city's social life. Among strangers and living humbly, almost meanly, they neither made nor received calls nor had invitations to evening entertainments; and herein lay Mr. Ridley's safety. It was on his social side that he was weakest. He could hold himself above appetite and deny its cravings if left to the contest alone. The drinking-saloons whose hundred doors he had to pass daily did not tempt him, did not cause his firm steps to pause nor linger. His sorrow and shame for the past and his solemn promises and hopes for the future were potent enough to save him from all such allurements. For him their doors stood open in vain. The path of danger lay in another direction. He would have to be taken unawares. If betrayed at all, it must be, so to speak, in the house of a friend. The Delilah of "good society" must put caution and conscience to sleep and then rob him of his strength.

The rising man at the bar of a great city who had already served two terms in Congress could not long remain in social obscurity; and as it gradually became known in the "best society" that Mrs. Ridley stood connected with some of the "best families" in the State, one and another began to call upon her and to court her acquaintance, even though she was living in comparative obscurity and in a humble way.

At first regrets were returned to all invitations to evening entertainments, large or small. Mr. Ridley very well understood why his wife, who was social and naturally fond of company, was so prompt to decline. He knew that the excuse, "We are not able to give parties in return," was not really the true one. He knew that she feared the temptation that would come to him, and he was by no means insensible to the perils that would beset him whenever he found himself in the midst of a convivial company, with the odor of wine heavy on the air and invitations to drink meeting him at every turn.

But this could not always be. Mr. and Mrs. Ridley could not forever hold themselves away from the social life of a large city among the people of which their acquaintance was gradually extending. Mrs. Ridley would have continued to stand aloof because of the danger she had too good reason to fear, but her husband was growing, she could see, both sensitive and restless. He wanted the professional advantages society would give him, and he wanted, moreover, to prove his manhood and take away the reproach under which he felt himself lying. Sooner or later he must walk this way of peril, and he felt that he was becoming strong enough and brave enough to meet the old enemy that had vanquished him so many times.

"We will go," he said, on receiving cards of invitation to a party given by a prominent and influential citizen. "People will be there whom I should meet, and people whom I want you to meet."

He saw a shadow creep into his wife's face; Mrs. Ridley saw the shadow reflected almost as a frown from his. She knew what was in her husband's thoughts, knew that he felt hurt and restless under her continued reluctance to have him go into any company where wine and spirits were served to the guests, and feeling that a longer opposition might do more harm than good, answered, with as much heartiness and assent as she could get into her voice:

"Very well, but it will cost you the price of a new dress, for I have nothing fit to appear in."

The shadow swept off Mr. Ridley's face.

"All right," he returned. "I received a fee of fifty dollars to-day, and you shall have every cent of it."

In the week that intervened Mrs. Ridley made herself ready for the party; but had she been preparing for a funeral, her heart could scarcely have been heavier. Fearful dreams haunted her sleep, and through the day imagination would often draw pictures the sight of which made her cry out in sudden pain and fear. All this she concealed from her husband, and affected to take a pleased interest in the coming entertainment.

Mrs. Ridley was still a handsome woman, and her husband felt the old pride warming his bosom when he saw her again among brilliant and attractive women and noted the impression she made. He watched her with something of the proud interest a mother feels for a beautiful daughter who makes her appearance in society for the first time, and his heart beat with liveliest pleasure as he noticed the many instances in which she attracted and held people by the grace of her manner and the charm of her conversation.

"God bless her!" he said in his heart fervently as the love he bore her warmed into fresher life and moved him with a deeper tenderness, and then he made for her sake a new vow of abstinence and set anew the watch and ward upon his appetite. And he had need of watch and ward. The wine-merchant's bill for that evening's entertainment was over eight hundred dollars, and men and women, girls and boys, all drank in unrestrained freedom.

Mrs. Ridley, without seeming to do so, kept close to her husband while he was in the supper-room, and he, as if feeling the power of her protecting influence, was pleased to have her near. The smell of wine, its sparkle in the glasses, the freedom and apparent safety with which every one drank, the frequent invitations received, and the breeding's sake have sipped a little, just tasting its flavor, so that he could compliment his host upon its rare quality.

"Thank you," Mr. Ridley was able to say, "but I do not take wine." His voice was not clear and manly, but unsteady and weak.

"Oh, excuse me," said the gentleman, setting down the glass quickly. "I was not aware of that."

He stood as if slightly embarrassed for a moment, and then, turning to a clergyman who stood close by, said: "Will you take a glass of wine with me, Mr. Elliott?"

An assenting smile broke into Mr. Elliott's face, and he reached for the glass which Mr. Ridley had just refused.

"Something very choice," said the host.

The clergyman tasted and sipped with the air of a connoisseur.

"Very choice indeed, sir," he replied. "But you always have good wine."

Mrs. Ridley drew her hand in her husband's arm and leaned upon it.

"If it is to be had," returned the host, a little proudly; "and I generally know where to get it. A good glass of wine I count among the blessings for which one may give thanks—wine, I mean, not drugs."

"Exactly; wine that is pure hurts no one, unless, indeed, his appetite has been vitiated through alcoholic indulgence, and even then I have sometimes thought that the moderate use of strictly pure wine would restore the normal taste and free a man from the tyranny of an enslaving vice."

That sentence took quick hold upon the thought of Mr. Ridley. It gave him a new idea, and he listened with keen interest to what followed.

"You strike the keynote of a true temperance reformation, Mr. Elliott," returned the host.

"Give men pure wine instead of the vile stuff that bears its name, and you will soon get rid of drunkenness. I have always preached that doctrine."

Mr. Ridley went home from that first party with his head as clear and his pulse as cool as when he came. The wine had not tempted him very strongly, though its odor had been fragrant to his nostrils, and the sparkle in the glasses pleasant to his sight. Appetite had not aroused itself nor put on its strength, but lay half asleep, waiting for some better opportunity, when the sentinels should be weaker or off their guard.

It had been much harder for him to refuse the little banter and half-surprised lifting of the eyebrows that came now and then upon refusal were no light draught on Mr. Ridley's strength.

"Have you tried this sherry, Mr. Ridley?" said the gentlemanly host, taking a bottle from the supper-table and filling two glasses. "It is very choice." He lifted one of the glasses as he spoke and handed it to his guest. There was a flattering cordiality in his manner that made the invitation almost irresistible, and moreover he was a prominent and influential citizen whose favorable consideration Mr. Ridley wished to gain. If his wife had not been standing by his side, he would have accepted the glass, and for what seemed good
